4. But I remark again God is like a mother in the way He takes back the erring. When a man does wrong what does society do? It thrusts him out; his comrades thrust him out. If he keeps on his wrong-doing, his partners thrust him out. But who is it that sits by the murderer's counsel through the trial? Who is it that is the last one to leave the shadows of the prisoner's cell? The mother.

God bless her gray hair if she be still alive. God bless her grave if she be dead. God bless the chair in which she used to sit, and the cradle she used to rock, and the Bible she used to read. When all others give you up your mother does not give you up, and how like God that is! Does He ever give a man up? When one goes astray what do you do with him? You caricature him, you scold him, you smite him, you denounce him. What does God do? He honors him.

A soldier who was brought before a colonel in the English army, a soldier who had been very recreant to duty; he had been very bad indeed, and had been arraigned many times; and the sergeant brought the soldier to the colonel. "What! Have you brought that man here again? I have tried every thing with him. I cannot do him any good. Take him away from me." And after a while the sergeant came and said to the colonel, "There is one thing you have not tried." He says, "What is that?" "You have not tried forgiveness." And the recreant soldier was brought in, and the colone said to him, "Well, you have been here a grea many times, and I have reprimanded you and punished you. Now I am going to try something new. I have made up my mind to forgive you."

Then the tears fell from the offender's eyes and his lips quivered, and for the first time tha he seemed melted down he asked pardon of th commanding officer and began a new course o life, even the Christian life, starting for heaven that day. Oh, ye people who have wandered away from God, you who have been scolded, you who have been maltreated, you who have been caricatured, try forgiveness: the way of the mother comforteth, comforteth, comforteth.

5. The Bible speaks of God's hand. I wonder how it looks. You remember you remember your mother's hand. They were very different hands. Your father's hand had a firmly-set knuckle; it was hardened at the palm. He fought a very hard battle in giving you bread, in giving your brothers and sisters bread, in giving your mother bread. It was a very hard hand your father had. You remember it, although fifty years ago it may have faded away. The mother's hand, though it may have been at the tip of the finger pricked by the needle, taking it all in all, was a soft hand: it was a gentle hand. You remember the blue veins through the back of the hand. It was a gentle hand. Was there ever a poultice to take the pains out of a wound like a mother's hand? Oh, ye who have wandered away from God, I want to tell you to-night it is not a bailiff's hand that arrests you. It is a soft hand, a gentle hand, a loving hand, a sympathetic hand, the mother's hand of God Almighty. "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you."

If the men in this house who have wandered away from God only understood the tenderness of the Gospel, they would fly into the Kingdom to-night by hundreds and by thousands. Yes, this whole audience would be melted down under the truth, and they would come, not to-morrow; but now—yea, this moment they would cry out, "So long have I resisted the Lord God. I come to Thee. My King thou art, my father thou art, my mother thou art." And some of these who have been hardly bestead of the world, some of these men who have not had a kind, gentle, sympathetic word in their hearing for twenty years, would to-night say, "That is a religion I want—the religion of sympathy. I want to have the religion of the Gospel of help, and I want it now." And they begin to look, and in a moment are saved. They don't take a long rigmarole of prayer to God to get His pity. It is just one look, and we live

6. There is one mere analogy I want to draw out between God and a mother. God is like a mother in the fact that He knows how to hush a child to sleep. There is no cradle song like a mother's song. After the excitement of the evening, it is very difficult to get a child to sleep. The moment the rocking-chair stops the child opens its eyes. Then the mother goes on with the song, singing and rocking, singing and rocking, until the angel of slumber puts his wing over the cradle in the crib.

Oh, brothers and sisters in Jesus Christ, the time is coming when we will want some one to put us to sleep. The day of life will be closed, and the shadows of the evening of death will gather around us, and we will want something to hush us to sleep. The music we will want then will not be the dirge of the organ. not the bells of the church tower, not the rumbling of a dead march, but a mother's lullaby.

We will want God then to hush us to sleep. Oh, what a soft bed, what a soft cradle, the promises of God make for us! I think I would like to have this for a cradle song when we are put to our last sleep, "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you."

Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wakes to weep.

A Scotchman was dying in Scotland. It was a Sabbath evening. His daughter Nellie sat by his bedside. The church bells began to ring for the Sabbath evening service, and the old man in his dying dream thought he was on his way to the church, through the cold across the bridge over the river. And he said, "Hark! the bells are ringing, my lads, the bells are ringing; we will be late to church, make the horse strike out swiftly."

And then the old man shivered, and he said, "Bring the buffalo robes up closer, my lads. It is cold, but we shall soon be there: we will soon be at the church—we will soon be over the river, my lads—we are there now," he said with a smile. He could afford to smile, for he had reached the church: not the church on earth, but the church of God on high. Over the river there God hushed that old man to sleep. As one whom his mother comforteth, so God comforteth him.

A MINISTER'S VIEW OF SPIRITUALISM.

The Rev. Dr. Maurice Davies, of London, has published the following statement of his views regarding spiritualism:—

"Among the cases which have led me to the conviction, after more than twenty years' study of spiritualism, that, the manifestations are diabolical, I may mention three cases in particular as having mainly led me to this conclusion.

"The first case occurred a good many years ago, when I was curate to the late Archdeacon Sinclair. One of my congregation at St. Paul's, Vicarage Gardens, was greatly interested in these manifestations, and consulted me about them. She was stricken down suddenly with consumption, and we often used to talk over the subject when I visited her. In fact, she forced the topic upon me against my will, as I was unwilling to touch on it in my clerical ministrations. At the very last, almost as she was in the act of passing away, she whispered, 'Go home and sit. I will come to you if I can.' I did so immediately; and got a long communication, purporting to come from the newly departed spirit, wth names, dates, and all minutely given, but which I found on subsequent inquiry to be nothing more than a series of clever lies.

"The second was a séance at which I and two mediums—one of whom was a Romish priest—assisted. The priest received some frightful communications, which purported to come from the evil one himself. At the conclusion of the séance we sat in the dark for the special purpose, and in less than the time it takes to write the table around which we were gathered was lifted up, dashed violently to the ground, and shivered to pieces. I never saw such an exhibition of physical force.

"The third case was still more remarkable. The sitting took place in a West-End drawing-room, and was for materializations, as they are termed. We sat round a table. I held the medium with a tight grip on one side, and a person whom I could well trust on the other. There was a fair amount of subdued light, quite sufficient to discern what did take place. There appeared a materialization—but of what? An almost shapeless column of luminous vapor formed at the side of the medium; this gradually receded from him, retreated toward another portion of the room, which was curtained off from the one we occupied and was dissipated before our eyes in the very centre of the room before it got there. The effect was more gruesome than the most horrible form would have been.

"The horror lay in the formlessness, if I may use the expression. The idea of trickery was out of the question. The medium was before our eyes, and pinioned in the grip of two average men. Most of us saw the apparition—I can call it nothing else—all of us, indeed, except those who were sitting quite out of range on the other side of the table. It was impossible to believe that it was the outward form and presentment of any thing high or good. It certainly was not angelic; it was not even human. What conclusion, then, is left for us as to its nature but that it was Satanic?

"I may sum up my views by saying that the kind of influence which many people are calling into the very centre of our homes is one which can only be covered by the somewhat broad but most significant term—Demonology."

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

Mr. Gogharty's Opinion of Right and Wrong—Alick Insists upon his Father's Resignation—Micky Haley makes an Appointment with Janie Quinn—She is Informed of the Proposed Ejectment of her Father—Haley flatters her, and makes a Confession—Janie communicates the Bad News to her Master.

Mr. Gogharty tried to evade the full force of the blow which the plain outspoken rebuke of his son dealt to his conscience by suggesting that Alick, instead of absurdly proposing to him the resignation of his post, should have salved over with Mrs. Montaigne the awkward circumstances which had come to the surface, and have used his influence with young Percival to make all things straight. He upbraided him for "his ingratitude and want of filial devotion." "It's really too bad of you, Alick," he cried, angrily and bitterly. "Such conduct is not right before God or man. It's monstrous; for what is not a son bound to do and sacrifice for his father?"

"Every thing, father," said Alick, "but to do violence to conscience, and to fail in duty to righteousness and truth. I know that I am just now a great expense to you, father," he added, "and though the loss of my degree at the university will be a sore disappointment and loss to me, yet of course as now your financial position will be much altered I must give it up. This I am prepared to do to relieve you, but to give my consent to your holding the Percival agency is impossible. After what has occurred it would be most immoral and unjust. And, father, if you will not resign it at my solicitation, though it wound me to the heart to do so, I shall have, as I have intimated, to put the matter in the hands of those who will compel you to this step." "You'll not do that, Alick," said Mr. Gogharty, coaxingly. "No, I'm sure you will not," after a little, he passionately cried. "Why, it would be conduct gross and unnatural; and while it would lead to my ruin, would, I feel, turn my love for you into hate."

"O God!" cried Alick, after more than a minute's pause, "it is hard, very hard, when in this world there is a conflict between the claims of duty and of love, when eternal righteousness says one thing and natural affection, which we are told to cherish, says another. Help me, O my Saviour—becomingly and dutifully, yet firmly and purely to stand by the right, and may I through no human weakness allow mere feeling to betray eternal justice and truth."

After looking upward and thus speaking, he waited a while, as though abiding an answer to his prayer. Mr. Gogharty thought that Alick, conquered by his appeal, was going to relent, and he held out his hand in reconciliation toward him. But no; with a slow and decided yet tender voice, soon afterward the young man said, "Father, I leave the alternative I have spoken before you. I can do nothing else. Either of your own accord resign within three weeks' time, or, sorely against my will, I shall have to take steps to bring about this end. It breaks my heart to say this, father; but I can do nothing else."

He then quietly moved from the apartment, and left his father to his own meditations and resolves. It need scarcely be added that Mr. Gogharty, to avoid greater inconvenience by a hopeless resistance, came to the conclusion that he ought, from policy, to do as his son had dictated, and stoop to a requirement which he still persisted in saying sprang, on Alick's part, not from a conscience enlightened and wise, but one stupid and weak. He placed his resignation of the Percival agency in the proper hands, and by the time that Alick had suggested the whole of its business, so far as so speedy a measure permitted, was transferred to other hands.

It is some time since the name of Micky Haley the piper, one of those who identified Percival in the turf-built Ribbon hall, appeared in our narrative, but in the present chapter he comes again for a little before us. One day, a month or two after the Rev. Jerome Grant's ignominious flight, Janie Quinn was on a message in the town for her mistress, and hearing the "skirling" of bagpipes down a turning from the street, and not having for a long time been favored with the drone and lilt of that music which sets the hearts of "the boys and girls" in Ireland in an enchanting whirl, she stepped to where the musical artist had an admiring throng around him. What tune it was the pipes were discoursing—whether "Patrick's Day," or "Garryowen," or "The Wind that Shakes the Barley," or "Make haste to the Wedding," or whatever else, I cannot say; but certain it is that Janie soon became as entranced as the other listeners and as oblivious of her mistress's commission as could be one of "the seven sleepers."

While standing, with outstretched neck and dancing eye, gazing at Micky and wondering at the magic of his skill, she was surprised that he noticed her particularly and managed quietly to make a sidelong movement toward the place she occupied. When he got rather near her, in a moment it flashed upon her remembrance who he was. Micky had been in former days two or three times at her father's house, but only for a few minutes, so that she had not known him well enough for an immediate recognition on the occasion before us.

He coming quite close to her, she felt disposed to withdraw, not much liking his attentions, but, leaning toward her, he said in an undertone, loud enough to be heard by her but not by others. "Don't be silly, girl. I've for some time wanted to see you, but feared to be seen at the big house. Can you see me when it's dark, at the garden-gate?" And then, perceiving from Janie's look that she had no mind for such an assignation, he added, "It's somethin' about yer father—he's in throuble." Janie, with a start, was about to ask what the trouble was, but Micky Haley said, "Not another word betune us here. Only do as I've bid ye. Mind, at eight o'clock."

Several in the crowd, noticing Micky's behavior, began to chaff him and the object of his attentions. One of the town wits among the vulgar cried out, "Come, Micky, me boy, let the girl alone; and none o' yer coortin' here in the open street. Bedad, ye have as much brass in yer face as a dure-knocker." Janie, at this sally which called forth a peal of laughter, blushed to the eyes and made a rapid retreat. Before she got again into the main street she heard that Haley had changed his music to a slow tune. It was "Home, sweet Home," which he now played, and she had quickness enough to perceive that the piper had done this of design to enforce his imperfect tidings and increase her anxiety and curiosity.

Punctual to the appointed time, Janie was at the place of interview; indeed, she found it difficult to tarry for the mentioned hour; and this though once or twice her maidenly coyness suggested a doubt as to the propriety of meeting Haley. She being of strong natural affection, however, concern for those at home overmastered the dictates of prudence, and so the piper when he appeared found her standing outside the garden-gate, the handle in her hand to keep it closed behind her.

The news he had to convey was that her father was about to be ejected from his farm, and that in a week or two neither he nor her mother would have a roof over their heads. "Ye see," said Micky, "the landlord, Squire Horton, wants to throw all the little farms into big wans so as to make votes, ye ondtherstand, and yer father's houldin' makes wan o' four that's to be thus pitched into wan another. Yer father wanted Squire Horton to let him have the big houldin' when it was made, as his tinant; but, me dear, the Squire knows a trick worth two o' that. He'll do no sich a thing, for he knows yer father's too independiint to be ruled in his votin'."

"But why didn't I get word of this before?" inquired Janie. "Well, yer father didn't want to vex ye, ma cushla, by bad news comin' afore its time. He said, 'There war no use in it, whin you cud do nothin.' I wanted him to ask you to git yer masther to interfere. But you know yer father, Rowley Quinn, wouldn't ask the favor war it to save his life.

"I made up me mind, howsumever, that I wud git ye to insence Mr. Percival into the tyrannical act that's about to be committed; for Rowley Quinn has made the place the worth it is, diggin' and laborin' for years like a slave to turn a mountin' moor into dacent land, and now, widout compinsation to the value of the ghost of a farthin', he's goin' to be put out, to wandher where he loikes. I couldn't stand the seein' o' such dalins upon a dacent and honest man—wan that's always paid his rint, too. So, as I've said, I made up me mind to see ye myself on the bad business, and git ye to put in a word to Mr. Percival about it. I've dodged about here for a week, watchin' the big house there close as cat ever did a mouse-hole, but, purshuin' to me, sorra a glimpse could I git o' yer purty face (and I mane what I say) ontil today."

Janie was quite aware of her good looks—what pretty girl is not?—yet she did not relish Micky Haley's compliments under present circumstances. So she said, rather sharply, "I want none o' yer soft sawder and blarney, sur; and if ye war as concerned as ye say about thim at home, and was so anxious to see me, why in the world didn't ye come like a man to the dure, and not go slinging round any gintleman's house in the way you have talked of?"

"Ah, me jewel," answered Haley, "that's more nor I dare do. And, if ye but knowed all, ye'd agree with me in that same opinion. Why I wanst passed the sintence o' death on yer masther's life, and in his prisence, too, sorra a word of a lie in it. And I think from what ye know of the owld doin's in —— ye'll guess how it cum about. Mr. Percival, wid wan look of his dark eye—and it's a knowin' wan—would spot who I was, and, bedad, in no time he'd have the peelers afther me. No, no, me darlint, I darn't, for the life o' me, be seen at the hall dure, and so was obliged to wait for a chancemeetin'."

At this stage of the conversation steps were heard on the garden walk, and a voice calling Janie; so Haley was forced to decamp, saying hurriedly, "I've done my part as a friend; do you now do yours as a daughter. Tell Mr. Percival what I've tould ye of, and git by his manes justice for yer father."

"Who is that you were talking to?" said Mrs. Montaigne; for being told that Janie had been from the house for some time, feeling a responsibility about the girl, she went herself to see the cause of her absence. Janie had the words "Micky Haley the piper" almost on her lip, but in an instant perceiving how dubious such a name would sound in her mistress's ear, and also bearing in mind Micky's intelligence as to his doings upon "the young masther," she quickly changed her phrase and said that "a friend from —— was giving her some news."

Janie saw that her mistress felt dissatisfied and suspected some inexpedient "goings on" upon her part; so she said, "I have had bad news, mam, and when I get into the house I'll tell you all about it; and I want Mr. Percival to be in the room when I'm tellin' it." This last expression of Janie's sounded unpleasantly upon Mrs. Montaigne's ear. She found it difficult to imagine its import. Several curious surmises rose up in her mind.

All her mother's suspicions and fears were, however, dissipated, when Janie in her young master's presence unfolded the painful tidings concerning dear ones at home which she had received. "But are you sure this bad news is true?" inquired Percival. "Who has brought it to you?" "It is true, sir," replied Janie. "For a reason I can't tell I'll not say who the bringer is, but I am certain as that I stand afore you he has not deceived me."

PERILOUS TIMES IN THESE LAST DAYS.

By the Rev. S. Garratt, M.A., Vicar of St. Margaret's Church, Ipswich, England.

Signs of the Last Days—Perilous Times—Selfishness in Morals—The Form of Godliness—The Grand Motive Power—Outwardness in Religion—Sacramentalism—The Conscience Enslaved at the Confessional—The False Miracle—Deceiving Spirits.

In writing to Timothy, St. Paul gives us a fearful picture of what the state of Christendom shall be in the last days.

By the last days we must understand the times preceding the second appearing of the Lord Jesus; and for this reason the characteristics of the last days are necessarily signs of the second advent.

In the statement that in the last days perilous times shall come, we have a decisive proof that the second coming of the Lord will not be preceded by world-wide holiness and happiness; and that we must not look first for the foretold time when the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea, when the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid—and then for His second advent; but that we must look first for that advent, and then for the millennial glory, since up to His appearing, and even after it, the battle will be raging, for it is in the last days that perilous times shall come.

Let us read the description of these perilous times. "Men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those tha are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers o pleasures more than lovers of God, having form of godliness, but denying the power there of: from such turn away. For of this sort ar they which creep into houses, and lead captiv silly women laden with sins, led away with d vers lusts, ever learning, and never able to com to the knowledge of the truth. Now as Janne and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these als resist the truth; men of corrupt minds, repr bate concerning the faith" (2 Tim. 3 : 2–8).

Here we find certain salient points which ma the moral and religious features of the la times:

SELFISHNESS IN MORALS, outwardness in religion, priestcraft enslaving t conscience, false miracles.

1. Selfishness is the first of these characterist marks, and all that follows—"covetous, boas ers, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to paren unthankful, unholy, without natural affectio truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinen fierce, despisers of those that are good, traito heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasure mo than lovers of God"—all this is in fact includ in that one phrase, "Lovers of their own selve

Man is so selfish naturally that it might se at first sight as though this could not form characteristic of one time more than of anoth It might be said, with great plausibility, th there never was a time when it might not be serted truly that men were lovers of their o selves

But we must remember that the prophecy sumes that in the last days there will be a fo of godliness. It is of persons professing go ness, at all events bearing the Christian na that our text speaks. Of such it might h seemed as though it could hardly be a charac istic mark that they were lovers of their o selves. Unhappily we know too well that s is the corruption of human nature that in full blaze of Gospel light men always have b found to love their own selves, and that noth is and always has been more uncommon than reverse. "All seek their own: not the thi which are Jesus Christ's."

And we must remember further that the in the present state of things that which make this a special characteristic of the da which we live. I do not know that men lly more selfish, but they more unblushingly ow themselves selfish than at any other period earth's history. Is it not the fact that, in this eteenth century, it is everywhere proclaimed at man's self-love is the grand motive-power? not this the doctrine which has leavened our rs, which is supposed to be the life of our mmerce, which has been owned as the su- me law for nations, which is announced as secret of national prosperity and national alth?

And has not this principle of selfishness in- ted everything? The statesman appeals to it, merchant appeals to it, the workman appeals it. In other ages men have been selfish ough. The peculiarity of this age is that sel- ness is looked upon as right, is made avow- y a principle of action; and so far are men m being ashamed of it that they treat any her principle with scorn as enthusiasm and y.

This avowed preference of what is considered ful to what is right—this doctrine, that what an or a nation has to consider is what is most antageous, not what is most righteous—seems me a marvellous fulfilment of the prediction. e lifting the evil into a good, the saying of it at it is the regulator of human actions, the ping of law and commerce and national ac- n in accordance with it, the undisguised asser- n of that as a principle from the accusation of ich men have hitherto shrunk, is a peculiarity this age.

will not stop to speak of the bitter fruits ich grow on this root. They are touched on what follows. Is there one of the catalogue evils which the Apostle enumerates for which present age is not remarkable? In spite of r great material advantages, in spite of our asted knowledge, in spite of much of refine- nt unknown to our forefathers, the voice of allible truth reiterates these words against us, d condemns this nineteenth century for its etousness, its pride, its disobedience, its un- ankfulness, its treachery, its profligacy, its tempt to those that are good, its high-min- dness, its love of pleasure, its utter self-justify- g selfishness.

It is difficult when we stand in a fog to judge ght of the shapes and sizes of things. This kes it hard to speak correctly of the moral aracteristics of the age we live in. But I do t believe the principles of this age or its ten- ncies, at all events many of them, to be those ich God approves. It is deeply stained with e love of money, the love of pleasure, and the e of self, and fulfils the words, "In the last ys perilous times shall come."

2. The second of these great characteristics r all the preceding details are included under at one head, "Men shall be lovers of their n selves") is having a form of godliness, but denying the wer thereof."

The form of godliness is a very good thing. hether it be the "form of sound doctrine," or e "form of sound words," it is a very good ing. We must by no means undervalue it. d where there is the reality of godliness we ve the right to expect the form of it. The tward language of prayer is a part of it. So is e song of thanksgiving. So is the diligent ading of God's Word. So are the Sacraments Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

They are the form of godliness. There are en in every land who have not even this. ey use no prayer, sing no hymns, partake of sacraments, keep outside and aloof from the rship of God's sanctuary. There have been nes when this was habitual, and it has even en known that men in a frenzy of infidelity (as the French Revolution of 1793) have tried to stroy every vestige of the outward form of dliness.

But so it will not be in the last days. Men will me to church, will make many prayers, praises ll duly ascend from their lips, they will be par- kers of the Sacramental signs. If they did not, it could not be said of them that they had the form of godliness.

But while there will be the form, there will not be the power. Men will make prayers, but either their hearts will be far from God, and it will be unacceptable worship, or their hands will be full of blood, there will be the want of moral uprightness, and He will not hear. There are prayers which God hears not, supplications which never reach His throne, because the worship is not that which is from within; and "God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." And in the last days, with much of outward prayer there will be the want of inward prayer. Men will have the form without the power.

But the words imply something more than this. When it is said, "denying the power," more is meant than not having the power. It seems to teach us that in the last days not only in men's practice but in their principles the form of godliness shall take the place of its power. How can that be? What if a man should say that the Sacraments are everything, that the Chsistian life begins, consists, is carried on, terminates, in Sacraments? That has been said, and if that were said generally, it would be the most complete fulfilment possible of the words, "having a form of godliness but denying the power thereof."

So far as sacramentarianism is the principle of the age, so far is there a sign of its being the last time. A man may have the principle in himself. Whatever he calls himself, he may actually rest upon the form and deny the power. He may be satisfied with the form of prayer, though he never really prays; with the singing, with the voice, though his heart never sings; with having been baptized with water, though not baptized with the Holy Ghost; with receiving the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, while destitute of that which it signifies—the feeding upon Christ in his heart with thanksgiving, the daily eating His flesh and blood, and living by faith on the Son of God.

Such a man has the form of godliness, but denies the power thereof. And if this is a characteristic of the times, it marks them as the perilous times which should make us weep, but also as the last times which should make us lift up our heads, because our redemption draweth nigh.

THE CONSCIENCE ENSLAVED.

3. The third characteristic of the last days is priestcraft enslaving the conscience. What else can these words mean? "For of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women, laden with sins, led away with divers lusts, ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." We must not misunderstand the passage, as though women more than men were spoken of. It is a neuter word which is used, and it does not mean that those spoken of are women only. They are called things, and not womanly, but womanish, which is a very different thing; just as childish is a very different thing from childlike.

What is meant is this, that, whether men or women, they are weak. They are said to be "laden with sins, led away with divers lusts, ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." How lovingly would Christ receive such, pardon them, strengthen them, teach them, set them free, if they would go to Him! But we are here taught that it will be characteristic of the last days that men, having the form of godliness, but denying the power thereof, shall, by some secret system of spiritual inquisition, lead them captive and bind them under bondage. They shall take advantage of their weakness, this sickly condition of mind and heart, to gain dominion over the conscience and enslave the soul.

What more accurate description than this could be given of the confessional, whether in the Church of Rome or as practised among Ritualists. It is the trampling down of weak consciences under the pretence of finding a remedy for sin. Men with a form of godliness, but declaring that Christianity consists in Sacraments, lead into bondage "silly women, laden with sins, led away with divers lusts, ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth"—the very men and women whom Christ would set free. They need a Saviour to free them, but a human priest steps in and enslaves them.

4. There is another characteristic of these last days which has not yet made its appearance—the working of false miracles. This is plainly intimated by the reference to Jannes and Jambres. The magicians withstood Moses by power from beneath. What he did by the finger of God they did to a certain extent by their enchantments. So Scripture says, and so I believe. St. Paul expressly says,—"As Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also resist the truth." This sign is yet needed to complete the proof that these are the perilous times and the last days.

I do not myself in the least doubt that Spiritualism is witchcraft, and that, mingled with much human fraud, there is in it that especial sin which is described in Scripture as "dealing with a familiar spirit." It is a matter of much graver import than some imagine. It is carried on in secret, in the bosom of private families, in direct disobedience to the most solemn injunctions of God's Word. Things occur which even by the confession of those engaged in them are in precise accordance with the witchcraft and sorcery of Scripture, for it is freely acknowledged by many of those engaged in these unlawful arts that those who communicate with them are not the spirits of the dead, but spirits who pass themselves off as being such.

It ought not to astonish us to find this sign of the end showing itself. There are indications of a tendency to unite this dreadful sin with a form of godliness. This is what we must expect: we must expect great signs and wonders to deceive, if it were possible, even the elect. And if the amount of power now exercised by evil spirits were coupled with a form of godliness it would be very perilous indeed. It is fraught with great danger to many minds even now, only there is a manifest ungodliness and folly about the whole thing which makes the Christian mind turn away from it in disgust.

Should it ally itself with false but seductive error, it would become a terrible temptation to find men with a religious profession resisting the truth assisted by supernatural agencies, as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses. And when that sorest trial of a Christian man's faith comes, then in that we must see a token that the Lord is at hand.

We are in perilous times, we must watch; we are in the last times, we must hope. We must look, as each fresh sign unfolds itself, with fresh love and longing for that day when Christ will set all things right. To be found then in Him is everything. Let us walk by faith, and fight by faith, and hold fast His truth, and flee from all participation in these characteristic marks, that when He comes we may see His glory, enter into His joy, and be for ever with the Lord.

The Eruption of Mount Etna, the Famous Sicilian volcano, after a period of quiescence lasting fifteen years, is thus described by a visitor. "On May 25th a fissure opened on the north side of the mountain, and dense volumes of smoke were seen to issue from it. From the great crater a vast cloud of fine black ashes was subsequently poured forth, rendering the whole mountain invisible, and obscuring the light of the sun for many miles. This black rain continued for a whole day, loud reports being meanwhile heard from the mountain, and the following night, May 27th, huge fires were seen looming through the clouds. The scene now became awfully sublime: new craters opened in the direction of Randazzo on the north, and from these an immense stream of lava issued, which has gone on increasing since, causing great devastation and alarm, many villages, and even towns, being threatened with destruction, besides Mojo, which has been destroyed."

CURRENT EVENTS.

Congress Finally Adjourned on Tuesday July 1st, having failed to effect any compromise with the President on the question of the United States Marshals' Bill. No provision has therefore been made for the payment of those officers. The President sent a message June 30th vetoing the bill, in which $600,000 was appropriated for the purpose, pointing out that the stipulations included in the bill were of the same character as those which had obliged him to veto the Judicial Appropriation Bill, of which it originally formed a part. He urged Congress to pass the Appropriation freed from political riders. Republicans in the Senate and the House introduced a bill complying with the President's request, but it was lost, the Republican and National members voting for, and the Democrats against, the measure. An attempt to pass the original bill over the veto by a two thirds vote also failed. It is thought the Marshals will continue to perform their duties, receiving the fees to which they are entitled, and trusting to receive their salaries by a deficiency bill in the next session. The only important change made by Congress in the revenue laws is the removal of the duty on quinine, which was passed in the last hours of the session.

The wise caution and discrimination of the Chaplain displayed in his prayer at the closing session meets with general approval. The Chaplain returned thanks that the House had been safely brought to the closing labors of the session, and asked the blessing of the Lord upon all the measures which have been wisely and prudently adopted.

The Political Issue Underlying the Minor Questions of the Army Bill, and appropriations for the Marshals, Deputy Marshals, and Supervisors of Elections ought to be clearly understood by every citizen. It is a distinct issue, and the difference between the two political parties is a radical one. The question is, Are the elections for Congress a State or a National matter? Democrats say that members of Congress are State officers, and the conduct of their elections concerns their respective States alone. Republicans say that members of Congress are National officers, and that it is the duty of the nation to see that their elections are conducted honestly, fairly, and free from intimidation. A free and fair election is—or ought to be—the desire of every citizen; now, who is the best protector of the voter's rights and of the box in which he deposits his ballot? Is the State or the National Executive the more trustworthy guardian of elections? That is the question at issue: The voter must think it out and decide, for that question will be the test question at the next election.

Sunday Excursions Ought to be Made the subject of protest by every Christian pulpit and every Christian press. The crowded steamers which week by week leave the piers of New York, and other great cities of the Union, show how large a proportion of our countrymen spend the Lord's day in frivolous pleasure. The plea is uniformly urged in justification of these excursions that the exhausting nature of business in these days of keen competition necessitates relaxation once a week to invigorate the overstrained energies of body and mind. But in addition to the moral and religious aspect of the subject there are physical objections to the practice. The excursions do not have the beneficial effect with which they are credited. Any one who may witness the return of an excursion steamer cannot fail to remark the weary, tired, listless appearance of the passengers even when there is no evidence of dissipation or the signs of a day's free indulgence in intoxicating liquor and tobacco. The excursionist is often less fitted for the labors of the week than the man who has attended church, and spent three or four hours in the close atmosphere of a Sunday-school. It generally happens that he who seeks to benefit his body at the expense of his soul injuries both in the attempt.

The Fourth of July has been Celebrated this year after the fashion which has obtained during the past quarter of a century. About the usual number of casualties from fireworks, pistol shots, etc., have been reported, with the customary loss of life and limb. But there is nothing sensible or patriotic in that mode of celebrating Independence Day. That will be a hopeful day for the country when earnest, intelligent, patriotic Christians celebrate the anniversary by abandoning their present attitude of indifference to politics, and take an active part in the government of the nation. The spirit of the Fathers of the Nation speaks to them on this anniversary, urging them to take their proper place in the front rank, and, at any cost of personal ease and comfort, see to it that the government is conducted in accordance with the principles of righteousness. The Union has been governed long enough by men who have made politics a profession—a profession they have adopted not to serve their country and advance her interest, but as a means of pushing their own private fortunes and furthering their ambitious schemes. The Christian citizen has duties to perform which he owes to his own conscience, his country, the memory of his fathers, and to his God, and he cannot neglect those duties with impunity.

Dr. Talmage in London.—The New York Herald publishes the following cable dispatch describing Dr. Talmage's second Sunday in London: "The Rev. Dr. T. De Witt Talmage preached at Agricultural Hall this afternoon (July 6th) to two congregations of twenty thousand people each. Thousands upon thousands of persons thronged the streets leading to the hall for miles, almost blockading the passage of vehicles and pedestrians. Many people were crushed, and Dr. Talmage's carriage was almost demolished by the crush of the great crowd, every individual in which was anxious to see the distinguished American preacher. His presence here is creating a furor through Great Britain."

The American Arctic Expedition which is expected to set sail in search of the Norh Pole this week is the subject of general interest at home and abroad. The expedition is a private enterprise, but by special acts of Congress the vessel (which is named the Jeannette) is manned by officers of the United States Navy, and allowed all the rights and privileges of a government ship. Her course, too, will be different from that hitherto taken by any vessel designed for a voyage of scientific exploration. All other expeditions in search of the open Polar Sea have been by way of Baffin's Bay. The Jeannette will be the first vessel to pass Behring Strait on a purely explorative voyage toward the North Pole. There have been several previous voyages to the Arctic by this route, but the object in these instances was the discovery of Sir John Franklin and not the exploration of an unknown portion of the globe.

The Jeannette is commanded by Lieutenant De Long; she is ably officered and manned, and her equipment is as complete as science perfected by experience can make it. Her crew consists of eighteen men "between twenty-five and thirty-five years of age, without a spot or blemish or immoral habits." The men chosen for this work were selected from over a thousan applicants, and are thought to have the courage and other necessary mental qualities as well a perfect physical health. All the world will follow the Jeannette with sincere wishes for a successful voyage and a safe return.

Discontent Prevails Among English Catholic and loud complaints are being made to Rome Bishop Amherst has resigned the See of Northampton, ostensibly on plea of ill health, bu really on account of the despotic conduct of Cardinal Manning. Men who have been Roma Catholics from their youth are elbowed out i favor of converts, by whom all the bishopri are gradually being filled, and many of the me thus appointed are of inferior capacity. A priest is removable at the will of his Bishop, ar years of service confer no privilege. The resu is a widespread disgust. Father Law, an em nent oratorian, has left the priesthood; Fath Roberts, a relative of Dr. Manning, has becor sick of petty tyranny, and taken a wife; anoth Westminster priest has gone on the stage. It asserted that the intellectual standard of the r ing generation of the clergy is being lower And in consequence the Cardinal is intens unpopular.

The peace and unity of the Roman Cath Church has always been vaunted by proselytiz priests in contrast to the divisions of the P testant Church, but it would appear that e uniformity does not produce harmony.

A Sunday-School Cut Out of the Earth.— invitation to preach was recently sent fi Nebraska to a missionary, who sends the foll ing account of the congregation and the r in which they meet: "After a long se along the bluffs, I found the school-house, a in the hillside with a roof of poles suppor brush and covered with prairie sod. A g congregation was waiting, and I was told th large part of them had never been in a mee before. The room had no floor but earth, as the walls and roof were earth, I thou truly we are of the earth, earthy. The lamp had no chimney, and the smoky room emblematical of their moral darkness. It v strange gathering in a strange place—a b ning from which I expect much good. The tlement is eight years old, composed large Catholics and infidels. A Catholic mother 'I wish we had a Catholic meeting; but have not, I will go to the Sunday-school my children.'"

A Strange Impediment to Marriag—A young lady named Margot, born at Manito Long Island, in 1851, recently went to Gerr where a young German gentleman fell i with her and was accepted. The marriag arranged, and about to be solemnized, wl strange obstacle turned up. The young had no certificate of her birth or baptism, German law holds indispensable to a lega riage. The clergyman who baptized her i being sought by advertisement in the Am papers. Miss Margot and her lover were sa of the fact of her birth, but the former ne less determined to fulfil the law and hunt man who could certify that she actually wa and did not grow like Topsy.

Three Thousand Converts is the Noble Record of the Gospel Temperance work at the Berean Baptist Church, New York. The campaign has lasted twenty-two weeks, and has been so quietly and unostentatiously conducted that few persons besides those engaged and those whom it was sought to benefit knew of it. Not only have the large number mentioned signed the pledge, but a large proportion of them have been brought to Jesus, including some of the most depraved classes of the city. Simultaneously with the evening meetings a daily noon prayer-meeting was conducted, and resulted in much profit to immortal souls. Then, as an outgrowth of the prayer-meeting, a daily Bible class for the study of the Scriptures met four days in the week.

The Reformation of a Drunken Husband.—Among the many happy results of the work at the Berean Church related by the pastor, the Rev. John Quincey Adams, is the following incident, which shows the value of united prayer. A lady came into our noon prayer-meeting one day, her face red with weeping, and implored us to pray for her husband. "Oh, pray for him," she urged. "I want to see him a sober and respectable man again." The brethren present besought the God of all mercy to pity the unhappy man. That night the husband was induced to come to the meeting. In less than two weeks he signed the pledge. That man has since been one of the most faithful and indefatigable workers. Another case is that of a poor unfortunate man who had sunk so low, and was so bereft of hope, as deliberately to start out from his wretched abode in order to drown himself. However, God had not forsaken him. He was persuaded to come to listen to one of our temperance friends, and the Divine Spirit directed the word spoken to his heart. That would-be suicide has since taken the pledge, has been savingly converted, and has received Christian baptism.

A Brave Rescue.—A Mail Train was Speeding from Riverhead to Greenport, L. I., on June 23, and when near Jamesport the engineer saw a child asleep on the track. He blew the whistle, but failed to wake the little one. The locomotive was reversed and the steam brakes were applied, but the train swept swiftly toward the child, who did not move. John Jones, the fireman, was on the front of the engine, busy with his oil can: he instantly made up his mind what to do. Dropping the oil can, he ran forward and swung himself down upon the pilot. Thrusting his left foot between the bars of the pilot he rested on his knee, and, bending forward, was able to reach a little in advance. In this position he waited until the locomotive rushed upon the child. With a tremendous effort Jones clutched the little one, raised it from the ties, and swung it clear of the pilot. Taking the child in his arms, he remained in his dangerous position until the train was stopped.

The passengers, who had seen the child from the car windows, alighted, and loud cheers were given for the brave fireman, who modestly pushed out of the throng and mounted to his place in the tender. A Methodist minister in the train invoked a Divine blessing on the head of the fireman.

Miss Frances Ridley Havergal, so Well known as a writer of religious poetry and prose, died on June 3d, aged forty-two, at Caswell Bay, near Swansea, Great Britain, after a few days' illness, arising from a cold taken, it is thought, in going to talk to some poor sailors out of doors.

She was one of the editors of a hymn and tune book, entitled "Songs of Grace and Glory," to which she contributed many hymns and tunes. She also published two small volumes of religious and miscellaneous poetry, "The Ministry of Song" and "Under the Surface." These, with her devotional meditations, "My King," "The Royal Commandments," "The Royal Bounty," etc., have obtained a very wide circulation in England, and have been reissued in this country. She was deeply interested in many philanthropic works, which she aided with her time and pen. A large and handsome volume comprising selections from her former publications was brought out in this city last winter, under the title "Life Mosaic."

She was wonderfully happy, conscious to the last, and sang a verse of a hymn, "Jesus, I will Trust Thee, Trust Thee with my Soul," and exclaimed, "So beautiful to go!" just before she passed away. She suffered much pain. She said, "I am going to see the King in His beauty."

Mr. Sankey writes: "How glad I am that I went to see her. She was ready for the kingdom, and had not far to go. Some of her last words to me, just before leaving, were, 'What a glorious day it will be when we all get home! What a time of joy we shall have, after seeing the King, to see our loved ones, and our heavenly Father's children—so many of those whom we could never see on earth! We shall enjoy so much seeing them there.'" She was buried at Worcester on June 10th.

Twenty-Three Years in a Chair.—A Lesson of patience may be learned by a visit to a quiet residence in Lewiston, Maine, where a Christian gentleman may be found who has passed the last twenty-three years of his life a helpless invalid in his chair. Injured in a school-boy's game at the age of twelve, spinal disease set in, and soon he lost all use of his arms and limbs, and even of his head. His eyes and his tongue are the only members he has not lost control of, and his well-worn Bible on the shelf of the chair he has occupied day and night for twenty three years tells how he spends his time. One who visited him recently writes:

"A visit to this gentleman is a lesson for a lifetime. The man who imagines that all creation is at swords' points with himself will feel happier after a call on Mr. Rankins. 'No one but God and myself know what I suffer,' said he, 'but I guess I am about as happy as they make 'em. I don't believe that time passes more rapidly with a school-boy than with me. I have a great many visitors every day, and my friends include a good part of the population of Lewiston. Sunday visitors to the cemetery frequently call upon me. Sometimes they sing with me, and they used to hold prayer-meetings in my room. When my acquaintances get low spirited or in trouble and need advice, they come to me. I have leisure to think and plan for them, and they seek my counsel. Some day, I shall be as well off as the rest of you. My lot is to sit in this chair, and I would not get out until it was God's will. Some friends once called on me and asked my consent to hold a special prayer-meeting to pray for my recovery. I told them I was willing that they should pray that I might get well if it was God's pleasure.'"

That Picture Put it into My Head."—These were the words of an Aldershot soldier, who in 1869, in a fit of anger, shot his corporal who had offended him. He had been reading a newspaper which illustrates the crimes of the week, and which contained a picture of the shooting at Devonport of another corporal by a soldier a few weeks previously. The Rev. Lloyd Jones, Ordinary of Newgate, in his Reports, which contain this fact, also states that many respectable youths get imprisoned through embezzlement resulting from reading pernicious literature and frequenting music-halls and dancing-rooms.

The Will of The Late Pope has been made the subject of dispute between the legatees and the executors. Pius IX. left two-thirds of his private property to his relatives. Not content with receiving the interest of the bequest, they desire to get possession of the capital, and an important legal action is likely to grow out of the matter. Three Cardinals were made executors, and the efforts of Leo XIII. to mediate between the contestants have thus far come to naught. Surely if the Pope is competent to declare the meaning and intention of biblical truth, his reading of an ordinary will should be accepted as final by the faithful. It looks as if the Roman Catholics had no more faith in Papal Infallibility than Protestants have.

GREATER THINGS YET. WHO SHALL SEE THEM?

A New Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"Jesus answered and said unto him, Because I said unto thee, I saw thee under the fig tree, believest thou? thou shalt see greater things than these. And he saith unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man."—John i: 50, 51.

"Come and See," the Sure Cure for Unbelief—Christ's First Personal Promise—I. Characteristics of the Favored Man—He is an Honest Truth-seeker—Does not Invent Difficulties—Yields Readily to the Force of Truth--Believes much on Evidence of one Assured Fact—II. His Reward—His Faith Rewarded with Sight—With Discovery—With a Clearer View of the Godhead—With the Special Favor of God—III. The Special Sight Promised Nathanael—He Should See Heaven Opened—Actual Intercourse—Descending Angels—A new Enterprise Commenced in Faith.

We cannot help making a few remarks upon the narrative before we proceed to the distinct subject of discourse. Certain catch words are exceedingly worthy of notice, since they are abundantly full of instruction. When Nathanael had doubts as to whether the Messiah could come from Nazareth, Philip answered him, "Come and see." Now, those were the precise words which the Lord Jesus had Himself used to His earliest disciples when they began to follow Him: He also said to them, "Come and see."

It is always safe for us to use over again words which God has blessed. Did the Master say, "Come and see?" Then we cannot do better than say what Jesus said, and use as near as possible the inspired expressions. Was that short sentence, "Come and see," made useful to other souls? Then those who would win souls cannot do better than use such gospel nets as have been tried and proved efficient in their own cases. Let none of us say that we cannot speak to others about their souls. There was one passage of Scripture which was the means of our conversion, and we cannot do better than repeat it in hearty tones to others, hoping that what God has blessed to us He may bless to others.

Short as was the inviting word, "Come and see," it was full of wisdom. Our Lord knows the philosophy of the human mind, and understands how best to produce faith in doubting hearts. "Come and see" is

THE SURE CURE FOR UNBELIEF.

Some would tell doubters to sit down and think, and create faith by reflecting on the nature of things. We may long consider the state of man and the condition of our own nature before we shall thereby be enlightened as to the way of salvation. If we would judge of Christ we must consider Christ Himself. He is His own best argument. The cobweb spinnings of conceited brains are easily broken through, but the facts, the indisputable facts of the Saviour's life and death hold the understanding and the heart as with iron bonds. As our Saviour said, and as His servant Philip said, even so say we to all who would know Christ, "Come and see." Be not blinded by prejudices or misled by preconceptions, but read His story for yourselves. Seek His face for yourselves, and taste and see that the Lord is good.

Personal interourse with Jesus is still the best evidence of His personal excellence and His power to save. Brother, hast thou any doubt about the Master? "Come and see." Dost thou say within thyself, "Can He save such an one as I am?" "Come and see." Do thy sins cast thee down and cause thee to despair because thou fearest that even the Redeemer's blood cannot cleanse thee? "Come and see," for nothing will save a man but a personal sight of a personal Saviour. Therefore, "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." The Lord Himself saith, "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth.'

Our Lord Jesus Christ seems so to have approved the advice of Philip that He Himself followed it up, and kept to the same form of expression. Did Philip say, "Come and see?" Then the Lord Jesus says, "Before that Philip called thee, when thou wast under the fig tree, I saw thee: thou hast come to see Me, but I have already seen thee: there has been an antecedent look on my part: I saw thee before thou didst know any thing about Me, or hadst even heard of Me from Philip." Nor does our Lord change His note even to the end of the conversation, but closes it by saying, "Because I said unto Thee, I saw Thee under the fig tree, believest thou? thou shalt see greater things than these."

There, you see, is the great plan of salvation as it is wrought in us. First the Saviour sees us, even when we are a great way off; then we come and see, and our hearts find rest in our Redeemer; and then in after days He gives us yet brighter and clearer views of Himself and of His kingdom. Oh, who would not come and see if this be so? If at our first coming and seeing we find life and rest, what must those still greater things be which are yet to be revealed? All that faith has yet discovered is but a foretaste and an earnest of more glorious sights which shall yet be opened up before our favored eyes, for Jesus Himself saith, "Thou shalt see greater things than these."

With those prefatory remarks we come at length to consider the promise of our Lord Jesus to Nathanael. May the Holy Spirit instruct us thereby. I think I am warranted in saying that this is the Saviour's first personal word of promise, and it is instructive that He gave it, not to the most talented, but to the most simple-hearted of His disciples. It was, moreover, no mean promise, but full of the largest conceivable meanings. "Thou shalt see greater things than these." Those must be very great things which were greater than what Nathanael had seen already; there is room for boundless expectation in the words.

In considering the words which our Saviour spake to Nathanael, I should like you to notice first, the favored man to whom He spake them; then the gracious reward which is described in them, and lastly, the special sight comprised in that reward. In all this may we be actual partakers, and not mere lookers on.

I. Let us think of

THIS FAVORED MAN.

Nathanael was "an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile." He was one of those who were not only of the chosen seed after the flesh, but after the Spirit. He was noted for being a simple-minded, unsophisticated person, as honest as the day. He was a truthful man, who knew nothing of policy, or craft, or double dealing, or reserve; a man out of whom all the twists had been taken, an upright and downright man, true to the core, and transparent as clear glass! Not a Jacobite, a child of the crafty supplanter, but an Israelite, an Israelite indeed, with the Jacob extracted out of him; pure, simple-hearted, ingenuous; not childish, but yet thoroughly childlike. To such a man the word was given, "Thou shalt see greater things than these."

Notice, first, that he was a man who honestly made inquiries which fairly suggested themselves. Before he became a believer he did not as some do, invent doubt and raise questions, which questions are merely raised for question's sake. He did not put queries to Philip which he could have answered himself, nor seek to entangle his instructor by artful speech. Nothing of the sort. He sought truth, not controversy and word-chopping. The two questions which He put came out of his heart, and were points which seemed to him to be vital.

He was told that the Messiah had been found, and that he was Jesus of Nazareth. I doubt not he was well acquainted with Holy Writ, and he did not recollect any text in which the Christ was said to come out of Nazareth, and therefore he thought within himself, "I read of Bethlehem Ephratah that out of it shall He come forth who is to be ruler in Israel, but I do not remember a word concerning Nazareth." Without a moment's hesitation, he put the question, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" It was a poor, miserable little place, of unsavory reputation. This, then, was a difficulty, a true and real difficulty, and he stated it, and was content to "come and see."

When the Saviour met him with the words, "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile," he inquired, "Whence knowest Thou me?" A most natural question to ask, for on its answer would depend the value of the words. Might it not happen that this accurate description of Himself might have come to Jesus by report? If a correct description of Nathanael's character had reached the Saviour by Philip or any other friend, then it did not prove any thing; but if Jesus knew it by His own perception, and could read the character of a man to whom he was a stranger, then Nathanael knew what conclusion to draw. So he only asks the question because it ought to be asked, and does not lie upon the catch.

How I love to meet with seekers who, though they are in difficulties, are willing to be led out of them, and are not studying how to invent more! Some of you cannot find peace in Christ because you wilfully darken the atmosphere around yourselves; you are not assailed by doubt, but you invite doubt to assail you. You believe a great deal more than you like to own to; but do not want to believe, and are fishing for excuses for your unbelief. It is a sad state of mind for a man to be in to be trying to discover reasons why He should not be saved, but that is what many are doing.

Some men are too intellectual to believe the poor man's gospel, the run and read gospel, the gospel of "Believe and live;" they must needs be mystified, or excited, or driven to despair, or else they refuse to believe. There is a craving in some men for something that will appal them and fill them with despair. Is not this folly? Wait not for such sensations, I pray you. If you do, you will miss the blessing; but if, even while as yet you have not received full faith, you are honest enough to admit of none but honest difficulties, there is in you some good thing toward the Lord God of Israel, and the Lord be praised for it.

This Nathanael without guile was, next, a man who honestly yielded to the force of truth. Omniscience was proved to be an attribute of Christ to Nathanael by the pointed remark which Jesus addressed to him. What was Nathanael doing under the fig tree? I may not profess to know, but it was an important movement to his own mind, and he remembered it as such.

As soon as Jesus said, with a look, "When thou wast under the fig tree," Nathanael was startled into a conviction that his secret heart was known to Jesus. Under that tree he had done, or said, or thought a something known only to himself. How had the person before him known of that deed? It was true that his deed, or word, or thought under the fig tree was a pure, simple, and honest one, but how did Jesus know? "If He knows that I was under the fig tree, and knows what I was doing there, then He is the Son of God, the King of Israel." This was Nathanael's immediate conclusion, and the argument was very clear and complete. Similar reasoning was used by others soon after Nathanael's conversion, and with the same result.

When our Lord said to the woman of Samaria, "Go, call thy husband, and come hither," and she replied, "I have no husband," he answered, "Thou hast well said, I have no husband: for thou hast had five husbands; and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband: in that saidst thou truly." Then the woman said, "Come, see a man, which told me all things that ever I did: is not this the Christ?" It was good argument, for omniscience proves Godhead. An omniscient one here in human flesh among the sons of men must be the Anointed of God: He must be the Lord's Christ. Nathanael therefore argued: "He saw me when nobody else did; He read my character in a simple act, an act which other people might have misunderstood, and thought me a fool for it: He perceived the uprightness of my heart, and now I know that He is certainly divine."

Notice, further, the blessing of our text comes to a man who in simple honesty believes much upon the evidence of one assured fact. It is proven that Christ can see in secret and read men's hearts; and from this, in addition to his divinity, Nathanael infers that "He is a great teacher," and he makes his first confession of faith by calling Him "Rabbi." He is sure that He who knows all things is worthy to be a teacher, and he gives Him the teacher's title.

Then, as we have already said, He perceives that if He be omniscient He is divine, and He makes the confession, "Thou art the Son of God;" and, not satisfied with that, he sees that if He be indeed the Son of God, He must be Ruler and Lord, and therefore he calls Him the King of Israel.

Gladly does Nathanael submit himself to the Son, and proclaim Him King of Israel. Was not this the first time that our Lord had been actually proclaimed as King since He had come into His public ministry? Was not this the answer to the wise men's question when they followed his star from regions far remote? Here was He who was born King of the Jews. This guileless man, who seemed to lack in shrewdness, had seen more than his fellows; his eye undimmed by falsehood or suspicion had seen the King, though His humiliation had unclothed Him of His royal mantle, and taken off His crown.

See then, beloved, the gist of our first head is this:

IT IS THE PURE IN HEART THAT SHALL SEE GOD.

We must be honest and sincere; we must be clear of all subtlety and craft; we must be transparent as glass before Him, or else the Lord will not reveal Himself to us or by us. He loves the guileless and the true, and when He has made our eye single He will fill us with light but not till then.

Note, again, that those who are ready to believe upon sure evidence—for Nathanael wante that—are the men who shall see more and mor Nathanael did not require the evidence to be repeated to Him again and again. He saw th argument at once, and yielded Himself to i When a point is once proved it is proved, an there is an end of it. One conclusive argumer is as good as twenty to an unsophisticated min Those who are willing to see shall see.

Heaven is open to those from whose eyes th scales of prejudice are removed. The Lord ma ifests Himself to those who manifest themselv to Him. If you will be Christians of the highe type you must be true to the core, and you mu realize Christ and believe in Him with th mighty faith which sees Him, and realizes Hi as close at hand. The presence and the pow of Jesus must be undoubted by your soul, must be as much a matter of fact to you as yo own existence, and yours shall be the wo which we are now about to consider—"Th shalt see greater things than these."

II. Let us now look at

THE REWARD.

Only a few words upon it. Because this si ple-hearted man had believed upon the one ar ment of the Lord's discernment of his heart was favored with the promise of seeing grea things. By these words our Lord meant t his perceptions would become more vivid. lievest thou? thou shalt see. If we demand see first we shall never believe; but if we are w ing to believe we shall by and by see.

There is a growth in faith which renders it the less faith, and yet approximates it more more nearly to sense. I mean "sense" in best signification—so that what at first we lieve, simply upon the testimony of God, come by and by to believe upon personal exp ence. We believe until we so realize the ob of faith that we look at the things which are seen and see Him who is invisible. From we go further still, until we both taste and h dle of the good word of life, and faith beco the substance of things hoped for. From lkto Christ we come to live, and move, and e our being in Him.

he eye of faith gathers strength. At first it s Christ through its tears, and that look saves soul, though it perceives comparatively little Him; but in after days the eye of faith be- e so powerful that it emulates that of the le, which can gaze upon the sun at midday. is faith becomes a second sight. Remember Lord's words to Martha, "Said I not unto e, that if thou wouldst believe thou shouldst the glory of God?" "Believest Thou? u shalt see."

his was not all our Lord's meaning. He vir- lly promised that Nathanael should discover r truths than he as yet knew. "Thou shalt greater things than these." Now, what is re greater to be seen than the omniscience of ist? Yes, so the Saviour says. I suppose means this: First, as thou hast seen mine niscience in thine own case thou shalt go on ee it in the case of all mankind, for by my ss shall the thoughts of many hearts be re- led, and by My gospel shall men be revealed o themselves.

le would see "greater things," next, because would see more of the Godhead. Didst thou omniscience? Thou shalt see omnipotence. st thou discover that I could read thine rt? Thou shalt learn that I can change thy rt. Didst thou find that My eye could glance the secret of thy soul? Thou shalt find my d casting out devils, and healing the sick, hushing the tempests. Thou shalt see rer ensigns of my Godhead than this one ex- ment in the reading of the heart.

he Lord, in calling Himself the Son of man s up to Nathanael one of those greater gs. He had perceived Him to be the Son of l by His reading his heart, and it was a great g to perceive the Godhead, but it was a great- wonder still to see that Godhead linked with nanity. Jesus, as Son of God, is glorious, as at the same time Son of man He hath a ble glory. Our Lord seemed to say to Na- nael, "Thou hast believed that I am the Son God, thou shalt see the Son of man." And his a greater thing?

n one sense it is a descent for Jesus to be the of man, but yet you who know how to read riddle aright will say that the Godhead is not f so wonderful in itself alone as when it comes e united with our humanity. The incarnation about it a mystery which is not seen even in mystery of the Godhead. That there should a God heathens might spell out, but that this d should come in human flesh among us— is the mystery which angels desired to look o. Nor may I forget that the idea of our rd as King of Israel is not so great as His nection with all nations, which is displayed His title Son of man. He is not confined in His ce to Israel, as Nathanael probably thought, He is brother to our entire humanity. Here s another of the greater things.

ote further, that Nathanael had only seen an ened heart, but now he was to see an opened ven. He had seen Christ's eye entering into secrets, but he was now to see communica- ns established between the lowly hearts of n and the secrets of heaven. He saw how rist, as Son of God, dwelt among men; he ow to see how the abodes of God and man ll be blended in one, and high communion intained between earth and heaven.

come back to the one thought, that the sight greater things is reserved for guileless believers. those who already have much by faith more ll be given. Faith makes a man a fit instru- nt for God to use, and hence God does great ngs by Him. If you are unbelieving God will more use you than a warrior would use a reed a weapon. He works no wonders by unbe- ving ministers and unbelieving churches, for se are not prepared to be blest; they are not ssels fit for the Master's use; rust is upon m of the worst kind. When your heart is rest- in the Lord, expecting to see His arm made re, and quietly waiting to see how He will glorify Himself and fulfil His promise, then will you see greater things. Strong faith coupled with a guileless character brings a man into the special, complacent love of God; for, albeit that He loves all His elect, He does not delight in all alike. There were apostles among the disciples; there were three choice ones out of the twelve: there was one peculiar favorite out of the three. He is dearest to God who trusts Him most completely, and is most childlike and true.

God will do most by that man who is most reliant upon Him, and most open with Him. David, who makes the Lord alone to be his confidence, is the man after God's own heart, and Abraham, who in faith could even give up his only son, is the friend of God. We shall never be full-grown with God until we become too little to dare to doubt, too insignificant to venture to question, too true to suspect the Lord. Increase in faith is the one thing needful to our advance in the divine life and work, and may the Holy Ghost work it in us for Christ's sake.

III. We have only a minute or two in which to mention which was promised to Nathanael. He was to see an opened heaven. The gates of glory are not only opened now to believers, but they are carried right away, and heaven is laid open to all its citizens, even to those who dwell below. This is a great joy to the believing heart, for free intercourse with heaven is the delight of our spirit.

In Christ the saints are brought very near to God, for even now they have come to the heavenly Jerusalem. The franchise of the new Jerusalem is extended to these low-lying regions in which we sojourn. The veil is rent, and we have access to the holiest; the wall of separation is removed, and now the abode of the church below is an adjunct of heaven, a suburban district of the metropolitan city of the New Jerusalem. The gates shall not be shut, nor a division created, nor intercourse suspended henceforth. Is not that a glorious thing, that in the person of Christ Jesus heaven is laid open to earth, and earth laid open to communications with heaven. Do you know that, beloved? It is a simple thing to talk of, but do you know it? Have you taken up your citizenship, so that you can say, "Truly our citizenship is in heaven?"

Then the Lord went on to promise that he should see that the intercourse between heaven and earth by the way of the Mediator is not only possible, but actual. The ladder is set, and there are angels ascending and descending upon it. God does hear, and help, and speak with believing men of pure heart.

Observe that, according to the text, the angels ascend first. It does not say, "Descending and ascending," as we might naturally suppose, but they ascend first, because when Jesus was on earth they were here already, and ascended at His bidding to carry His upward messages. When Jesus Christ was here He was never without His bodyguard of angels, and these were His messengers to the courts above. We, to-day, beloved, are surrounded by the forces of the Eternal: they have not to come to us for the first time; lo, they have these many years kept watch and ward around the fold of the redeemed; and when a new danger comes they are prompt to do the part of watchers and of guardians, and to carry tidings to the sentinels of heaven.

Let us pray, for as we pray our prayers ascend to heaven, and our praises too. If we lead an angelical life our thoughts will always be going up to heaven, or returning thence. Some of God's people do not know much about this. Praying is a religious exercise with them, a very proper exercise, but it is not speaking with God; it is not doing business with God, and obtaining supplies at His hands. It is a ladder without angels, or, if you please, with ascending angels only, but none coming down with heavenly gifts.

Beloved, I hope you have not fallen into this error. What, is not prayer real with you? Do you expect nothing from it? Would you send

AN ANGEL ON A FOOL'S ERRAND?

Do these ascend to heaven in mere sport, and rush up and down to do nothing? Let us mean business when we pray, or we shall be mockers of the divine majesty. Too many come before God and ask for every thing in general but nothing in particular, and they get but scant answers to their pointless prayers. Many more are very slack in prayer, and hence they starve their souls. Many angels must go up if many are to come down. Prayer must be constant and real with us. We should live as if we really had power with God, as if like Elias we could go to the top of Carmel and pray a brazen heaven away and deluge the earth with showers of blessings. Are you unable so to live? then the fault lies at your own door.

What was next? Nathanael was to see angels descending upon the Son of man; that is to say, he was to see heavenly spirits and blessings coming down to man by Jesus Christ. He who truly believes in Christ, and is without guile, shall have continual succors from on high: all heaven shall be opened to him. God will help him by providence, will help him by grace, will help him by actual angels, and will help him spiritually by the all power which He has given unto Christ in heaven and in earth.

How earnestly do I desire that this church this morning may see for itself what my eyes have seen for myself: for my faith sees heaven opened to supply the needs of Christ's work, and all the might of God working to achieve his purposes. I am just entering upon another work for God.* We have had enough of these enterprises, say some, why not wait? I am forced to go forward and onward; I must go, nor do I fear, for lo, I see heaven opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending, by the way of Christ Jesus, to bring us succor. We may venture. There is no venture in it—we may trust God for any thing, we may trust God for everything, and just go straight on.

It looks like walking the waters sometimes to trust Christ, especially about gold and silver; but we need not fear; the waters shall be a sea of glass beneath our feet if we can but simply trust. But oh, we must purge ourselves, we must be without guile, there must be no self-seeking; there must be a simple-hearted desire for God's glory, and for nothing else; we must sink self, and Christ must reign, and then we must trust and go forward. I hope we are right in this matter, and if so, we shall see the salvation of God. Nothing can stop us.

Brace yourselves up, my brethren, for a new endeavor. Be strong in the Lord and ye shall see greater thing than these. Full of weakness, yet stand ye in His strength each one, and play the man. Say, "I can do all things through Christ that strengtheneth me." Omnipotence is waiting to gird your loins. Buckle it about you, and become mighty through God. Our Head, Christ Jesus, hath all power in heaven and in earth, and that power He pours into all His members. By faith I commit myself, and I trust, also, my beloved church and friends, to further efforts for our Lord, relying upon His word, "Thou shalt see greater things than these," and fully believing that through Christ Jesus all the forces of heaven are in alliance with us, and the will of the Lord shall surely be accomplished.

MR. J. B. GOUGH'S LATEST ADDRESS AT SANDGATE.

The Perplexed Young Lady—A New Coat—Fifty Years, What a Change!—Stars for the White Man and Stripes for the Black—Signing the Charter of Freedom—Model Ladies and Gentlemen—Mr. Gough and his Soldier Father—The Colonel of his Father's Regiment—Lady Darnley and Mrs. Gough.

In fulfilment of our promise, we present to our readers a report of Mr. Gough's address in reply to the toast of his health, which was proposed by Mr. Pledge, of the Sandgate Local Board of Health, who also presented an album of views to him.

Mr. Gough on rising was received with loud applause, and said :—

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen :—If any of you have been placed in a similar position to that which I am now in, you will know how embarrassing it must be. It is very difficult for any person to talk about himself. It is very difficult to receive a gift—a public presentation of a gift such as this—for you don't know what to say. You are afraid of saying too much, and you are afraid of saying too little, and the position is one of extreme difficulty.

I remember once to have made up my mind never, if possible, to deliver an address in reply to an address ; for I was once asked to receive an address and a flag presented by a young lady to a grand association in the streets of Philadelphia. They had a flag all ready to raise upon a flagstaff, and the moment this flag was presented to me I was to give it to a gentleman, he was to run it up the post, and the band was to strike up "Our Flag is There." Instead of having a gentleman to present it to the lady, they put it in her arms, and it was a great roll of bunting.

No wonder the poor girl (she was not over eighteen years of age) forgot her speech which she had committed to memory, and when she turned to me she said, "Sir,"— (a pause). "Sir," —— (another pause). "Sir," —— (a third pause). "Sir" (abruptly), here's the flag." And I said, "Madam, I will have the flag, and (aside to the band) strike up, 'Our Flag is There, as soon as possible." (Laughter.)

So it is difficult to make a speech in reply to a speech, and it is very difficult to receive a gift in this way. You will excuse me if I take it pleasantly. If I didn't, I should be broken down, for the flood of recollections pouring in upon me is a little too much for me, and might otherwise gain the mastery over me.

I remember once, in Coburg in Canada, I made a gesture in one of my speeches and ripped my coat from the bottom up to my arm, and when I heard the rip and felt the thing go my wits went wool-gathering. I could make no more gestures in that speech, and I was glad when it was over. The mayor of the city sat behind me, and he with a deputation called the next day and brought a tailor and measured me for a new coat. I was staying there a few days, and one day a waiter came up and said a number of gentlemen wanted to see me in the parlor. I found a number of them assembled when I got there, and one of them got up and made a speech, and wound up by presenting me with a coat. Now what could you say in reply to a speech like that? All I could say was, "Well, gentlemen, if I had known that this would have been the result of tearing my coat, I would have torn my other garments as well?" (Laughter.)

You will excuse me, sir, if I take this thing pleasantly, but I assure you, ladies and gentlemen, in this my native village, if you could see all that is passing in my heart you would know that there was something more than levity there. You would know that there was a deep sense of gratitude to those who have so kindly welcomed me back to my native village.

Fifty years! What a change has fifty years wrought! Mr. Pledge said that I noticed a change. He says the changes are improvements ; but I should like to see the old place just as it was for an hour, for you know that if you felt any love for a girl with a wart on her nose, and you should be separated from her, you would miss that wart. (Laughter.) Whatever may be the improvements, I should like to see the old place again. But what a change! Why, you young people cannot understand it. Why, when I lived here as a boy we used to use the flint and steel to obtain a light.

I remember my mother getting up in the dark. "Where is that tinder-box?" And when she had got it there would be a click, click ; and often when she had knocked the skin half off her hand and bruised her knuckles she would get the spark. And then there were those matches loaded with brimstone, and you had to stoop and sneeze, and cough, and a little blue flame would come out, and you would blow, and after a few minutes you would get a light.

Now we take a little convenience out of our waistcoat pocket and get a light at once. That is a very small matter, but that friction-match is one of the most important contrivances that the last half-century has known. And take it from the friction-match all the way up—the social improvements, the improvements in our treatment of the insane, in our treatment of the prisoner, in our educational system—improvements everywhere, all over the world.

When I was here in 1854, slavery was the blot on the escutcheon of my adopted country. You told us that we had stars for the white man and stripes for the black, and we penitently acknowledged the truth of what you said, and although it was in blood, and fire, and smoke, and flame, yet, in the Providence of God, slavery has been annihilated for ever from the soil of the United States, and there is no slave in Anglo-Saxondom on the face of the earth. (Cheers.)

There has been a great change in the people even. I cannot recognize a face. I have looked anxiously as I have walked the streets, if I could recognize some one that I had seen before, but they are all strange to me ; and then there is a sadness comes over you as you think of your being almost alone even amongst your friends—isolated and alone, but, thanks to your kindness, not altogether forgotten or unhonored. (Cheers.) And now let me say a word or two about myself, although I will not give you any thing of my own history, which is well known to you. From the time I left home until this hour—what a history!

For the first few years it was struggle, hard struggle, hard battle. Up to the age of twenty-five my life had been one scene of almost unmitigated privation. I had struggled alone. I had struggled single-handed, and I had indulged in dissipation that was the cause of so much of the dishonor attached to my name for seven years of my life. On the last Sunday night in October, 1842, nearly thirty-seven years ago, I put my name on the total abstinence pledge. It was the charter of my freedom.

When I started from Sandgate—and I say this because I see so many young men here—fifty years ago, I had fifty years of life before me. Now, those fifty years of life are behind me, and in all those years I have never spoken a word, or written a line, or done a deed that I could change to save my soul. It is my record. You, young men, some of you, are starting, and are beginning to write your record. Some of you are twenty-one years of age, and you have begun to write your record—record of manhood.

Are there no spots or stains upon it to-day? If there are, do you mean to go on like that till you are sixty? I tell you if you do you will understand what regret and remorse mean. The great difficulty with young men, as it was with me, is just this—a resistance to the rightful authority from a false idea of independence.

I asked a man once, "Why won't you sign the temperance pledge?" "Because I won't sign away my liberty."—"What liberty?" "Liberty to do as I please." That is not liberty. A man who does as he pleases, independent of moral, physical, and Divine law, is the meanest slave that walks God's footstool. He is a slave to his own lusts, to his own passions, to his own ambitions, to his own wicked desires. There is no true liberty but in steadfast obedience t righteous law, and how many young men the are just as I was, who suppose they can brea this law with impunity!

You can't violate a physical law to save t universe, and do you suppose that God's mor law you can twist and turn just to suit your ov vagaries and whims with no penalty? You men say that they can enjoy life, and sow th wild oats. "Young men will be young men," is said. Well, we want them to be young me We don't want old heads on young shoulde They have no right there. I believe in seei young men full of life and energy with the you blood coursing through their veins. I like see young men with a jolly laugh, and min together with innocent recreation. I enjoy it

What we want young men to be is gentlem What is a gentleman? A true gentlemen is ble, chivalric, truthful, pure in speech and life ; and a man that is not pure in speech life is not a gentlemen, I care not who he He may have a genealogy as long as that boas of by the Irishman who said that his ancest were independent of Mr. Noah, for at the del they saved themselves in a boat of their construction. (Laughter.) A true gentlema awful to all bad men and lovely to all g men. But people have strange ideas of wha gentlemanly and what ladylike.

A woman brought before the police court n istrate said, "Me and another lady was a ha of a few words ; she called me an 'hindiwid and I up with a pail of water and chucke over her."

There was a notice put over a waxwork e bition, "No lady or gentleman will be admi in a state of intoxication." (Laughter.) W I was in St. Louis, I saw a handbill on the w "One hundred rats to be killed by one do twenty minutes. None but gentlemen mitted." (Laughter.)

I saw in a newspaper that two men who c themselves gentlemen were brought up for profane and abominable language in the str These are not gentlemen ; I don't care who are, what their birth may be, or what their cation may be, they are not gentlemen. (Che Why, amongst the very poorest we find the elements of the gentleman.

A poor fellow who carried round letters, "We letter-carriers are not always the welcome of visitors. I have carried a lett a door, and as I have handed it to the la have seen her frame quiver as she took it turn away when she observed the black On such an occasion I always takes off my She don't see it ; it don't do her no good I always feels a little better for lifting my h such an occasion." (Cheers.) Now, that of the elements of a true gentleman. (Che

There are some to whom excess of indiffe is the height of good breeding. Educat man into the insensibility of a post, an make him a perfect gentleman. Cultivat heart out of a young woman and make pulseless as a painted doll, and she is a l perfection. Now, we want every young n be a gentleman—to be a true gentleman— best and happiest sense of the term. Ther I say, I don't want to see old heads on shoulders.

We want our young men to have vig elasticity, but we want it all consecrate high purpose—the high purpose of maki world better for their having lived in it. this may be so in the case of every one for you all exert an influence in some di or another. We talk about such and such being little things. There are no things look at them rightly, that are little, for t exert some influence either for good or fo

I am not here, however, to give you a or a speech, but we want to have a socia I am exceedingly glad to meet so many townspeople, and some friends from neigh towns and villages. If it be possible to place large enough, I should like to h Sandgate come, and I will speak to them vo hours and try to do them some good be- I leave. I mber going to see him when he was in ncliffe, and putting his cap on my head, h then was no longer visible, for it com- ly covered it.

ittle incident occurred to me, showing me the true English gentleman really is. You the difference—almost immeasurable—be- a private soldier and a colonel, in this try. It is not so with us. A private here not go up to a colonel with impunity, slap on the back, and say, "Old fellow, what you have to drink?" Why, when I ad- ed one of your regiments—the 19th or 20th, k—and they wished to present me with an ss, they could not do it save through their el.

ll, the incident is this. I was once enter- d by a gentleman, a colonel, whose lady was ress in her own right, and after the lecture I was like a round stick in a square hole. ever, I managed to get along very well at inner. After the lecture, a gentleman said, ave been given to understand, Mr. Gough, your father was in the army?" "Yes, sir." what regiment?" "He was in the 40th, also in the 52d." "What year was he in 2d?" "He was in the 52d at the siege of joz, and I think he was at Talavera and at anca with the 52d." "Was he ever at cliffe with the 52d?" "Either with the r the 40th, because I went to see him, and w he was at Shorncliffe. He got acquaint- th my mother when he was at Shorncliffe, hey were married." Then he said, "I was father's colonel. I'm right glad to see a f my old soldier. What rank was your r?" "A private soldier, sir."

Vell, I am very glad to welcome to my the son of one of my old soldiers of the egiment, and I hope you will make your- erfectly at home. Here, my dear," he said, g his wife, "Mr. Gough is the son of one y old soldiers. I am happy to introduce o Lady So-and-so." That was a perfect men of the English gentleman. He didn't my father being a private soldier, because s a gentleman. Had he been a snob, he have said, "Haw, yes!" and walked (Hear, hear, and cheers).

ere are gentlemen and there are snobs. A eman in London said, "If Mr. Gough goes ndgate, and tells them his father was a an, they won't think so much of him." man must be a snob. Now, I say, I care hat may be a man's birth if he stands be- he public as a man, and shows the record work, and that that work has been worthy nan. If he can do that, give him the credit ing a man. (Cheers.) I have a great re- for the soldiers, and I am glad to see some em here. I believe that they are as pure a ard of men as you can find on the face of arth.

Some will say, in thinking about this presentation, "He's not half thankful enough." Others will say, "He's a little too gushing." If I go too far on the other extreme they will say that I am spooney. I don't know which I would rather be called, ungrateful or spooney, but I wish to say from my heart of hearts I have to thank you for this manifestation of your good will. As I said this morning to some gentlemen from London, "It will be a sad day for me, for I shall think of my mother—my dear mother." Everybody in Sandgate that knew Ma'am Gough loved her. They respected her.

Lady Darnley, who lived on the hill yonder, used to employ my mother in lace work. She respected her, too. I remember my mother coming home and leaning her face upon the table, and crying as if her heart would break. And what was it for? She had done some work for Lady Darnley and taken it up and asked her in her timidity if five shillings would be too much, and the lady said, "Would ten shillings be too little?"—and it nearly broke her heart. That little thing from one of your nobility to a poor woman was remembered in America, and told to her children as something to be treasured up, and I have always had a profound respect for the name of Darnley wherever I have seen it.

A lady of title wrote to me and said, "My father, the Earl of So-and-so, owns property in Sandgate, and he wants to see the gentleman who made his little girl a teetotaler;" so that there have been some very pleasant things connected with my visit, though there are others that have been sad. My dear mother, I know very well, could not have lived to see this day, or she would have been 103 years of age; but I think of her, of the place where she is so free from all sorrow, and all pain, and all anxiety. I thank God that I had a mother who was a God-fearing woman, and I believe that the influence of that mother went with me even through the dark days of my dissipation.

Let me then say with all my heart, I thank you for your kindness and for your courtesy to me, and for this reception, which, when originally proposed to me, was far beyond my wildest dreams. I merely supposed I should come here and in a quiet way do what I could for the advancement of your Coffee Tavern. Thank you, from my heart, for all your courtesy and all your kindness.

WATCHERS FOR THE DAY-STAR.

THE words "until the day dawn and the day-star arise" (2 Pet. 1 : 19), as referring to Christ's second coming, imply that it is night now. And so it is, comparatively speaking. The Scriptures speak of our dead as "those that sleep in Jesus." But "they that sleep, sleep in the night;" and until the sainted sleepers hear the voice of the Master, as He comes to awaken them out of sleep, the morning will not begin.

Yes, it is night yet, compared with the millennial day about to dawn. It is night as yet, while the sun of our life is behind the cloud. It is night as yet, while the shadows of sin and wickedness stretch their gloomy pall across the earth. And as I hear the Master saying to me, "Feed the flock of God over which the Holy Ghost hath made you minister," I know that I am a shepherd, keeping watch over my "flock by night." But this is not all. I, for one, am watching the day-star. I am looking to catch the gleams of its coming glory. And I should count myself worthy of the severest rebuke of my Lord if, coming suddenly, He should find me sleeping.

Upon the pinnacle of the temple in Jerusalem a watchman used to be stationed, who was to keep his eye upon the eastern horizon, and at the first gleam of sunrise was to give the signal to those below, that they might commence the morning worship. Jewish writers tell us that for the watchman to have gone to sleep would have been such an offence that he would have instantly been degraded from his office, the penalty in such cases being that the watchman should be stripped of his garments, and those garments burned with fire. "I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem," says God, by the mouth of Isaiah. "Behold, I come as a thief," says Jesus in the Apocalypse; "blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments." For one I am determined not to be beguiled into sleep or silence by the words of the worldly-wise, who incredulously ask, "Where are the signs of His coming?"

Nor do I believe that the coming can be long delayed. All the promises seem to be ripening. The signs are rapidly fulfilling. The clock of time seems just ready to peal out the hour of morning watch, and I feel that I have no right to shut my eyes to the signs of the dawn. And, as standing in my watch-tower in the Christian pulpit, you shout up to me, "Watchman, what of the night?" you will hear no other answer than this: "The morning cometh, and also the night"—the morning of resurrection glory to all God's saints; the night of outer darkness to such as are found in unbelief.

In the rapid spread of the Gospel among all nations, and in the pouring out of God's Spirit upon all flesh, I see the tokens of the morning. In the rapid growth of infidelity, in the daring blasphemies of Antichrist, I see the most unmistakable signs of approaching night. And so to you who are weeping by new-made graves, where the darkness of death hovers; to you who are sometimes appalled and affrighted at the unchecked ravages of sin and wickedness in the world, I repeat the inspiring words of Paul, "The night is far spent, the day is at hand." And to you who would save souls from sinking into the shades of endless night, I would repeat those other words of Christ Himself, "Work while it is day, for the night cometh when no man can work."

But you may say, objecting, "The majority of people do not agree with you in regard to the possible nearness of the morning." But that is no objection. The majority of the Jews had no idea of the nearness of Christ's first coming when it occurred. Only a few eyes recognized the star in the East when it appeared. Only a few out of the great throng of Hebrew worshippers had any apprehension of the wondrous event that was occurring.

"When came in flesh the incarnate Word
The heedless world slept on;
And only simple shepherds heard
That God had sent His Son."

And Christ gives us intimation after intimation that it will be precisely so with his second advent, that comparatively few will be looking for it, that the great mass will be astonished and overwhelmed by its suddenness.

And therefore he says, "Watch ye, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh!"

The Death of Mr. Robert Crawshay, of Cyfartha Castle, Merthyr Tydfil, known as the "Iron King of Wales," is reported. He died at Cheltenham, from bronchitis. He was unique both as an iron-master and employer, his position amongst his men partaking of the patriarchal system until the last great strike, when, after fair warning to his men not to persist in their demands, he decided upon closing his great ironworks, which have never since been reopened. He had long been stone deaf, and for some years has spent much of his time in horticulture, photography, and angling. His wife, Mrs. Robert Crawshay, is known as a practical philanthropist, the founder of an institution of lady helps.

An American Church in Afghanistan has flourished for a long time, notwithstanding the disturbed state of the country. It is close to the Ameer's Palace in Cabul, and during all the civil changes which have occurred and the war waged against the Ameer by the British the services in the church have never been interrupted. The number of members was at one time considerable, and though at present somewhat reduced, it is thought that with return of peace the work of the Lord in the church will revive.

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

.LIFE'S BITTERNESS AND JOY.

TRUE religion does not decay under persecution, active or indirect, and so it was at Eureka House. The taunts and sneers of her uncle only drove Edith to more constant and earnest prayer; she clung yet more closely to her religion, because it was all that was left to cheer her lonely heart.

For Edith felt terribly lonely in the house of her learned uncle, far more so than she had felt in her lodging, for there she had friends near her, though chiefly amongst the poor. At Eureka House there was not a single person with whom Miss Temple could exchange thoughts on themes which to her were of highest interest. There was no one who loved what she loved, no one who cared for the things for which she so greatly cared.

Edith had very little of what would to her have been a pleasant occupation — visiting amongst the poor—for she was not strong enough often to reach the distant village on foot, and though Mr. Vernon kept a riding horse he had not even a pony-carriage. Nor had Edith time to do much more than attend to her household duties, after giving many hours to reading aloud to Mr. Vernon, and writing to his dictation.

Edith in vain tried to take some pleasure in these literary occupations so as not to regard them in the light of an irksome task. The lady was not particularly clever, and had no deep knowledge of science. Mr. Vernon at first attempted to make his companion enter with the interest felt by himself into learned inquiries on the polarization of light, the antiquity of fossils, the combinations of acids and alkalies, and other subjects as deep. But Edith did not understand many of her uncle's explanations, and was too honest to pretend that she did so.

Miss Temple had the moral courage to own herself stupid, though in what regarded household matters she was by no means either ignorant or dull, and her knowledge of spiritual things as far exceeded Vernon's as his knowledge of science did that of his niece.

The philosopher now chose to treat his companion as if she were scarcely possessed of more intelligence than was the pen with which she so patiently wrote. "Stupid as a mule, and as obstinate," was what Vernon repeatedly called the much-enduring woman, whose faith he could not shake. Eidth bore meekly, for conscience's sake, the contempt which was shown towards her—chiefly on account of her religion. But the lady felt keenly the taunts which she did not resent, and often thought with longing of that quiet resting-place where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest.

Family prayer at Eureka House was of course out of the question. Edith would have been happier if she had been able to work more directly for her Great Master, but it seemed to her as if she could do next to nothing to benefit the souls of others.

To the two servant-maids employed at the House, Miss Temple spoke separately on the subject of religion; the one listened and thanked the lady; the other was silent, but showed by her looks that she wondered what business Miss Temple had to meddle with other people's concerns.

There was one member of her uncle's household to whom Edith had never as yet spoken a serious word, or lent a religious book. This person was Alec Stewart. Edith had, it must be owned, taken an unjust prejudice against her uncle's man-servant.

The lady did not like Alec's gruff manner: no one ever did like it; his appearance also was against him; the shaggy eyebrows, which looked like ragged tow overshadowing features hard and stern, gave an unpleasant and almost savage expression to the old butler's face. Edith had an idea that Alec helped his master in making cruel experiments upon poor live creatures; the idea was unjust, but not unnatural. Edith, who would not have given needless pain to a fly, regarded cruelty with horror. If anything could have made so gentle a woman severe, it would have been indignation at causeless suffering being inflicted upon the helpless. Edith was not faultless, and certainly her harsh judgment of Alec Stewart was a fault.

Enough has now been said to show that Eureka House was no heaven to its lady, and that Edith's lot was very different indeed from that of Effie Campbell the favorite of the village, and the darling of the man whom she loved.

In truth, at that time Effie seemed to have all that her heart could wish. The honest, faithful love of a man's heart was lavished upon her, and she felt all the joy and confidence of a happy bride. Robert had secured the opportunity for which so many of his class wait their life through without getting—the opportunity of working for himself. The lot of the English farm laborer is so hopeless that he may be excused for the apathy and indolence with which he is charged. In very few districts in Britain at the present time does he receive more than $2.50 per week, out of which, besides providing food and clothing for himself and his family, he has to pay rent for his cottage. With such an income he has no prospect but to struggle with poverty all his life, and, when his strength fails, obtain a wretched support from the parish funds. No wonder that Robert eagerly seized the opportunity offered him of working a farm for his own benefit.

The day fixed for the wedding at last arrived, and Effie's popularity in the village, and the general respect felt for Robert Holland as an honest, hard-working young man, combined to make the ceremony a festive occasion. The rough but sincere congratulations and good wishes of the villagers were heartily tendered, and, according to the English custom, almost every family in the way to the little church sent out one of their number as the wedding party passed to throw a handful of rice after them "for luck."

The simple ceremony over, the bride duly kissed by the clergyman, the party repaired to the house of the bride's brother, Willie Campbell, who insisted on finishing the affair in the orthodox manner with a homely dinner, to which invitations had been issued to the friends of the couple. The festivities over, Effie and Robert sallied off arm in arm to their pretty English home.

And truly the place, as seen in that cheerful light, looked one of the prettiest farms to be found in merry England. Gable-ends and fanciful chimneys, beams that crossed the brickwork, level, upright, and slanting, gave a picturesque appearance to the house, much heightened by the creeping plants that half smothered the porch, and climbed up as high, and higher, than the upper windows.

The house was pretty within as well as without. A good deal had been done in the way of whitewashing and new papering by Robert, who had spared no trouble to make the place fit for his bride. The young farmer had worked early and late, and done almost everything with his own hands, so of course Effie thought that nothing could have been better done. There was so much to admire, so much to praise. Effie ran about the house and farm like a butterfly fluttering in sunshine, delighting her fond husband by her enjoyment of all.

There was nothing which Effie did not admire; even the pigs, in her eyes were beauties; and as for the cows, how handsome they were, how sleek their skins, and how sweet their breath! The poultry were Effie's special delight, the waddling Cochins and sprightly bantams. Visions of numberless plump little downy chickens and ducklings rose before the farmer's young wife. Effie was not sure whether on some future Christmas day even a turkey from her own poultry yard might not figure upon Robert's table.

And then the trees—the orchard trees—all crusted over with blossom, Effie clapped he hands like a child with delight when she looke upon them.

"Oh! how we shall feast upon apples, m own rosy apples," she cried, "and have plent besides to give away to our friends! I will sen off a hamper, that I will, to the household a Lady Ethel's; they shall see what apples m farm can produce! and another big basketf shall go to the poor old folk at the Union."

"Softly, Effie, softly," laughed Robert, a fir specimen of an English farmer—strong, manl and with a face rosy with health, and brig with good humor. "Those apples of yours, we get them, must help to pay the tithes and t taxes."

"We'll have plenty for everything and f everybody," said Effie; "just look at the tho sands of blossoms!"

"But not one in ten of them will become ripe apple," said her more experienced husban

"What a happy life is that of a farmer!" claimed the young wife.

"Yes," replied Robert, "if he can keep do the couch-grass, and the mildew don't get in his wheat, or the grub into his turnips. But I do my best, darling, to make my farm thri and to make you happy."

"It will be easy enough to do the last, ev if wheat and turnips should fail," said young wife, looking up fondly at the handso sunburnt face of her husband. "I shall alw be happy while you are beside me, and now shall never be parted."

One of Effie's amusements during the f days of her married life was arranging the roo of her house. She had so many pretty thi for which to find places, and had such pleas in showing her taste. Effie's own room was its owner's partial eyes, prettier than L Ethel's in London.

"Such a lovely rosebud pattern all over wall, and such a charming view from the dow!" cried Effie as she finished decorating little oval looking-glass with pink bows white muslin. "The roses will peep in, I (as soon as roses are out on this climber) like to look over the orchard, and see yo beautiful wooded hills!"

Mrs. Cross had not yet come to Salem; was paying a visit to relations at some dist from Ashley, a considerate arrangement w gave the young couple time to settle down their home.

Effie by no means forgot her expected lo The young mistress of Salem resolved that Cross should never have cause to complain, took care to have everything comfortable i apartment designed for her guest.

"I think that Mrs. Cross's room is almo nice as my own," observed Effie, when sh fastened a snowy muslin curtain across window. "It is a pity, perhaps, that sh look out on the stable-yard and the pig but Mrs. Cross has lived as a farmer's w long that she is not likely to mind it. It rather amuse her to watch what is going the yard. What can I do to make this prettier still?"

Effie glanced around with a critical "Ah! a happy thought! there should be ture hung on that blank bit of wall, just site to the bed. I'll fasten up the print Uncle Alec gave me, and the pretty tex beneath it. The bright gilt frame will mak picture look exceedingly handsome, and I care myself to have that doleful scene l my eyes, nor to have that solemn LOVE NO WORLD constantly reminding me of serious when I am so young and happy."

Had Effie forgotten the little volume of prayers, or the advice of Miss Temple? she had forgotten neither; she had even, t shyly, ventured to speak on the subject to ert Holland. The young man listene smiled; the idea of having regular famil ship was somethng new to the farmer; the been nothing of the kind in his early home, the house where he had for years been a l

" I do not see how we could have prayers in he morning, for I must be up with the lark, mongst my potatoes and mangel-wurzel," said Robert. "As for the evening—well, we'll hink about it, my pet, when we get a little nore settled down."

Here the matter dropped ; one evening passed fter another, and nothing more was said on the ubject of praying together. Effie had lost the irst, the best opportunity of beginning wedded ife in the way most likely to bring a blessing ipon it. At that time her husband would have lenied her nothing on which he saw that her ieart was really set. Every day that passed nade it more difficult to begin a practice which hould have been begun from the first.

Effie was exceedingly happy ; her cup of earthly oy was full to overflowing. The first little drop of bitterness that mingled with its sweetness ame from a very trifling cause, at least so it appeared to Effie.

Robert had engaged a laborer, Tom Hunt, whose cottage stood near the farm, to work nder him for weekly wages. Mary, the laborr's wife, was to help in the dairy, and do the ougher part of the housework. Most of the leaning, however, and all the cooking, Effie took n herself.

She knew that her husband was far from rich, nd that if a young couple would thrive, the wife nust work as well as the husband. Effie was uite willing to work, and sang as blithely as she wept the parlor, or filled the kettle, as when she ripped through the garden to see if blossoms vere out on the strawberry beds.

Unhappily, in the present time, cooking is far oo much neglected in the education of girls. Effie had learned many things at school, but she ad not learned how to roast mutton or boil a otato, and, as lady's maid at Lady Ethel's, she ad had no opportunity of gaining such useful nowledge.

All that Effie knew of culinary art she had earned of her sister-in-law before Willie Campell and his wife had started for New Zealand. Effie was a little vain of the quickness ith which she had picked up knowledge, and as so much accustomed to please that she had o great fears of failure when for the first time e cooked her husband's dinner.

It was a little mortification to Effie to see obert sticking his fork into the meat on his ate, and turning the morsel round and looking t it in a criticising way.

" I say, Effie, my pet, was there a cookery-ook amongst those three-and-forty wedding resents which you were counting up this morning?" asked the jovial young farmer. " To my nind it would have been of more use than three en-wipers, five book-markers, or even your retty pink necktie."

" I'm sorry that you don't like your dinner ; I id my best," said Effie, the color rising to her heeks.

" You see, pet, that Mrs. Cole (I lodged with he Coles) was a capital cook ; if you'd given er a pair of old boots to stew, she'd have managed to make them savory and tender. Nellie ole would never have spoiled good mutton like his."

Effie then learned a truth, which became every ay more clear to her mind, that her husband, artial as he was to his young wife, could yet nd fault with things which she did. Clever as ffie was, both with her fingers and brain, she ad no special taste or talent for cooking, and obert, at first gayly, and then gravely enough, riticised some of her dishes.

Effie also gradually found out that Robert himlf was not quite so faultless as she had chosen think him. The farmer was very fond of his fe, but he was also very fond of a good dinner ; at was a fact which could not be questioned. ating and drinking were to the young farmer a ery important part of the business of life. Robt had been accustomed to self-indulgence ; he orked hard, and thought that he had a right fare well.

CHRISTIAN LOVE.

S. S. Lesson for July 20th.—1. Cor. 13.—Golden Text, verse 13. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR subject begins by declaring how love is above all other grace, all other gift. " Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity " (i.e. love). " I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal,"—powerless, meaningless. The Corinthian church was enriched by Jesus Christ " in all utterance and in all knowledge " (1 Cor. 1 : 5). Tongues they had, and prophecy they had, and knowledge also, but, " whether there be prophecies, they shall fail ; whether there be tongues, they shall cease ; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away "; it is only love which " never faileth," and this was wanting in the Corinthian church.

In the primitive Church as described in Acts 2 : 42-47, 4 : 32-35, it is twice said that those early Christians had all things common—they did not seek their own ; for there was great grace upon them all. Then, while love bound them together, they " that believed were of one heart and of one soul." The power of this bond of love was so great that sin could not exist in their midst, and the first instance of self-seeking, in the case of Ananias and Sapphira, and which they covered with untruth, met with such a terrible judgment that " fear came upon all the church, and upon as many as heard these things " (Acts 5 : 11) ; so that those whose purpose was not thoroughly sincere, and who were not out and out, durst not join themselves to them (Acts 5 : 13). The work of grace was so great that multitudes were added to the Lord, and the sick were brought also in multitudes to the apostles, and " they were healed every one"

After breathing the air of heaven in this glorious description, how one's heart sickens when one reads of the first descent from this position of power and honor because of grace ; when, in the beginning of chap. 6 : 1, we hear of a murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews, because their widows were neglected in the daily ministration. Oh, it is sadly clear that they were no longer of one heart and of one soul, and that they had ceased to have all things in common, and that the great grace of which we read was no longer on them all. Was it faith which lacked, or hope, or knowledge?—no, it was the love which " never faileth."

The apostle compares not only ordinary but extraordinary faith with love : " Though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not love, I am nothing." Faith lays hold of, appropriates, or, so to speak, utilizes God ; but love is God dwelling in us and we in Him. Thus he continues, " And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor " (which may be an act of faith alone or an act of love), and though I give my body to be burned, and have not love, it profiteth me nothing." Immense sacrifices may be made at the shrine of our own self-love and self-esteem. There is at the bottom of our natural hearts a craving for recompense of some kind, the gratitude of others, the esteem of others, etc. ; and this is the exact reverse of all which God calls love. Our Lord Himself teaches us (Luke 14 : 12-14) not to invite to a feast our friends, kinsmen, brethren, or rich neighbors, " lest they also bid thee again and a recompense be made thee." Love neither desires nor seeks for recompense. Human love is like a capital to be traded with in order to produce more, but God's love is like a stream from an inexhaustible source.

Love suffereth long and is still kind, because its source does not depend upon the return made, for love asks for nothing, but accepts all. Love envieth not, for love has learned this lesson, " In lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves " (Phil. 2 : 3). We cannot be glad at heart about the prosperity, spiritual or otherwise, of others, and continue to envy them. And because it does not look on its own things, but " also on the things of others " (Phil. 2 : 4), love " vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly." Real love embraces both God and man. How can we vaunt ourselves, even by a thought, without robbing God of His glory, and preferring ourselves to Him? How can we be puffed up without discouraging those who esteem themselves to be not as much advanced as we are, and who for that very reason are, perhaps, far in advance of us.

Then love " seeketh not her own," and this is why it is " not easily provoked." Because Paul could say in truth, " I am crucified with Christ," then, when the Holy Ghost witnessed in every city that bonds and afflictions abode him, instead of being easily provoked, he could testify, " None of these things move me " (Acts 20 : 24). How should he be provoked at that which he had accepted as his vocation? Thus, when in every synagogue during his long journeys he was cast out and persecuted, instead of being provoked against his people, we hear him saying, " I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart : for I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh."

And love " thinketh no evil," i.e., is childlike and above suspicion. The child of God who suspects the motives of action in another has never come into the light of Divine love. When God reveals to us the faults of others as he revealed Saul's sin to Samuel (1 Sam. 15 : 10, 11), then, instead of rejoicing in the iniquity of others that oneself may gain advantage by the contrast, as is often the case with those who know not God, the heart is opened as was Samuel's, to interceed for the guilty. And love " rejoiceth in the truth ;" truth in all ways—the truth of God, and also the truth about ourselves. When there is real love to God, it is a joy to discover our faults and shortcomings, that our loving Father may be no longer grieved by them.

Then love " beareth all things ;" there is no fretting against the yoke ; all which is received in the confidence of love from the hands of God is easily borne ; there is no choosing of what is easy and rejecting of what is difficult—all comes alike to one who sees God in every thing. Not seeing or taking knowledge of the person or thing by which suffering comes, it becomes always a closer link with God. Then love " believeth all things." The love which trusts God is ready to trust man also, and the trust begets trust. In trusting, in the Name of God, those whom no one else trusts—the morally fallen and degraded—a loving heart inspires new hope and confidence. And thus also love " hopeth all things." Looking at every person and every thing in relation not to themselves but to God, how can they but hope for those whom God has so loved as to give His only Son to die for? They who dwell in love dwell in God, and see all things in His light, and thus their faith and hope for themselves and others is in God. And love " endureth," or remaineth under, all things.

Love " never faileth ;" it " casteth out fear, because fear hath torment " (1 John 4 : 18). Love is strong as death. " Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it " (Cant. 8 : 6, 7). Thus the love of God can overcome the death of lost souls. Because God is Love, love is omnipotent. Much of our powerlessness with Sunday scholars, the members of our Bible classes, etc., comes from a self-seeking spirit, the self-renouncing love of God is not mighty in us to cast out fear in them, to inspire them with confidence in Him, nor powerful to overcome the spiritual death in them.

The apostle shows us that love is the only possible perfection. " We know in part and we prophesy in part, but when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away." He esteems it (ver. 11) the only possible manhood in Christ. Again, love brings all things to the light. " Now we see through a glass, darkly " (in an enigma) ; " but then " (when that which is perfect is come, when we are filled with love) " face to face : now I know in part, but then shall I know even as also I am known."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The British War in Zululand.—Cetewayo, the king of the Zulus, has sent two more messengers to the British commander asking for terms of peace. According to latest reports, the messengers had been sent back with a message that Cetewayo must give proofs of his sincerity, such as the surrendering of the two cannon captured at Isandula and the giving of hostages, and also sending a Zulu regiment to the British camp to lay down their arms as proof of submission. Lord Chelmsford has informed Sir Bartle Frere that, pending Cetewayo's answer, there would be no military operations. When Cetewayo had given the proofs required a cessation of hostilities would be ordered pending the discussion of final terms of peace. The English government, on the 20th of March, sent a dispatch to Lord Chelmsford and Sir Bartle Frere setting forth the basis on which peace must be negotiated.

The campaign from first to last has been a series of blunders, and by this time it is probable the English are as anxious for peace as the Zulus. Dr. Robert Moffat, than whom no one is better informed on whatever concerns that part of the world, says that "Mission work aii over South Africa has been thrown back fifty years by the present war with the Zulus."

A Disclaimer from Prince Napoleon.—It is understood that Prince Jerome Napoleon, after the funeral of the Prince Imperial, will publish a manifesto urging all Bonapartists to submit to the Republic, and stating that he has already assured President Grevy that he will not become a pretender to the Imperial throne.

The International Lessons Have at Last been adopted by the Wesleyan Sunday-School Society of England, which hitherto has followed a course of its own.

The Prince Imperial's Remains Arrived at Madeira en route for England July 4th. Sir Bartle Frere and Lady Frere, and all the officials of the colony, were present. Imposing religious ceremonies were held over the remains of the Prince by the Catholic Bishop, and Queen Victoria has commanded that the troop ship Orontes, bearing the body of the Prince Imperial, shall be escorted on a part of her voyage by the Channel fleet. There will be a public funeral, at which the Prince of Wales and other members of the Royal Family will attend.

It is proposed to raise a memorial to the late Prince in England, and a subscription for the purpose has been commenced. The Duke of Cambridge, Commander-in-Chief of the British army, heads a committee of army officers to superintend the movement. General Lord Napier, of Magdala, and nearly all the best known generals of the army, are members of the committee.

The Prince's death has called forth from all quarters expressions of sorrow, and testimonies to his worth and the blamelessness of his life and character.

The South American War Continues to Keep the South Pacific Coast in a state of alarm. Peru feels the loss of her great iron-clad, the Independencia, and retains her fleet securely at anchor in Callao. Chili has resumed the blockade of Iquique, and contemplates landing 12,000 men on the Peruvian coast, whence they are to march on Lima. There has been a general call to arms in that city.

Colliery Disaster in Scotland.—There was a colliery explosion at the High Blantyre pit, near Glasgow, on July 3d. Thirty-one persons were in the pit. Twenty-three corpses have been recovered, and it is known that four of the victims were burned alive. This is one of the most dangerous of the British coal mines.

Prince Bismarck and the Pope are Reported to have made a compromise which seems likely to settle the long-pending conflict between Germany and the Vatican. A dispatch from Rome says: "A special convention between Germany and the Vatican is being negotiated. The German government is to nominate Bishops subject to the approval of the Pope, and the Bishops are to nominate priests subject to the approval of the government."

Mr. Henry Varley, the Evangelist, Whose name is known in all lands, has returned to England after two years' work in Australia. The desire of Mr. Varley to carry the Gospel message to the masses of these far-off colonies has been crowned with abundant success. This is evidenced by a largely signed testimonial handed to the evangelist on the eve of his departure from Sydney. This document states that it is not the mere popularity and natural abilities of the preacher which have endeared him to the Christians in the Antipodes, but his loving, faithful service in the Gospel, and the helpful way in which he has been enabled to set forth the highest truths of our most holy faith.

The Deathbed Scene of the Late Bishop Gobat of Jerusalem is thus described by his daughter, Mrs. Wolters. She says: "It was not death, it was going home; as a child rejoices to go home to its parents, so he rejoiced to go to his Father. We were all round his bed. The Master called, and the servant was ready to enter into the joy of his Lord. It was so beautiful that he could say, when asked whether Jesus was with him in the dark valley, 'Yes; but it is not dark.' He was laid the same day under an olive tree in the midst of the English burial ground. A great multitude of Jews, Moslems, Greeks, and Romanists attended the funeral, as well as the Protestants of Jerusalem."

C. H. SPURGEON'S WORKS.

UNPRECEDENTED PRICES.

The writings of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, the greatest preacher of the age, are fully as much admired in America as i the United Kingdom, but their circulation has hitherto been limited by the high prices charged for them.

PRINCE LOUIS NAPOLEON, Killed by the Zulus, June 1, 1879.

PRINCE LOUIS NAPOLEON.

His Family—Birth—General Rejoicing—Education—The Franco-German War—Exile—Life in England—The Anglo-Zulu War—Death.

The career of the young man whose death at the hands of the Zulu savages has within the last few weeks startled the world, is one full of interest. That interest, however, attaches to it rather on account of its associations and its possibilities than of its record of actual facts. He was the heir of the Napoleons, and as such the world felt an interest in him from dynastic rather than personal reasons.

His was a name at which "a world had grown pale," a name which has filled a more conspicuous place in the annals of the past century than any other name that has been recorded there. The strange comet-like house arose with a suddenness almost supernatural, it shone with a brilliance dazzling to the eye, and went its way into darkness and obscurity. It has reappeared, filled the eye of the political world for a quarter of a century, and has again set in midnight gloom. Truly an extraordinary family, and one whose history teaches lessons valuable alike to the king and the peasant.

Napoleon I., the founder of the House, from being a poor unknown lieutenant in the French army rises by his genius and energy to an Imperial throne. He is the terror of nations and of kings; he reconstructs Europe, and gives away crowns as if they were petty baubles. He is cast down and imprisoned. But he breaks loose, and once more ascends the throne. Again he is overcome, and this time is held securely, and dies on a bleak, barren rock a prisoner. And as if the very name was to have no heritage in the future, his only son dies in exile and obscurity.

But, Phœnix-like, the second empire sprang into existence. Napoleon III., a man who had loitered about the English streets homeless and often almost penniless, who had suffered imprisonment and privations innumerable, conjured with the name of his uncle, stole the hearts of the French people and climbed to the position of chief of the French Republic. From that position to the throne was but a step. True, there intervened a stream of blood, but this man did not scruple to stain his feet on a road whereof at the end there was so rich a prize. The step was taken, and the hero, or the criminal, of December 2d, 1852, was proclaimed Emperor of the French. For more than twenty years he ruled the destinies of France, and was the most important factor in the problems of Europe. He in his turn was over thrown, and died in exile. It is the only son of this powerful emperor who now lies in the tomb, slaughtered by the spears of a troop of savages while fighting for the nation that overthrew the founder of his house. How strange are the changes and vicissitudes of the world's history! and how clearly the Christian student sees that the God of righteousness rules over all, and in righteousness only can the throne be established!

For Prince Louis Napoleon personally the world feels nothing but pity. For his widowed and now childless mother there goes out from all hearts the most sincere condolence, but for the cause the young Prince represented there is but little sympathy, and its present disaster occasions little regret. A boundless ambition distinguished its leaders; they did not hesitate to sacrifice life, to carry fire and sword into neighboring countries, and even to destroy their own countrymen if by so doing the interests of their house were advanced. Such a dynasty makes itself feared, but few besides interested partisans regret its fall.

HIS BIRTH.

The Prince Imperial was born March 16th, 1856. Napoleon III., with the democratic spirit which characterized all his career, had set at defiance the matrimonial traditions of European courts. He went to none of them for a bride, but elevated to the Imperial throne of France a beautiful Spanish lady, Eugenie, daughter of Count de Montijo. It is she who, once surrounded by the splendor and pageantry of the gay French Court, now sits alone in an English country house, widowed and childless.

On the 16th of March, 1856, the population of the city of Paris was profoundly agitated and delighted. That day a son had been born to the Emperor and Empress of France, and a prospective ruler to the French people. At six o'clock in the morning the cannon of the Invalides announced to the city the tidings of the arrival of an heir to the Imperial throne. Telegraphic dispatches were sent to all the various diplomatic agencies of France on the Continent. Notice was sent to the representatives of other Powers resident in Paris. The Public Buildings were decorated, and the city illuminated. Large sums were given away in charity. Political prisoners were amnestied, and every token shown of general rejoicing.

The infant was named Napoleon Eugene Louis Jean Joseph, and a special delegate was sent from Rome by the Pope to administer to him the rite of baptism. He was born a very delicate child, and had to be nursed with the utmost care till he was ten years old. His nurse was an English woman, and he had a German-Swiss valet; both were enjoined to speak to him always in their respective tongues, while his mother addressed him in Spanish, so that the boy grew up to be a good linguist without any effort. It is said that he could read in four languages when he was seven years old.

The Emperor took every opportunity of bringing the child prominently before the people. As soon as he could walk he was entered on the roll of the Grenadiers of the Guard, and at five years of age he was made a sergeant, and the Emperor took care that whenever he appeared in public he should wear the miniature uniform of his rank. Military glory has always had a fascination for the French nation, and the Emperor in identifying his son with the army schemed for his popularity with the masses, and at the same time flattered the army. As years passed the boy gathered strength, and in his tenth year appeared to have outgrown the ailments that threatened him in the earlier years of his life. The best tutors France could furnish were employed in his education, and the Prince worked diligently at his studies, making rapid progress.

For the sake of companionship, the Emperor allowed Louis Conneau to be educated with him. Conneau's father had been the Emperor's closest friend during his captivity at Ham, and was chiefly instrumental in abetting his escape from that fortress. The Emperor never faltered in his gratitude for this service, and he wished his son to make the friendship hereditary. This desire was gratified, for Louis Conneau was in exile, as well as in the Tuileries, the Prince's most trusted friend.

While the Prince was thus passing pleasantly, he was occasionally exposed to an affront from the many enemies of his father. In 1868 the Prince went to preside at the annual distribution of prizes held in the Sorbonne. A son of General Cavaignac happened to be among the prize-winners, and his name was called to come and receive his books from the Prince's hand; but at this moment his mother rose in the reserved seats, and, with an imperious gesture, ordered young Cavaignac not to move. This was Madame Cavaignac, who in this way sought to pay off the son of the man who had sent her husband into exile. The pointed insult was much talked of at the time, but the Prince remarked, rather pithily, "It seems, then, that young Cavaignac wished to act a comedy, for he must have known I was coming here."

On another occasion the Prince Imperial, going to the Bois de Boulogne in a carriage, saw a boy tumble off the box seat of a cab. He ordered his carriage to stop, and alighted to see if the urchin was hurt. There was nothing the matter, so the Prince Imperial kissed the boy, adding, "You may tell your father that the Emperor's son kissed you." "Oh, no, I won't tell him that," answered the boy readily, "for papa is always saying that Napoleon is a blackguard."

In 1870, when the war with Germany bega Prince Louis accompanied his father to the fro tier. He saw fighting for the first time at th battle of Saarbruck, when his father telegraph to his mother that he had just received that the men had wept to see him so calm, an that he had picked up a spent bullet which f at his feet. The Emperor by this telegram ma his son the subject of ridicule through Europ It was flavored too strongly with what is co monly called humbug, a commodity in which N poleon III., dealt very largely.

In a short time dangers began to thick around the French army, and the young Prin was sent to Belgium for safety. It was only u der direct orders from the Emperor the Prin could be induced to leave, and though only fo teen years of age, he was eager to share the d gers and hardships of the campaign. While Mons he heard of the disasters that had over ken the army, and it was with difficulty th who had charge of him could induce him to main. On one occasion he actually escaped fr the Hotel de la Couronne in that town, at nig and tried to prevail upon a jobmaster to let h a trap of some sort in which he could return France and join his father's armies. Of cou he was politely reconducted to his hotel, and next day was conveyed under the close cust of two equerries to England. The Emper telegram directing this refuge was short, bu contained a volume of meaning. "I am prisoner of the King of Prussia," he wr "take the Prince to England."

The Prince's grief during the whole of campaign which followed made his mother s ously fear for his health. There was no kee newspapers from him, and what angered most was to read the accusations of cowar and imbecility launched against his father. French mob which had applauded the Empe departure would not forgive his defeat, and cries of "Long live the Emperor" were changed for shouts of "Down with the pire." The faithless people who only a s time before were devoted to the Imperial c deserted it in the hour of its adversity, and it only by a hasty flight to England that the press, once so admired and so beloved, coul her life was in safety.

In the quiet retreat

the Empress and her son settled down, and Prince at once recommenced his studies w the war had rudely interrupted. M. Filon, had been the Prince's tutor in Paris, labore siduously, assisted by English professors of thematics and German, to complete his e tion. The arrival of the Emperor from his on at Wilhelmshoe put an end to these pr studies. "He desired," he said, "that his should be brought up as one of the pe among the people," and the Prince was ac ingly sent to Kings College and to the Mi Academy at Woolwich.

At this period of his life, one who had o tunities of observing his character w "Prince Louis Napoleon was better end than most young men of his age. He had found contempt for superficial knowl Among his elders he was quiet, reserved thoughtful, seldom speaking except to as explanations or information, but there w end to his gayety and love of fun when h surrounded by those of his own age. Unli majority of the French youth, the Princ well built, had an abundance of physical str and muscular power, and excelled in ridin fencing. Like his father, the Prince was a believer in the Napoleonic star, and he wo soon think of denying his own existence entertaining the slightest doubt of the ult restoration of the Imperial dynasty."

During his stay at Woolwich Military Sc he was exceedingly popular with the cadets was classed seventh out of thirty-four i final examinations, in 1875, and might quently have chosen between the enginee illery had he entered the British army. He nself wished to do so, and would have become artilleryman, but some state reasons pre- nted his taking service in the Queen's army. wever, he has remained to some extent iden- ed with the service by maintaining the friend- st relations with his former fellow-students.

AN AMUSING INCIDENT

elated of his military school-days. It is stat- that in the officers' mess-room of Shoe- yness there is a bust of Prince Louis Napo- n, taken under droll circumstances. A pupil Woolwich, who had a taste for sculpturing, ed the Prince to allow him to take a cast of face. The request was a joke, but the nce entered into it seriously. A mould of t clay was prepared, and the Prince was bid- n to kneel down and impress his face into it. did so naively, but the hoaxer, not content, ght him by the nape of the neck and thrust n as deep as he could into the soft mass. In- the mould thus formed a quantity of liquid ster was poured; but, owing to the vigor h which the Prince's face had been thrust in- the mould, the dimensions of the nose were ormous—not less than ten inches. The Prince ghed good-humoredly at the fun; but the ole thing was done to some purpose, for the st still remains.

The death of his father profoundly affected the ince Imperial. He loved the Emperor with re than filial love. and for some time it was ought that the grief occasioned by his loss uld have permanently injured his health. But ne and the tender care of his mother helped to al the wound.

On the outbreak of

was anxious to accompany the British army the campaign. He was, however, persuad- by the Empress and the old friend of his fa- er, M. Rouher, not to expose his life to the ks of a South African climate and the chances war. But when news arrived of the disaster Isandula, and it was announced that reinforce- ents were needed, he obtained a reluctant con- nt from his mother, and offered his services to e British Government. His offer was not form- y accepted, as it was considered advisable by e authorities that the Prince should not hold fice in the English army. He was, however, rmitted to join the forces as a volunteer, and e Duke of Cambridge, the British Command- -in-Chief, sent a special letter to Lord Chelms- rd commending the Prince to his care.

In a letter to M. Rouher, evidently intended r publication, the Prince Imperial thus ex- ained his motives:

"I am about to quit Europe, and my absence ay last some months. I have too many faith- l friends in France to think it possible for me keep silence on the reasons of departure. For ght years I have been the guest of England. I ive completed my education in one of her mili- ry schools, and on several occasions I have rengthened the bonds which connect me with e English army by sharing in the great man- uvres it has executed. The war which Eng- nd has for more than a year been carrying on the Cape of Good Hope has just assumed a aracter of gravity which it had not till now ossessed. I desire to follow the operations, d I embark in two days. The time I shall de- ote to witnessing this conflict of civilization gainst barbarism will not be lost for me. Afar, s near, my thoughts will constantly be directed ward France. I shall watch with interest and ithout disquietude the gradual phases she will ass through, for I am certain God protects her."

His leave-taking with Queen Victoria, who had lways shown a marked liking for the young an, was extremely cordial. Her Majesty issed him, and taking a valuable diamond ring om her finger, presented it to him.

On his arrival in South Africa the Prince Im- erial at once went to the front and took an ac- ve part in the war against the Zulus. Little ews reached England respecting him until, on une 19th, there came the brief telegram, "Prince Imperial killed," followed by others bringing details of the sad disaster.

occurred while on a reconnoitering expedition to search for a suitable site for the next camp. The correspondent of the London Standard thus narrates the circumstances:

"The Prince Imperial, who was always desirous to be actively employed, was anxious to join Lieutenant Carey of the 98th, who was starting with six men of Beddington's Horse on the expedition. The staff objected to his going, but he laughingly overruled their wishes and started. Ten miles in advance of the camp they reached a kraal some two miles from Inshallami Mountain, in the direct route to Inyoyani. Here they dismounted, unsaddled their horses, and rested for an hour. As they were in the act of re-saddling their horses to return, Lieutenant Carey suddenly exclaimed that he saw the black faces of the Zulus peering out between the maize-stalks all round."

Lieutenant Carey said "the Zulus shouted and fired upon us as we rode off. I thought that all were mounted, and knowing that the men's carbines were unloaded, I judged it better to clear the long grass before making a stand. On looking back I saw one party following us, while another on our left was attempting to cut off our retreat across the ridge. Meanwhile we were under a heavy fire, and after we had crossed the donga, or deep cutting, a man said to me, 'I fear the Prince is killed, sir.' I paused, looked back, and seeing the Prince's horse galloping on the other side of the donga, asked if it was any use returning. The Zulus had already passed over the ground where he must have fallen, and he pointed out the men creeping round our left. I paused for our men to come up, and then galloped on."

One of the troopers of the party, who was near the Prince, says:

"When the volley was fired, I dropped my carbine, and dismounted to pick it up. I could not again get into the saddle, for my horse was frightened, and galloped away with me, my left foot being in the stirrup and my stomach across the saddle. My horse followed the others. I was unable to stop him as I passed the Prince, who had hold of the stirrup leather, and was attempting to mount. He had not hold of the reins. I saw him fall down: his horse trampled on him. Carey was leading, and we galloped two or three miles. Noticing that the Prince and two troopers were missing, I advised Carey to wait for them. He said, 'We will cross the spruit, and then go on the high ground and wait.' No order was given to rally, halt, fire, or try to save the Prince. All Lieutenant Carey said was, 'Let us go quick; let us make haste.'"

The Times says:

"From these accounts the fact is patent that no one thought to attempt to assist the unfortunate Prince, whereas if only one man had waited to see him mounted, and held his horse's head for him, he might have been saved."

On his return to camp Lieutenant Carey related what had occurred, and a troop of horse was immediately sent out to ascertain what had become of the Prince.

One of the party writes: "A shout soon apprised us of the fact that something had been discovered. Men speedily gathered round a spot near the crossing. There the poor young Prince lay dead. Surgeon-Majors Scott and Robinson were soon present, but their skill was of no avail. Life had been extinct for hours. All they could do was to examine the wounds and find that two, at least, of them would have proved instantaneously fatal. It is probable that one of them was the first that he received, for the face wore a calm and pleasant expression, not as of one who had died in pain. No bullet had touched him. The wounds, nineteen in number, were all caused by assegais. The body was stripped of clothing, but beside him were found his spurs, and round his neck a small chain with locket and charms. The Zulus have a belief that whoever takes a charm from a dead body will die in the same way as the man so robbed. It was a mournful sight, and no one regarded it with unconcern. At the Prince's head his old soldier-servant knelt and wept; and grief like his, exhibited by one who had served him only a short time, spoke well for the private character of his master.

Only a few days before, in conversation with Captain Lane, he had said, "It is no fun being fired at; I want a trial with the assegai. I should like a slight assegai wound." By General Marshall's orders a stretcher was formed of lances and a blanket; and, wrapped in another blanket, the corpse was borne to meet the ambulance.

The position of the body, and the nature of the wounds, indicated that the Prince, who was very fleet of foot, finding himself unable to mount his horse, had run some 300 yards pursued by the Zulus, and then finding escape hopeless, had faced about, and drawing his sword—the sword which Napoleon I. had worn on many a glorious field—had died defending himself.

It is satisfactory to learn that Lieutenant Carey has been tried by court-martial for what appears to have been cowardly desertion, and has been sent to England under arrest.

The agony of the Empress on learning of the death of her beloved son can be better imagined than described. She wept unceasingly, and for a time her life was in imminent danger. Queen Victoria and the Princess of Wales paid her visits of condolence, and came away with their faces seamed with tears.

The body was carried back to England with martial honors and interred, July 12, beside that of Napoleon III., at Chiselhurst. The Queen and all the Royal Family attended the funeral, the pall being borne by three sons of the Queen and by the Duke of Cambridge.

A subscription was spontaneously commenced by the Prince's comrades in the English army to raise some suitable memorial to him. It is expected it will take the form of a marble statue, which will be placed in Westminster Abbey among those of the men whose memory England holds in highest esteem.

So ended a life begun amid rejoicing and the pomp of a palace—a life full of bright hopes, and the centre of many ambitious plans. It was believed he was destined to rule over the mighty empire of France and have a large share in controlling the future of Europe. But men have to learn the lesson taught again and again in the history of the world, "that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever He will (Daniel 4: 17).

MR. VARLEY ON THE OCEAN.—AN ENRICHED HEIR.

MR. HENRY VARLEY, who has lately returned to England from his very successful evangelistic tour in Australia, said, in his able address at the Mildmay Conference:

"When in the United States I heard of a young man whose father had recently died. He left him a large estate encumbered with a very heavy mortgage. By the time the annual interest was paid on the debt there was little or no income left for him. It so happened that an English engineer was visiting the place, and he said, as he walked with him through the estate, 'I strongly suspect that you have both coal and iron beneath this soil.' 'Do you?' said the young man, his face lighting up at the very thought. Well, the result was that mines were opened on that estate, and in less than three years that young man had not only paid the interest but the mortgage, and was a wealthy man, by developing the resources that were there.

"Now, we are heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ—the possessors of the unsearchable riches of Christ, but we must dig deep into the mine of our spiritual inheritance in order to come into the enjoyment of its spiritual wealth. Many Christians fail, through weakness of faith, to enjoy all the comfort and blessings and privileges which are their portion through God's gift to them of his Son Jesus Christ."

COME INTO THE ARK.

The Third Sermon Preached by Rev. Dr. Talmage in England.

Preached at Newcastle-on-Tyne, on Sunday, June 29th, 1879, and Specially Reported for the "Christian Herald."

We need no Bible to prove that there was a Deluge. The geologist's hammer asserts it. Sea-shells and marine formations on the top of the highest mountains show that the waters did really wash over the tops of the Alps and of the Andes. Just how the catastrophe occurred we know not. Whether by the stroke of a comet, or flashes of lightning changing the air into water, or by the direct stroke of the hand of God, as by the blow of an axe between the horns of a bull, the earth staggered.

To prepare for that catastrophe God ordered a large ship to be built, which should have no prow, for it was to have no shore. It should have no helm, for no human hand should direct it. It was to be a vast ship—two or three times the size of one of our Cunarders. It was

THE GREAT EASTERN OF OLDEN TIMES.

Well, the ship was built. The door was opened. The lizards crawled in. The cattle walked in. The grasshoppers hopped in. The birds flew in; and then the invitation went out to Noah and his family, "Come thou and all thy house into the ark." Just one human family embarked on that strange voyage, and they hear the door slammed to

There was a moaning in the air like the moaning of a dying world. How strange everything seemed! The air was almost suffocating. Great drops of rain plashed on the upturned faces of those who watched the coming tempest. Crash went the rocks. Boom went the bursting heavens. The inhabitants fled not to the top of the houses and the top of the mountains, as they have sometimes been described as doing, for when God grinds mountains to pieces and the ocean slips its cable, there is no place to fly to. See the old ark toss and pitch and tumble in the surf, while the passengers look out of the windows upon the shipwreck of a race and the carcases of a dead world.

I am no alarmist, but if in the latter part of September for three or four days you find the wind blowing from a stormy direction, you are not unwise when you prophesy that there will soon be the equinoctial gales; and I am to tell you of the coming of a storm on our world, compared with which our Noah's Deluge was an April shower; and it will be most wise for you and me and for our families to get ourselves housed for eternity, and the voice that rang through the air in olden times rings through this building to-night, saying, "Come thou and all thy house into the ark."

But how did Noah and his family get into the ark? Did they go through the window? Did they go down the roof? No, they went through the door; and if a man now wants to get into the ark of God's mercy he has got to go through the door of Christ Jesus; but, blessed be God, it is

Do you know that scientists tell us, and in some of our museums we have seen them, of large beasts that belonged to other ages—some of them three or four times as great as the largest animal in our era? And yet the Bible says they went in two and two. And that indicates that the door must be very wide, very high, in order to let such vast animals go in two and two. That suggests to me also that the door of God's mercy is very wide. You can go in two and two—yea, thousands and thousands, and tens of millions—all comprising this audience to-night can march en masse into the kingdom of our God—Europe, Asia, Africa, North and South America, plenty of room; and yet there is room, room in the ark, room for every one of us. Blessed be God for the wide door.

"Whosoever will." Richard Baxter, author of the "Saint's Rest," declared that if it had said there was mercy for Richard Baxter, he was so great a sinner that he would have thought it must have meant some other Richard Baxter; but when it said, "Whosoever," that meant him—the worst of all Richard Baxters. Glory be to God for so wide and so vast a door that all the world may come in.

But I notice also that the door of the ark was in the side of the ark, and so the door into God's mercy is through the pierced, the broken, the wide-open side of Christ. The Roman soldiers thought when they pierced Christ with a spear, it only let the blood out. Instead of that it was to let the whole race in. The cross has been taken apart; it was bolted together—the short piece and the long piece of the cross; but that bolt has been taken out, and those two pieces of the cross are set down for the door-posts, and they are so very wide apart that all the world may come in, and through and between.

A man makes a banquet for his friends. He is very particular who he invites. Perhaps he invites two or three hundred people. He puts their names on the paper of invitation. He invites them exclusively. Then, when they are gathered and the company is complete, the door is shut against all outsiders; but not so when God provides a banquet. He comes out to the doorposts and swings out both hands, one hand over the land and the other over the sea, and with a voice that sounds through Hindoo jungle, and Greenland ice-castle, and Brazilian grove, and English factory, and American home, cries, "Come, for all things are now ready."

Rowland Hill said he would be willing to go into heaven if he had to get through the crevices of the door; but he didn't get in that way. When that good man got through his work in Surrey Chapel, a voice in the heavens cried out, "Lift up your heads, ye everlasting gates, and let him come in."

Luther said that this story of salvation was so good a story that it was fit to carry on one's knees all the way from Rome to Jerusalem. And I go further to-night, and tell you it is a story so good and glad and glorious that it is worth carrying all round the earth, and all round the heavens, that "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Archimedes said, if he had only a fulcrum with his lever he could move the world. Eureka!—I have found it. Calvary is the fulcrum, and the Cross of Christ is the lever, and it will yet lift all nations. Glory be to God for such a great salvation.

I have also to remark to you in regard to the door of God's mercy that

IT SWINGS BOTH WAYS.

I don't know about the door in the ark, whether it was lifted or whether it swung on hinges; but the door of God's mercy swings both ways. It swings out towards all our woes; it swings in towards all the raptures of heaven. It swings in to let the whole church of the Lord enter; it swings out to let all ministering spirits go forth. The church on earth, and the church in heaven—all one.

One army of the living God,
To his command we bow,
Part of the host have crossed the flood,
And part are crossing now.

One Lord, one faith, one baptism, one cross, one Christ, one Holy Ghost, one Doxology, one heaven. The song of salvation will yet be heard amidst all languages, and amidst all peoples:

That song of love, now low, and far,
Ere long will swell from star to star,
That light the breaking day which tips
The golden-spired apocalypse.

But I remark again, in regard to the door of the ark, it had fastenings. How do I know it? Why, the Bible says so. "The Lord shut him in." Now there would be no safety for Noah and his family in the ark if there had not been fastenings in the door. We who have crossed the sea know how they close the port-holes and shut down the hatches. Why? Well, if there were no fastenings to these parts the wave would dash in, and those within would perish just as those on the outside. And we are gla to know that it was so here, for when Noah an his family got into the ark "the Lord shut ther in." Oh, what a safe place it is to be in th kingdom of God! The sea may cast its sur the heavens may be full of lightning, and ther may be a wreath of the snow of the surf and the fire of the heavens, but all those who are i the kingdom of God are safe. "The Lord shu him in."

That is what has kept so many of you safel You have lost your property. You once ha plenty of money to lend; now, perhaps, you ca not borrow a dollar. There was a time wh you rode in a splendid equipage; now you ca hardly get shoes to your feet. Financial disaste came; one wave after another came upon you the hurricane swept the deck of your world prosperity, and you felt that you must go dow but the Lord told you of stores of treasure th never fail and banks that never break, and y took courage and the Lord shut you in. Sic ness came to your household; death follow Bright eyes were closed. The swift feet th went up and down the hall were silenced. O how the waves of bereavement dashed agai your ship; but, standing by the empty cot, a in the midst of the desolated home, you sa "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken aw blessed be the name of the Lord." The L shut you in.

I am also impressed with the fact that same door that shut Noah in shut the world and I am glad that when you and I get i heaven

THE WORLD CAN'T FOLLOW US.

The man on earth perhaps had hard wor get his bread. "They shall hunger no mo The man on earth wept bitterly. "The La which is in the midst of the throne shall l them to living fountains of water, and God s wipe away all tears from their eyes." The m had hard work to get a house to live in; bu my Father's house are many mansions, and th is no rent to pay. All the sorrows in the w may come up and knock at the door—no ad tance. All the perplexities of life may c and knock at the door—no admittance. All surges of earth's calamity may beat against bulwarks of the ship of celestial light, but not dash in it. The Lord, the Lord, shall him in. "Blessed are all they who put t trust in Him."

I am glad that this evening I do not invite on board of a crazy craft, with leaking hulk insecure fastenings, but into an ark fifty c wide and three hundred cubits long, and posts of the door so wide apart that, wit grazing them, the round earth may be bowlea

Oh, come into the ark! You say it was strange with such a splendid ark that the p stayed outside and perished? Do you know reason? Why, I suppose some stood ou cause they thought that after a while they go in. They said to themselves, "I mus richer, I must get more flocks, I must cu my lands better." Or they may have "That ark has been open so long, it will tinue to be open; I can go in another ti The Lord waited 120 years in the case of N ark. These people all the time were del and procrastinating. Meanwhile, the he were filling with water and the storm was

They had come to their last year, to their last month, to their last week, to their last day, to their last hour, to their last minute; but suddenly an ocean dropped from heaven, and an ocean surged up from beneath, and God rolled earth and sky in one—a wave of awful destruction.

So men now put off religion. They are coming into the ark after a while, so they wait until they get more money, until they get their worldly affairs settled, till they are twenty or thirty years older; then they say, "I will go in at the right time, and I shall surely be safe." Meanwhile the man is going down the street very late one night, and he is passing beneath a scaffolding and a gust of wind takes one of the planks away, and down falls the scaffolding upon the man.

DEAD AND OUTSIDE THE ARK.

Or he is riding some day in a beautiful park, and an ungovernable team dashes along his carriage. He tries to stop. He shouts till he is hoarse. He plants his foot against the dashboard. He takes another twist in the reins. He holds back with all his might. No use. The horses speed on. The carriage goes down the path, and his soul hurries on to eternity. They bring back his mangled body from the wreck, but his soul is gone. He is dead and outside the ark.

Or some time he wakes up at night in great distress and much pain, and the pain constantly increases. The physician comes; he gives ten drops—no relief; twenty drops, thirty, forty, fifty, sixty—no relief. The house is filled with alarm. Children cry, the pulse flutters, the heart stops, the soul flies. No time to pray, no time to read a promise of the Gospel, no time to get pardon for one of ten thousand sins; dead, and outside the ark. Oh, God, keep us from such a calamity!

But I think that some of these people were kept out of the ark for FEAR OF BEING LAUGHED AT.

I suppose a man to be starting towards that ancient ark, and people gather round and say, "Ha, ha! see, he's going into the ark; what an absurd thing! Why, there's going to be no storm, and if there is that ship won't outride it. Come and see him. Look! this is too good to be. Just look. Ha, ha! going into the ark!" And so the man turns back. He couldn't bear to be laughed at, and so he perished in the Deluge. And I suppose in this house there are hundreds of people who are being laughed out of their best interests.

They say, "If now to-night, under the call of the American preacher as he stands up in the Gospel, I should yield my heart to God, what would they say at the store, in the office, in the factory, in the club-room, when I went there to-morrow? Why they would say, 'Here comes our Christian, our new Christian. Don't believe you're any better than we are. If you are a Christian, get down and pray a little. Come now. If you have any religion at all, give us a touch of it. Let us see something of it. Ah! a pretty Christian you are.'" And for fear of being scoffed at and derided there are hundreds of people drawn away from God and heaven. Oh! these scorners, what can they do for you at all?

When you are on your dying pillow will they come to comfort you? In the great day of eternity will they bail you out? They can keep you out of heaven, but can they keep you out of hell? Oh come into the ark. Come into the ark and

DON'T COME ALONE.

Come thou and all Thy house. What does that mean? Bring your wife and children. You can't drive them in. If Noah had tried to drive the birds, into the ark, they would have flown the other way. You can't drag people into the kingdom of God; you can't take a catechism and force it down the throat of your child, whether he will or not, and club that child into the kingdom of God: You can't do it. What does the Bible say? Is it "Christ was lifted up to drive all men unto Him?" Oh, no! I quoted the verse wrongly. It should have run, "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." Well, then, come into the ark.

Oh, Christian man, bring your wife with you into the kingdom. How would Noah have felt if, when he had heard the storm rattling on the roof of the ark, his wife had been on the outside? Oh, I wish you would be united at the foot of the cross to-night. That wedding-ring, that marriage-ring, how well it has stayed on the finger where you put it on the marriage day. Sickness came, and with its wasting effects that finger was shrivelled, but, shrunken as the finger was, the ring stayed on it still. After a while you two stood over an open grave, the grave of your darling child, a grave that swallowed up a thousand hopes, but the ring didn't drop off into the open grave. Poverty came—hard and grinding poverty—and, oh! how she had to work, and hard work rubbed that ring, but only to wear it brighter and brighter, and it stayed on. Can it be that that ring is ever to be broken? Will the gates of the sepulchre break that ring? God forbid it! Oh, come to-night and be married at the foot of the cross.

As two young people said to me just before I left America one Sunday night, "Do you remember (it was the wife who spoke) marrying us a year ago?" I said, "Yes, I do." "Well, now," said the Christian wife, "I have brought my husband with me to-night, and he has become a Christian during this service, and I want you to marry us again under the Cross of Christ." And I said, "The Lord bless you: I proclaim the banns now for earth and heaven," and I put one hand on his head and the other hand on her head, and I said, "One for time, one forever." Oh, bring your wife into the ark!

And then your children. Do not leave any of them outside.

GOD BLESS THE CHILDREN!

How stupid our homes would be without them. We keep telling how much we do for our children; but our children do more for us. Is there any salve to take soreness out of a wound like the balmy touch of a child's hand? Is there any harp or lute so tuned to music as a child's good-night? "Good-night, papa; good-night, mamma." Oh, what preparation are you making for your children's eternal welfare?

You say, "I am going to give them a good education." That is right. You say, "I am going to culture them in good things." That is right. You say, "I am going to make a fortune for them." That is well. The better off you can make your children the better. There is a hard-working man who says, "I don't care how hard I work now and all through life, but I want my children to have it easy." God bless you for your determination and courage. It is a grand thing for you to want your children to do well for this life, but what preparation are you making for their eternal life? In the judgment, when God asks of you, "Where is Henry, where is George, where is Mary, where is Frank, where is Clarence, where are those precious, immortal souls I committed to your charge? you are responsible for their physical health, and I made you also responsible for their everlasting life, and what did you do for them? where are they?"

"Oh," said a young man, when he came to a dying bed, "Father, you have been a good father to me in many respects. You gave me a good education, and you have introduced me into good society, and you have done a great many noble things for me; but, father, you never taught me how to die, and now I am going out into the darkness." God forbid that any of our children should ever turn upon us in that way. "Come thou and all thy house into the ark." Oh, set up the family altar to-night. It will not be late when you get home. "What do you mean by the family altar?" I mean a Bible and a place to kneel down. That is all you want, and all heaven with you. Kneel down and pray. Pray for your children.

Have you a bad boy? Have you given him up? Oh, how could you give him up? Give him up! Give him up!! Did God give you up? Did He give me up? Oh, no. Don't give up your boy. Don't say he is so far off he can't get back. Why, God is so full of mercy that He would save him to-night if you only had faith enough. Don't give him up. Pray for him to the very last moment of your life. Let your last prayer be for your boy. He will come in. As a servant of the Most High God to-night I tell you he will come in. Don't be disheartened. "Come thou and all thy house into the ark." You can't spare any of them. Think of which one you would like to spare.

On their western lake in America there was journeying and they were very poor. Their appearance told the story without the word of explanation. A very benevolent gentleman in that part came up to father and said, "You seem to be very poor." "Oh!" said the other, "if there's a man in this world poorer than I am, God pity him, and pity me, and help us both." "Well," said the benevolent man, "I will take one of those children and bring her up and make her very comfortable. I am a man of fortune, and you may find great relief in this way." "What," said the poor man. "What!—would it be a relief to have my hand chopped off my arm? Would it be a relief to have my heart torn out from my breast? What do you mean, sir? God pity us."

Ah! no, he could not give up either of them, and you cannot give up any of your family. Which one would you give up? The eldest? Or would it be the youngest? Would it be the one that was sick last winter? Would it be the husband? Would it be the wife? No, no. "Come thou and all thy house into the ark." Let us join hands anew and come into the ark. Come father, come mother, come sister, come brother, come son, come daughter. It is not the voice of a stormy blast, but the voice of an all-loving God, who says, "Come thou and all thy house into the ark." The Lord shut him in.

There were once on a rail train three passengers travelling under very different circumstances. One passenger was a maniac. The mind, like a dismasted ship, was driving on a desolate coast. The train stopped. The man alighted and was taken to an asylum for the insane. There was another man on the train who was a condemned criminal. The officers of the law had seized him, and they were taking him to the penitentiary. Depravity and despair were depicted on that man's face. The train stopped; the man alighted, and was conveyed to his destination.

There was another person under far different circumstances on the train. She was a bride. Every hour was gay as the marriage-bell. Life beckoned and glittered. Her companion was taking her to his father's house. The train stopped. The old man met them. As he greeted her to her new home his white locks snowed down on her fair face, and he sealed his words of welcome with a father's kiss.

Quickly we fly towards eternity. Soon we will be there. Some of us will leave this life perhaps condemned culprits. We refuse the pardon — we carry the chains. Oh, God grant that at the last it may be a greeting from our Father who shall come to welcome us to our new home with Him! Oh, that will be a marriage banquet — the Father's welcome, the Father's bosom, the Father's kiss — heaven, heaven.

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

Percival Interrupts Janie's Courtship — Her Sweetheart is not Ashamed of his Name—Percival Studies the Romish and Protestant Controversy, Aided by his Friend Alick Gogharty —Percival Enters Trinity College—Alick Gogharty becomes his College Chum—The Young Ireland Confederacy—Percival Joins this Political Brotherhood.

PERCIVAL was surprised at his servant's question.

"I don't quite understand you," said Percival to Mehaffey. "What do you mean by 'goings on'? Surely Janie is not permitting a piper to court her?" "What else, in the name o' wondher, can I mane?" said Jemmy, "whin I've caught thim over and over agin, tooth and nail at it. Begorrah, it's too bad!" and Jemmy said this with such energy that Percival saw at once there were personal reasons for Mehaffey's zealous guardianship of Janie. "Who is this piper, Jemmy?" he asked. "He's the wan," answered Mehaffey, "that—purshuin to him—brought her the news about her father on the night the mistress cum upon thim, and she wouldn't give her informer's name. He's wan they call Micky Haley—wan o' the most impudentist, consaited, and owdacious 'omedhawns' (fool) that ever stood on two legs and called hisself a man.

"Indade! I so hate his mane, sneakin' ways —cringin' and crouchin' like a dog round people's gates, walls, and areas, not to be seen by any wan in the house—that many's the time I was that aggravated I could hardly keep me hands off him."

Percival Montaigne could not restrain a loud laugh at Micky's torrent of invective; but all at once his thoughts reverted to the name of the piper which he had heard. "Micky Haley — Micky Haley?" he soliloquized. "Wherever did I hear that name? It sounds in some way familiar to my ear; and yet, for the life of me, I can't call to mind when or where I came across the owner of it."

No, nor would he ever have recalled the man to remembrance had not Mehaffey, taking breath after his long and loud explosion of wrath, said, "Janie tells me, sur, that you'll know who this 'droner and squeaker' is, for that you met him (her father tould her) on the night ye war lost in the bog." This statement of Jemmy's gave the needed clue, and in an instant Percival knew that Micky Haley was the man who told the president in the Ribbon meeting who he was, and who had brought down hot vengeance on his head by revealing that he was the heir to Sir Christopher's property.

Percival had felt annoyed at Janie's reported flirtation with a piper. He had formed a better opinion of her steadiness and prudence, and he would certainly have sharply remonstrated with her, and endeavored to put a stop in the future to such conduct on her part; but now that he knew who the Lothario was—a Ribbonman, and active in the service of that unlawful confederacy —he resolved to use the most summary method he could think of to get rid not only of Haley's visits to his mother's house, but to free the town of him altogether. "Tell me, Jemmy, the next time this man comes near the house," he said, "and I'll teach him better than to carry on such tricks. He must not be allowed to befool our Janie."

Jemmy was delighted to hear this from his young master. He had now an ally upon his side that would ensure him victory. He touched up his horse to a smarter pace, as though he imagined the animal's increased speed would in some way hasten the denouement he so coveted.

Two or three evenings after this conversation about the piper and Janie, Jemmy Mehaffey stole upstairs to Percival's room on tip-toe, although such precaution, so far from the garden gate, was absurd, as being perfectly needless, and putting his head through the half-opened door said, in an eager whisper, "Mr. Percival, sur, now's your chance. Janie's at the back gate, and Haley—confound the fellow!—has her close and fast in discoorse."

This description of the conversation was quite correct, for, as it happened, Haley was telling the girl of what a good arrangement her young master had made for settling her father "on no less, if you please," said he, "than on his own property; aye, and on a farm far superior to his holding from Squire Horton." Absorbed in this good news, and her heart full of joy and thankfulness, she never heard Percival's approach, so when he spoke to her she gave a start and a little scream, and passing quickly on one side of him, ran hastily up the garden walk and into the house.

Haley was imitating her in her escape when Percival, in a stern voice, called him back, and demanded to speak with him. "Your name is Haley," said Percival. "Yes, please yer honor," responded the piper; "at yer sarvice. Sure I'm not a-goin' to deny me name, for I ain't ashamed of it." "Perhaps not," said Percival, "but for all that I think you have no reason to be proud of it. Haley, you and I have met before, I know I need not tell you where; but if ever I catch sight of you near these premises again—and I'll be on the lookout for you—I'll inform the police who and what you are, and have you prosecuted. I'm amazed at your impudence to speak to any one living under my roof."

Haley was about to excuse himself by giving the ostensible reason of his coming, but Percival was too full of anger to hear him. "I want," said he, "to have no more to say or do with you, my good fellow, so the sooner you get from this the better." "I'd have gone afore," said Haley, sulkily, "if you only nad the manners to let me" — and muttering something like a curse he turned on his heel and disappeared in the darkness, still talking as he went. Had Percival heard his half-spoken words it might perhaps have given him an unpleasant feeling. He vowed "to have revenge in some way for this thratement, and may be at a time when the man who has insulted and threatened me will least expect it."

The time at length arrived which Mrs. Montaigne judged would be the period most expedient for her Percival to begin his university career. He was now twenty-one years of age, the date at which he would have entered into possession of the Percival estates had the old knight made his will according to the usual formula; as matters stood, however, four years were yet to transpire before he would reach that consummation; meanwhile he would have ample time to take his B.A. degree.

Some months had also yet to run before the two years would expire which he had promised Alick Gogharty should pass before he took any step in publicly declaring a change in his religious opinions. Alick had plied him with books upon the Roman Catholic and Protestant controversy, especially with Chillingworth's "Religion of Protestants," and had often come over to Portarlington to discuss—and with a loving, Christian spirit it was done —the questions at issue between the systems of the Romish and the Reformed churches. As may be supposed, Percival, from these discussions and his own reading, discovered many things to shake his confidence in the opinions which, through Mr. Grant's subtle influence, had glided into his mind. Perhaps nothing so struck him as the Romish appeal to tradition, Papal rescript, and mere Church authority, as compared with Chillingworth's grand aphorism, that "the Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible, is the religion of Protestants."

He did not, however, make known to Alick all the secret workings of his mind, and human pride kept him from fully acknowledging the rashness and hasty recklessness of his former proposed open recantation. He held himself as though yet in a state of suspense, and said he had made up his mind to say little about his purposes until his residence in Dublin would bring him into contact with the best representatives, on each side, of the rival churches.

Trinity College and Dublin University, who has not heard of it? Founded by the great Queen Elizabeth, and favored by the no less great Protector, Oliver Cromwell, in whose days John Owen, the most learned of all the Nonconformists, was its provost, it is the best monument in Ireland of English rule. As the Alma Mater of Ireland's most illustrious sons, what Irishman, Catholic, or Protestant, does not take pride in its learned halls? Here was nursed the genius of Berkeley, Swift, Goldsmith, Saurin, Burke, Grattan, Curran, Plunkett, Hamilton, and a host of others, not less stars of the first magnitude. The number of those is not small who would hardly refuse to say of her, as the Jews of old did of a more sacred foundation, "If I forget thee, let my right hand forget her cunning. Peace be within thy walls and prosperity within thy palaces" (Ps. 122:7).

The entrance course of Trinity College at th period before us was a very extensive one—i has since been curtailed; but Percival passe his matriculation examination well, and hi name stood high in the pass list, and, to hi mother's great satisfaction when she heard it he was taken in for honors He got rooms i the new quadrangle, which a few years prev ously had been added to the college premise and Alick Gogharty was his chum, for Perciv had insisted that his friend, who had acted s nobly towards him, should accept, at least as loan, since he would not consent to take it a gift, the sum which was required to comple Alick's curriculum.

"You must not refuse me, old fellow, th pleasure and joy of doing this," said Perciva "if you do I shall be miserable, for I know th the change in your father's circumstances—you pardon me, won't you, for referring to this which has led to the idea of your staying do this term is altogether owing to your self-sac ficing zeal for me, and your chivalrous stand what you deem the right. There, now, Ali don't say a word to the contrary; the fact o is, I won't let you, and, to spare my own fe ings, I shall consider the matter as settled."

Alick, thus generously pressed, with a heart acceded to Percival's request, only mak it a condition that he should enter into a bo valid in law and in honor, to repay with inter whatever should be advanced to him, and t at the earliest possible opportunity.

The two friends were thus to renew their Portarlington relationship as daily comrades fellow-students. Jemmy Mehaffey, too, was the college, at the call of Percival, for to ac his valet or "gip" he had brought him u Dublin.

At this time the so-called Young Ireland C federacy was making a stir in the sister kingd It was formed by a large number of very cl and enthusiastic young men, who, impatien O'Connell's slow constitutional method of ing Ireland's claims, were resolved to set on revolutionary plans, if needful, for the att ment of their political objects. Not only man Catholics, but a considerable numbe Protestants likewise, had thrown themse into this party. It included poets, orators, writers for the press of no mean order, and enthusiastic, brilliant, and liberty-breathing sions moved to its depths the heart of t fourths of the kingdom.

Several of its most talented and earnest moters were undergraduates of the Univers a fact not only alarming to the senior fe and provosts of Trinity, but also to the executive. A club was secretly formed i College, and it will not surprise any one told that Percival, with his wavering reli views and hatred of landlord oppression, what we know had recently come before hi tice, was easily induced to become a meml the political brotherhood.

He had not long begun residence befo fell in with one or two members of the "earnest, open-hearted fellows," as ever itted them to be; and they, finding that his iments were a good deal in accord with their , introduced him to their political circle a further education in their ideas, plans, and poses. The fact of his joining the club he .. however, secret from Alick, who, he knew, nore cautious and careful in his resolves than self, would neither follow his example nor rove of it.

Where have you been, Percival?" said k to him, when he came in late one night n a club meeting. "Pardon me for asking, boy, but Charlie Lemaire has been. He e, at his father's request, to ask us both for dner at Rathgar, and he has left this note for y."

Oh! I've only been in Harry ——'s rooms," ied Percival. "There were a lot of right y fellows there, and we had a rare evening. hing, however, in the punch and dice line, know," he added, as he saw a light cloud ier over Alick's face, "but splendid signing speechifying."

Indeed!" said Alick. "Lucky dog! I, r wight, have been obliged to content myself h these Horace's Odes and Demosthenes's lippics, and that, you know, not in admiring ir music and eloquence, but with a long and some toil of digging at Geek roots and Latin ivations. Bother it! I wish I were done h it. But won't this evening at Mr. Lere's be a bright oasis, old fellow, in this des of the dead languages! And yet I shouldn't that, for I dearly love the classics, for if ir language be dead their thoughts are living; both Horace and Demosthenes were famous ows in their day; and, pagans though they e, and alas! often loose, at least the former, the world would be much poorer without at of their works has come down to us. But od-night, Percival; I'm off to hammock."

Ir. Spurgeon's Forty-sixth Birthday.—The ty-sixth anniversary of this event was celeted at the Stockwell Orphanage. A bazaar s held on the grounds, and also a public meet, at which Sir Charles Reed presided, the obt being to raise funds towards the purchase of ite adjoining the Boys' Orphanage for a simi institution for girls. This step was contemted in the erection of the existing buildings, d towards which 1000*l.* ($4850) of the 4000*l.* 9,400) required for the land had been preusly secured. Mr. Spurgeon's health is much proved.

This year there were special reasons for joy, Mrs. Spurgeon was well enough, for the first ne for many years, to be present at the fête, d people came from far and near to show how artily they wished their pastor many happy turns of the day, and how ready they were to llow him in his new undertaking. Mr. Spuron in his address spoke of the affection which e boys bore for himself. As soon as he owed his nose he was the centre of a sea of ys—boys to the right, boys to the left, boys erywhere. Whenever he was in the dumps thing did him so much good as a turn in the phanage.

The Rev. B. Cassin, a clergyman of the hurch of England, said, in the course of a ngratulatory address, 'the success of Mr. urgeon was due to his having preached the ord in season and out of season. Although was a Churchman, and a thorough-going one, d had received some precious hard knocks om Mr. Spurgeon, he had always felt that they ere the attacks of a friend. Mr. Cassin closed ith reciting the following acrostic which he ad made on Mr. Spurgeon's name:

S ervant of God, whose hand
P rovides thy every need,
U nwearied thou shalt stand,
R enowned for work and deed.
G lory shall crown above
E ach act of faith below,
O rphans who share thy love
N or want nor care shall know.

THREE SIGNS OF THE APPROACHING END.

By Rev. J. Seiss, D.D., of Philadelphia.

1. THE Scriptures very distinctly tell us that the period of Christ's Second Coming shall be a period of abounding apostasy, scepticism, and wickedness I need not repeat the passages on this point. "As it was in the days of Noe, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of Man" (Luke 17:26). As Milton says, "The first peculiar sign of the Second Advent will be an extreme recklessness and impiety, and an almost universal apostasy." And what a distressing agreement to this do we find in the characteristics of the present times!

Look at Christendom itself. About one half of those who profess and call themselves Christians are wrapped up in the foul embrace of Popery, where it is the fashion, if not the law, to put aside the Scriptures as dangerous, to trust to the word of the priest for forgiveness, to pray to Mary as the great intercessor, to adore the Pope as the vicegerent of God, to hold for doctrines the mere commandments of men, and to look for admission into heaven through human works. The millions in the Greek and Oriental Churches are scarcely any better in regard to what concerns the vital matters of evangelical godliness.

And still further. Look at the moral and religious condition of the nations at large, even those that are called enlightened and Christian. See how crime flourishes and infidelity vaunts itself. What are our secular newspapers but registers of depravity, avarice, ambition, lawlessness, and sin? See the inefficiency of law or Gospel to restrain the violence of passion, or to keep under the brazen iniquity which rears its head aloft on every side. Behold your crowded infidel clubs, your besotted revolutionary combinations, and your hardened and daring propagandists of falsehood, treason, and all forms of social disruption.

See with what readiness people, reputed intelligent, take up with the lowest delusions, and stand forth as the abettors and defenders of some of the foulest emissions of hell, such as spiritualism, universalism, etc. Behold how even great men, professed theologians, editors, professors, lecturers, and men in high places of influence, adopt, advocate, and preach theories of pretended science and philosophy which unsettle the very foundations of piety and faith. What contempt for Christianity and callousness to its great truths do we encounter. And may we not conclude that "God will not, cannot, suffer this wicked world much longer?"

2. Another sign of the Saviour's Second Coming is to be found in great revolutionary troubles, political perplexities, and vast national agitations. The Saviour Himself and all the prophets have taught us this. And never have the universal political heavens been so shaken as in our day. When were human politics so confused, contradictory, and threatening as now? Look at them from one end of the world to the other. Who among the great ones of the earth can tell where he stands? Behold the strange alliances, the deep, sudden, and mysterious antipathies, the unforeseen combination of events, and the unknown tendencies of mighty inscrutable movements, which have been manifesting themselves all over the world in these last days.

Who can tell what shall be next? If it is war, who knows where it will end? If it is peace, who is sure that it will not prove the prelude to war? In either case, mighty dangers everywhere threaten. Democracy, republicanism, autocracy, and military despotism have about equal chances, and neither has any rational hope. As things now are, no conceivable human arrangements can steer clear of the mighty maëlstrom which seems to have drawn all the nations within the circle of its awful whirl.

Men of wisdom, men of Ahithophel astuteness, are at their wits' end, and the prudent and the far-sighted are growing wild with amazement and fear. With all that can be done, things refuse to bend to any mortal control. The ship answers no more to the helm. There is not a government on earth that is not quaking with commotion. Everything is moving, but whither politicians cannot tell (Haggai 2:7).

3. A third sign of the nearness of the end is a stir and inquiry among many respecting Scripture prophecy, leading to the conviction that Christ is at hand. This is set forth in two passages, the one in Daniel, the other in the Lord's prophecy in the twenty-fifth of Matthew. The passage of Daniel, 12:4, is, "O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end; many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." That is, in the period of the end, as Michaelis interprets, "many shall give their sedulous attention to the understanding of these things;" or, according to an old marginal note in an old English Bible, "many shall ran to and fro to search the knowledge of these mysteries." Dr. Gill thus explains the passage: "Towards the time of the end appointed, many shall be stirred up to inquire into these things delivered in this book, and will spare no pains or cost to get a knowledge of them; and, with the blessing of God upon them, the knowledge of this book of prophecy will be increased, things will appear clearer and plainer the nearer the accomplishment of them." Luther's rendering of it is as follows:—"And now, Daniel, shut up these words, and seal this book, until the last times; when many shall come over it, and find great understanding." Coke, Clarke, Henry, and Duffield understand the passage in the same way and concerning the same period of the end—"The wise shall understand." And as the result of all this inquiry and enlightenment on the subject of prophecy, the Saviour tells us that "then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins which went out to meet the bridegroom, and there was a cry made, Behold, the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet Him" (Matthew 25:6).

And how evidently and significantly has this mark of the end been manifesting itself within the last fifty years! Though the multitude still turn from prophecy as from a sealed book, yet what a stir, anxiety, and study has it awakened in many earnest minds! By some in every denomination, and in every Christian country, the subject is being studied and agitated. Everywhere there are men of God proclaiming the great doctrine of Christ's speedy coming to reign with his saints upon the earth.

In England, in Scotland, in France, in our own country, in Germany, in Norway, in Russia, in India, in the isles of the sea, the cry has been raised, "BEHOLD, THE BRIDEGROOM COMETH; GO YE OUT TO MEET HIM!" Never, never, since the days of the early Christians, has there been so much earnest longing, expecting, preaching, believing, and praying upon the subject of the nearness of Christ's coming. The interest, the study, and the faith are by no means as general as they should be, but general and intense, enlightened and earnest enough to warrant us in saying that this sign of the end has papeared.

A Physician's Testimony.—Dr. Tilbury Fox, who recently died, was a physician to University College Hospital, London, and widely known for his medical writings. He was a Fellow of University College, and was appointed Lettsomian Lecturer to the Medical Society of London in 1869 and 1870. He was also one of the editors of our able medical contemporary the Lancet, the last number of which contained the following interesting paragraph: Dr. Tilbury Fox left a written request that it should be reported of him in any obituary notice that might appear in the Lancet, "I die a Christian in the now, I fear, much despised sense of that term, a 'simple believer in Jesus Christ as a personal living and loving Saviour,' without any righteousness of my own, but perfect and secure in His: and that 'I know in whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed to Him until that day.'"

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Present Lull in Politics is Enjoyable after the scenes of the extra session. It will unfortunately be of short duration, as the fall campaign must shortly commence.

Less has been heard lately of the proposition to try for a third term for Gen. Grant, and the current in favor of a Republican nomination of Secretary Sherman increases. A general impression exists that Mr. Tilden will secure the Democratic nomination, but should he do so it will not be unanimous nor enthusiastic.

The Yellow Fever Accounts from Memphis, were more reassuring a few days since, but have again assumed an alarming character. Physicians advise all persons who can leave the city to do so immediately. Nearly every wholesale house of prominence has made arrangements and is busily engaged in shipping its stock to other cities. A run through the wholesale groceries of the city reveals the startling information that there are not provisions sufficient in the entire city to last two weeks. By Monday every wealthy man will have left the city, and then will come the crisis. The poor people must be fed, and the question naturally arises, who will feed them? Upon the first outbreak of the fever, merchants began reducing their stocks, until the situation is as stated. It is the desire of the officials that all should leave the city, but there are thousands of poor people here who cannot go unless furnished transportation, and even then would have to be fed after having been driven from home.

The cessation of all business throws fully 10,000 people upon the charity of the world, and the future to them is indeed anything but cheering. Even were all to go into camps, as it is proposed, they would still have to be furnished with the necessaries of life. These stubborn facts are staring the people in the face, and what the ultimate result will be depends in a great measure upon the wisdom and sound policy of a few citizens who will be left to battle with the disease and the demands of the pauper multitude.

A citizens' relief committee will doubtless be organized and suggest some plan whereby those poor people who have no means can be sent to a place of safety. The government will doubtless be called upon to aid the committee by furnishing tents and supplies. It is the purpose of those in authority to depopulate the city, if such a thing can be accomplished, but it is feared the task will be impossible, as there are hundreds who will not go and cannot be driven away, preferring to remain and take the chances of death, if free rations are served them.

An Investigation of the Sanitary State of New York streets has been published, and reveals a condition of things which is, to say the least of it, very alarming. The heaps of garbage in the open streets with the putrefying bodies of dead cats on them, reeking filth running in the gutters, are to be seen in many places where crowded tenement houses abound. The report says: "In many parts of the city the sidewalks were one mass of filth. To describe this dirt would require the careful analysis of a first class chemist. Decayed vegetables formed the bulk of it; but lying closely around were clam shells, dirty straw, pigs' feet, all piled into various heaps, and some of these surmounted by cast-off straw and felt hats, others by old boots and hoopskirts. Tomatoes, in their natural state, never failed to add color, if not flavor, to the piles; but disgusting as were these heaps, they were, nevertheless, not so offensive as the garbage boxes lining and fringing the sidewalks, where hundreds of women and children were perambulating and inhaling the foul gases that were constantly rising from them." This with the thermometer registering 101 in the shade, as it did last week, is extending an invitation to pestilence.

A Ship Canal for Florida is again under Consideration, and this time with better prospects of realization. It is asserted that M. de Lesseps, of Suez Canal fame, is ready to undertake the work, providing the Federal Government will grant him a charter securing his rights in times of peace and of war.

The line of the canal is to run from a point on the St. John's River on the Atlantic side to a point on the Suwanee on the Gulf, and the intervening space to be dug out is said to be only sixty miles long. This is a shorter distance than the Suez Canal, which is eighty miles in length, and the soil of Florida presents no difficulties in the way of construction. M. Lesseps will not ask pecuniary assistance from the Government, as he considers the canal will be a commercial success. The journey from New York to New Orleans by this route would be reduced to four days, and the most dangerous point in the passage would be avoided. It is believed that the work including the harbor accommodations might be concluded in three and a half years.

Sunday Excursions.—Those who Advocate excursions on Sundays as a necessary relief to overworked humanity in cities should notice the report of what occurred on board a steamer which left New York on Sunday last and was returning in the evening. A crowd of drunken men commenced to quarrel violently. "When a fallen drunkard had been raised to his feet by one of the party, who tried to remove him to the front of the boat, he became violent, pulled away and struck his friend a damaging blow in the eye. The ruffians then clinched, and at this point a policeman rushed on the scene, and with a good deal of difficulty parted the antagonists. The companions of these brawlers attempted to prevent the arrest of the most intoxicated one of the party, and several of the deck-hands and another policeman joined in the trouble. Clubs were drawn and laid right and left, oaths were uttered, chairs were knocked over, a crowd gathered about the struggling men, and for a time the whole after-part of the main deck was a scene of wild disorder, which was ended by the removal of the chief cause of the disturbance to a place of security forward. The whole scene lasted from twenty to thirty minutes. It was remarked by respectable looking persons who were present that they should think uo decent person who saw such occurrences on the boat would care to make a second Sunday trip.

Dr. Talmage in England.—The New York Herald publishes the following cable despatch from its English correspondent describing the hearty reception accorded to the eloquent preacher:

"The Rev. Dr. Talmage preached and lectured ten times during the past week. On Tuesday he lectured at the Crystal Palace, Sydenham. The trains from London thither took down immense crowds, and it was estimated tha from twenty to thirty thousand persons listene to or at least saw the lecturer. The Marquis o Townsend presided. On Wednesday and Saturday Dr. Talmage lectured in Exeter Hall Lord Kintore presided, and many of the nobilit were present. During the week the Brookly divine has addressed no less than from sevent to eighty thousand people."

An Ocean Steamer Wrecked.—The State o Virginia, of the State Line Company, whic sailed from New York on July 10th, was unhappily lost on Saturday, the 12th, on the treacherous sands off Sable Island. She ran into a dens fog on Friday, and struck, seven miles off th south end of Sable Island, on Saturday evenin at eight o'clock. She had fortunately but fe passengers; but of these, nine—all women an children—were drowned by the capsizing of lifeboat which had come out from the island t the rescue, and which was overturned in th surf when near the land.

Dead-Sea Fruit would be an Appropriate Nam for the plunder secured by the robbery of th Manhattan Bank in New York on October 2 1878. The burglary was cleverly planned, an was executed with consummate skill. Th thieves had secured confederates outside th bank and inside, they had allies in the employe of the bank and in the police force, and the Pre ident of the bank had unwittingly played in their hands by entrusting a humble employ with the secret method of opening the sa Thus everything seemed to run in their fav and they plundered the bank of three and a h millions of dollars. But from the moment th gained possession of their booty the curre turned against them. The action of Congr in issuing duplicate bonds made a large porti of the proceeds valueless, and a considerable su of the remainder was disbursed in bribes to eff the defeat of the measure. Further sums we in bribes in other quarters until the remna must have been a contemptible sum as comp sation for their labor and risk. Finally, t treachery of an accomplice caused the arrest the gang, and the leader has now been senten to twenty years' imprisonment. All they ha netted by their plot has been a heavy pena and the loss of their apparent gains. They ha learned at a fearful cost the truth of the scr tural warning, that God disappoints the devi of the crafty (Job 5:12).

Slips of Rose Geranium are Asked for by t flower distributors connected with the Rivi ton Street Flower Mission in New York, w are kept busy distributing the large quantit of flowers that arrive by railroad, steamboat, a mail for the sick and poor of the tenem houses. Since May 50,000 bouquets and pla have been given away. The distributors constantly asked for slips of rose geraniu which poor families plant in old cans or bo with soil gathered from the street, and the perintendent of the mission would be glad to ceive these little gifts which will tend to brigh homes in which bright things are scarce (M 10.42).

The Gospel Pavilion of the Young Men's Christian Association has been opened for the ummer in Brooklyn. It is a wooden building, octagonal in shape, with two cupolas on the roof which serve as air-shafts. The ceiling is painted light blue, the sides in French gray. The uditorium seats 610 persons, and with extra hairs will accommodate 750. At one end is a arge platform, seating ninety persons, designed or the choir and speakers. Situated in a conpicuous position by the wayside, it will doubtless ttract multitudes who would otherwise spend he afternoon aimlessly in the Park, and the truth proclaimed within its walls may find a lodgment n many hearts.

A Veteran Heroine of the Yellow Fever truggle is Mary Ann, or "Grandma" Wilson, as he is called, a vender of peanuts in New Oreans, an industrious, cheerful, withered old woman, who has plied her humble calling in St. Charles Street for more than forty years. She is he most famous yellow-fever nurse in the South —a fact which one would never learn from her wn lips. She took excellent care of patients uring the prevalence of the scourge there in 837, and again in 1853 she was faithfully at her ost. Two years later, when the fever raged at Norfolk, she went there and rendered efficient ervice. She went at other seasons to Savannah nd Memphis, and did her utmost to relieve hose who had been attacked by the pestilence. Last summer found her at Grenada, where for hirty-eight days and nights she battled with the isease, ministering to the sick and dying with a enderness and devotion not to be exceeded. She may still be seen in St. Charles Street sellng peanuts, apparently unconscious that she had done anything more than her plain duty.

The Cost of Superstition is Occasionally a erious one. It has involved a Nevada miner in he loss of a fortune. While sinking a shaft in owa Gulch with the most sanguine expectaions, he found a dead cat in his shaft. Being a uperstitious man, he looked upon it as an evil omen. The thought distressed him; he could not work, and, after many vain efforts, he finally hrew down his tools and concluded that he would go down and try to divert his mind a litle. Accordingly, he went to town, where he abandoned himself to drinking and dissipation, his debauch lasting for several days. Meanwhile some men who had started a hole close to his shaft struck mineral and surveyed him in, whereby he lost a fortune.

The Secret of Success was Explained Last week at the Fulton Street Prayer-meeting. A business man who had achieved a remarkable uccess, said that the foundation of it might be ound in Proverbs 3:5, 6. The Bible was the best book for the business man, and its rules for he counting-house, store, office, mill, or factory could not be equalled. It prevented worry, and worry kills more people than overwork. The Bible says, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee" (Isaiah 26:3).

The German Emperor's Religious Views.—At the commemoration festival of a religious society connected with the Cathedral in Berlin, he Emperor, after the service and ceremony were over, spoke to the following effect: "If here is anything capable of acting as a stay to us in the life and turmoil of the present time it s the support alone to be found in Jesus Christ. Let not yourselves, therefore, be misled, gentlemen, by the tendencies prevailing in the world, especially in our days, and do not join the great multitude who either entirely leave the Bible out of account as the only source of truth, or alsely interpret it. The ground and rock to which I and all of us must cling is the unadulterated faith as taught us by the Bible. There are many who do not pursue the same path; every one does as best he can, according to his knowledge and his conscience, shaping in conformity therewith all his acts and all his ways. I esteem, honor, and tolerate them; each one can act as his conscience dictates, but all must, nevertheless, build on the ground alone of the Bible and the Gospel."

Prayer and Physic.—Dr. G. de Gorrequer Griffith writes: "Recently I have had under my care a young girl suffering from acute rheumatic fever. She had got inflammation of the heart and its encasings. Her sufferings were excruciating. She seemed almost beyond the power of drugs. I, however, continued them, praying for a blessing on their use, and the preservation of her life, if God saw fit. I could not ascertain that she had prepared to meet God. One evening she seemed to be dying, the father told me. Suddenly, when at the worst, she said, 'I see the angels coming for me; see, father, here they come!' The agonized father had prayed for the life of his child, and now redoubled his entreaties. As he prayed, she said in a disappointed tone, 'Ah, father, they are not coming for me now: they have turned back!' I arrived soon after, and pronounced that she was not dying; that she was really better than when I had seen her in the morning, and that now the probabilities of recovery were more in her favor. Of course I continued the means for bringing about such an end, for 'faith without works is dead,' and she convalesced rapidly."

The Poisoned Missionaries.—An Investigation has been made as to the death by poison at New Guinea of the six native teachers connected with the London Missionary Society, mentioned in the Christian Herald June 5th. On hearing of the sad affair the Rev. J. Chalmers immediately visited the eastern shore of New Guinea and examined the natives at Isuisu, where the teachers were located. The natives denied that they had poisoned the teachers; but they were ready to give compensation for the deaths. The people said that the poisoning was done by a sorcerer named Nauagere, at the request of some natives of Isuisu, who wanted the goods of the teachers. Mr. Chalmers found that the boxes had been broken open and the goods stolen. He was urged to lead an expedition against Nauagere and take revenge on him. "Let us," said the people, "go and take Nauagere. We should like to eat him." This proposal Mr. Chalmers of course declined.

The missionaries and teachers are still continuing their work in the neighborhood, notwithstanding that they are working among cannibals, and their lives are in constant peril.

The Crippled Praying Child.—Mr. Moody says:—"I once knew a little cripple who had given herself to God, and was distressed because she could not labor for him actively among the lost. Her pastor visited her, and, hearing her complaint, told her that from her sick-bed she could offer prayers for those whom she wished to see turning to God. He advised her to write the names down, and then pray earnestly; and then he went away, and thought of the subject no more. Soon a feeling of great religious interest sprang up in the village, and the churches were crowded nigthly. The little cripple heard of the progress of the revival, and inquired anxiously for the saved. A few weeks later she died, and among a roll of papers that was found under her little pillow was one bearing the names of fifty-six persons, every one of whom had in the revival been converted. By each name was a cross, by which the crippled saint had checked off the converts as they had been reported."

A Welsh Minister, a Man of God, beginning his sermon, leaned over the pulpit, and said with a solemn air, "Friends, I have a question to ask. I cannot answer it. You cannot answer it. If an angel from heaven were here he could not answer it. If a devil from hell were here he could not answer it!" Death-like silence reigned. Every eye was fixed on the speaker. He proceeded, "The question is this, 'How shall we escape if we neglect so great a salvation?'" (Heb. 2.)

The First Volume of the "Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times," comprising Nos. 1 to 36, from October 24th, 1878, to June 26th, 1879, will shortly be ready, and may be had, bound in cloth, for $2.50, on application at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

OUR CHANGE OF MASTERS.

A New Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"Being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness."—Romans 6:18.

Man's Place in Creation—A Master and a Servant—The Brute in Man—The Spirit's Strife with the Brute—An Interregnum Impossible—I. Our Change of Masters—1. Our Old Master—His Livery—Servant out of Livery—Go-Betweens—Out-Door Servants—2. How we became Free—By Purchase—By Our Death—By Our Resurrection—3. Our New Master—II. Why we Changed Masters—The Old Service was Shameful and Unprofitable—What the New Service brings us—III. The Consequences of the Change—Haydn and the Music Seller—Entire Devotion—No Restraint Needed.

Man was made to rule. In the divine original he was intended for a king, who should have dominion over the beasts of the field, and the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea. He was designed to be the lord-lieutenant of this part of creation, and the form of his body and the dignity of his countenance betoken it. He walks erect among the animals, while they move upon all-fours; he subjugates and tames them to perform his will, and the fear and dread of him is upon all creatures, for they know their sovereign.

Yet is it equally true that man was made to serve. At his beginning he was placed in the garden to keep it, and to dress it, and so to serve his Maker. His natural feebleness, his dependence upon rain, and sun, and dew, his instinctive awe of an unseen and omnipotent spirit, indicate that he is not the chief of the universe, but a subordinate being, whose lot it is to serve. We find within man various powers and propensities seeking to get dominion over him, so that his mind also is capable of servitude. The appetites which are essential for the sustenance of his bodily frame, even such as eating and drinking, endeavor to master him, and if they can they will do so, and reduce him below the level of the swine.

Man is in part spirit, but he is also in part animal, and the animal strives to get dominion over the spiritual; and in many, many men it does so, till they are utterly degraded. Nothing can be worse than a soul enslaved by such a body as that of man. The brute nature of man is the worst sort of brute. There is no beast in wolf, or lion, or serpent that is so brutish as the beast in man. Did I not tell you last Sabbath day that whereas, according to the Levitical law, he that touched a dead animal was unclean till the evening, he who touched a dead man was unclean seven days, for man is a seven times more polluting creature than any of the beasts of the field when his animal nature rules him.

If evil aims at ruling man, the good Spirit also strives with him. When God of His infinite mercy visits man by his Spirit, that Spirit does not come as a neutral power to dwell quietly within man, and to share his heart with the Prince of Darkness, but he enters with full intent to reign. Hence there is a conflict which cannot be ended by an armistice, but must be carried on to the end, and that end will be found either in the driving out of the evil or in the thrusting out of the good; for one or the other, either the Prince of Darkness or the King of Light, will have dominion over man he cannot serve two masters, but he must serve one. Of all sorts of men this has been true, and it has perhaps been most clearly seen in those who were evidently made to lead their fellow men: it is especially seen in such a man, for instance, as Alexander, a true king of men, so heroic and great-hearted that one does not wonder that armies were fired with enthusiasm by his presence, and drove everything before them.

Alexander conquered the world, and yet on occasions he became the captive of drunkenness and the bondsman of his passionate temper. At such times the king of men, the vanquisher of armies, was little better than a raving maniac.

Look for further illustration at the busts of the emperors of Rome, the masters of the world; study their faces, and mark what groveling creatures they must have been. Rome had many slaves, but he who wore her purple was the most in bonds. No slave that ground at the mill, or died in the amphitheatre, was more in bondage than such men as Tiberius and Nero, who were the bond-slaves of their passions.

High rank does not save a man from being under a mastery: neither does learning nor philosophy deliver men from this bondage, for the teachers of liberty have not themselves been free, but it has happened as the apostle saith, "While they promise them liberty they themselves are the servants of corruption." Solomon himself, with all his wisdom, played the fool exceedingly; and though he was the most sagacious ruler of his age, he became for awhile completely subject to his fleshly desires.

Man is born to be a servant, and a servant he must be. Who shall be his master? That is the question. Our text proves the point with which I have started, for it speaks of "being made free from sin," and in the same breath it adds, "Ye became the servants of righteousness." There is no interregnum: there does not appear to be a moment left for an independent State, but out of one servitude we pass into another.

Do not think I made a mistake in the use of the word servitude; I might have translated the Greek word by that of slave, and have been correct. "Being made free from sin, ye were enslaved to righteousness." The apostle makes an excuse for using the figure, and says, "I speak after the manner of men, because of the infirmity of your flesh." He did not know how else to describe it, for when we come from under the absolute power of sin we come at once into a like subjection to righteousness; as we were governed and swayed by the love of sin, so we become in a similar manner subject to the forces of grace and truth.

Man passes from one master to another, but he is always in subjection. Free will I have often heard of, but I have never seen it. I have met with will, and plenty of it, but it has either been led captive by sin or held in blessed bonds of grace. The passions drive it hither and thither like a rolling thing before a whirlwind; or the understanding sways it, and then, according as the understanding is darkened or enlightened, the will acts for good or evil. In any case the bit is in its mouth, and it is guided by a power beyond itself.

However, I leave that question, and call attention this morning first of all to our change of masters—"Being made free from sin, we become the servants of righteousness": secondly, to the reasons for that change; and thirdly, to the consequences of that change.

I. We begin with our change of masters. We must have a master, but some of us by divine grace have made a change of masters infinitely to our advantage. In describing this inward revolution we will begin with a word or two upon

OUR OLD MASTER.

The apostle says in the verse preceding our text, "Ye were the servants of sin." How true that is! Those of us who now believe, and are free from sin, were all without exception the servants of sin. We were not all alike enslaved, but we were all under bondage

Sin has its liveried servants. Did you ever see a man dressed in the full livery of sin? A fine suit, I warrant you! Sin clothes its slave with rags, with shame, and often with disease. When fully dressed in Satan's uniform the sinner is abominable, even to his fellow sinners. If you want to see sin's liveried servants dressed out in their best or their worst, go to the prison, and you will find them there; or go to the dens of infamy in this great city, or to the liquor-bars, or to the places of vicious amusement, and you will find them there. Many of them wear the badge of the devil's drudgery upon their backs in poverty and rags, upon their faces in the blotches born of drunkenness, and in their very bones in the consequences of their vice. Satan has regimentals for his soldiers, and they are worthy of the service.

But great folks have many servants who are out of livery, and so has sin. We were not all open transgressors before our new birth, though we were all the servants of sin. There are many slaves of evil whom you would not know to be such if you only saw the surface of their characters. They do not swear, or steal, or commit adultery, or even break the Sabbath outwardly; on the contrary, they are most moral in their conduct. They stood up and sung the hymn just now, they bowed their heads in prayer, and they are now listening to the sermon, and no one will know the difference between them and the servants of Christ by their exterior; but at heart they reject the Son of God, and refuse to believe in Him, for they love the pleasures of sin and the wages of unrighteousness.

Hypocrites are worse slaves than any others, because they are laid under the restraints of religious men without enjoying their consolations, and they practise the sins of the ungodly without their pleasures. Every hypocrite is a fool and a coward; he has not the will to serve the Lord, and yet he has not the courage to serve the devil out and out. These go-betweens are of all sorts of people the most to be pitied and the most to be blamed.

As long as we are unbelievers we are the servants of sin, but we are not all out-door servants of sin. Sin has its domestic servants who keep quiet, as well as its soldiers who beat the drum. Many keep their sin to themselves: nobody hears of them in the street, they raise no public scandal, and yet at heart they are the faithful followers of wickedness and rebellion. Their idols are set up in secret chambers, but they are heartily loved. Their desires and aspirations are all selfish, but they try to conceal this fact even from themselves; they will not serve God, they will not bow before his Son, and yet they would shrink from avowing their rebellion. They are amiable, admirable, and excellent in their outward deportment; but they are the in-door servants of Satan for all that, and their heart is full of enmity against God.

There are, however, many believers, who were once out-door servants of Satan, sinning openly and in defiance of all law. I thank God that there are some here who are now the servants of Christ, upon whom I can look with great delight, although they were once the open, overt, zealous, diligent servants of the devil. Now they are washed, renewed, and sanctified. Glory be to God for it.

2. HOW CAME WE TO BE FREE?

We have become free in three ways. First, by purchase, for our Saviour has paid the full redemption money for us, and there is not a halfpenny due upon us. Blessed be His name, there is no mortgage on His inheritance; the price is all paid and we are Christ's unencumbered property forever. Here we stand at this moment free, because we are ransomed, and we know that our Redeemer liveth. Our body, soul, and spirit are all bought with a price, and in our complete manhood we are Christ's.

2. We are free in a strange way. According to the chapter in which we find our text we are free because we have died. If a slave dies, his master's possession in him is ended. The tyrant can rule no longer, death has relaxed his hold. "He that is dead is free from sin." Sin comes to me and asks me why I do not obey its desires. I have a reply ready. "Ah, Master Sin, I am dead! I died some thirty years ago, and I do not belong to you any more. What have you to do with me?"

3. We have risen again. According to Paul's teaching we have risen in the resurrection of Christ: a new life has been given to us: we are new creatures in Christ Jesus. We are not the same people that we once were; old things have passed away, behold all things have become new. If some of you were to meet your old selves you would not know yourselves, would you? My old self does not know me, and cannot make me out. I am dead to him as to his reigning power, and buried too, so that I can never be his subject, nor can he ever be the king of my heart, yet he struggles to dwell within me, and seems to have as many lives as a cat.

Every now and then my old self sneeringly cries to my true self, "What a fool you are." My true self answers, "No, I was a fool when you had sway, but now I have come to my right mind." Sometimes that old self whispers, "There is no reality in faith," and the new self replies, "There is no reality in the things which are seen. This world is a shadow, but heaven is eternal." "Ah," says the old self, "you are a hypocrite." "No," says the new self, "I was false when I was under your power, but now I am honest and true." Yes, brethren, we are risen with Christ: with Him we died and were buried, and with Him we are risen, and hence we are free.

OUR NEW MASTER.

3. Now, the third part of this change of masters is this—"ye became the servants of righteousness." So we have done, and we are now in the possession of righteousness and under its rule. A righteous God has made us die to sin: a righteous God has redeemed us: a new and righteous life has been infused into us, and now righteousness rules and reigns in us. We do not belong to ourselves, but we yield ourselves up entirely to the Redeemer's sway through His Spirit and the more completely He rules us the better

The text says we are enslaved to righteousness, and so we wish to be. We wish we wer so enslaved that we could not even will a wron thing nor wish an evil thing. We desire to giv ourselves up wholly and absolutely to the divin sway, so that the right, and the true, and th good may hold us in perpetual bonds. W abandon ourselves to the supremacy of God, an we find our liberty in being entirely subjecte to the will of the Most High. This is a chang of masters with which I know that some of yo are well acquainted. I am afraid, however, th others of you know nothing about it. May th Lord grant that you may be made to know it b fore you go to sleep to-night. May you be d livered from the black tyrant and brought in the service of the Prince of Peace, and th straightway.

II. Secondly, let us survey

THE REASONS FOR OUR CHANGE.

How do we justify this change of masters? man who makes frequent shifts is not good f much. But we changed our old master becau he never had any right to us, and we w illegally detained by him. Why should sin ha dominion over us? Sin did not make us, sin d not feed us, sin has no right to us whatever; never owed it a moment's homage; we are debtors to the flesh to live after the flesh.

Our old master cannot summon us for des tion, for he stole our services. Besides, our master was as bad as bad could be. You ne saw his portrait; but he that would paint a ture of sin would have to put upon the can all the monstrosities that ever existed, and the horrors that were ever imagined, and the would have to be exaggerated and conden into one, before they could fairly depict the formity of sin. Sin is worse than the devil, sin made the devil a devil; he would have b an angel if it had not been for sin. Oh, w would serve the destroying tyrant who of cast down even the stars of light and tur angels into fiends?

We ran away from our old master becaus had never any profit at his hands. The apo says, "What fruit had he then?" Ask drunkard, "What did you get by the drin Who hath woe? Who hath redness of eyes? Ask the spendthrift what he ga by his debauchery. He would hardly lik tell you, and I certainly should not like to peat his tale. Ask any man that lives in what he has gained by it, and you will fi is all loss; sin is evil and only evil, and continually. We have found that out, therefore we have quitted the old master taken up with the new.

Beside that, our old masters, sin, brought us shame. There was no honor in serving him. His work is called by Paul, "those things whereof ye are now ashamed." We are in the sight of God, ay, and in our own sight, ready to blush scarlet at the very thought of the evil in which we once took delight. Sin is a groveling, mean, despicable thing, and we are ashamed of having been connected with it. Moreover its wages are death, and this is dreadful to think upon. Sin at one time was pleasant to us, but when we found out that sin led its servants down to hell, and plunged them into fire unquenchable, we renounced its rule, and found another lord.

But why did we take up with our new Master? We could not help it, for it was He that set us free; it was He that bought us, it was He that fought for us, it was He that brought us into liberty. Ah, if you could see Him you would not ask us why we became His servants. In the first place, we owe ourselves wholly to Him; and in the next place, if we did not, He is so altogether lovely, so matchless, and so charming, that if we had a free choice of masters we would choose him a thousand times over, for He is the crown and glory of mankind, among the sons there is none to be compared to Him.

III. In the third place, and very practically, I want to talk to those who are servants of God upon

THE CONSEQUENCES OF THIS CHANGE.

Ye have become the servants of righteousness, and the first consequence is that you belong wholly to your Lord. Have you recognized this? I know numbers of Christian people—I hope they are Christian people, for in some points they seem as if they were—but if I were asked to look at their lives, and give an opinion as to whom they belong, I should be compelled to say, "They seem mostly to belong to themselves." To whom does their property belong? "To themselves." To whom does their time belong? "To themselves." To whom does their talent belong? "To themselves." As far as I can see they lay all out upon themselves, and live for themselves. And what do they give to God? If they are rather generous they give Him the candle-ends and the parings of the cheese, and little odds and ends, threepenny-bits, and things they do not want, and can give without missing them.

There are hundreds of professors who never gave God anything that cost them a self-denial; no, not so much as going without a dish on the table, or a picture on the wall, or a ring on the finger. There are numbers of professing Christians who spend a deal more on the soles of their boots than on Christ, and many women who spend more on the feathers and the flowers which deck their bonnets than on their Saviour. Yes, and I have heard of men who said they were perfect, and yet they were worth half a million of money, and were hoarding up more! Sinners dying and being damned and missionaries without support, and yet these absolutely perfect men are piling up gold and letting the cause of Christ stop for means. It is not my theory of perfection, nay, it does not seem to me to come up to the idea of a common Christian who says he is not his own.

What next? Why, because you are Christ's His very name is dear to you. You are not so His slave that you would escape from His service if you could; no, but you would plunge deeper and deeper into it. You want to be more and more the Lord's. His very name is sweet to you.

Haydn, the great musician, one day walked down a London street, and turning into a music-seller's shop, he asked the salesman if he had any select and beautiful music. "Well, sir," said he, "I have some sublime music by Mr. Haydn." "Oh," said Haydn, "I'll have nothing to do with that." "Why, sir, you come to buy music and will have nothing to do with Mr. Haydn's composition? What fault can you find with it?" "I can find a great deal of fault with it, but I will not argue with you: I do not want any of his music." "Then," said the shopkeeper, "I have other music, but it is not for such as you," and he turned his back on him. A thorough enthusiast grows impatient of those who do not appreciate what he so much admires.

If we love Jesus we shall sometimes feel an impatient desire to get away from those who know him not. You do not love Christ? What kind of man can you be to be so blind, so dead? You can be no friend of mine if you are not a friend of Christ's. I would do anything for your good, but you cannot yield me delight or be my bosom friend unless you love my Lord, for he has engrossed my heart and taken entire possession of my spirit. If you have thus become a servant of righteousness you will weary of that which does not help you in his service, but the name of your Master will be as choicest music to you.

And now, dear friends, let me mention another result. All your members are henceforth reserved for Christ. What does the apostle say? "When ye were the servants of sin ye were free from righteousness." When Satan was your master you did not care about Christ, did you? You had no respect for him, and if anybody brought the words of Jesus before you, you said, "Take them away—I do not want to hear them." You went wholly in for evil. Now, just in the same way yield yourself up wholly to Christ, and say, "Now, Satan, when I was yours I did not yield obedience to Jesus, and now that I am Christ's I can yield no obedience to you."

If Satan brings sin before you, say, "I cannot see it: my eyes are Christ's:" and if he would charm you with the sweet sound of temptation, say, "I cannot hear it: my ears are Christ's." "Oh," saith he, "seize on this delight." You answer, "I cannot reach it; my hands are Christ's." "But taste this sweet draught," saith he. You say, "I cannot take it; my lips are Christ's, my mouth is Christ's, all my members are Christ's." "Well, but you can form a judgment, cannot you, about this error?" "No, I do not want to know anything about it; my understanding is Christ's." "Oh, but hear this new thing." "No, I do not want to hear it; I have found Christ, who is new enough for me; I do not want your novel discoveries; I am dead to them. I do not want to be worried with arguments which dishonor my Lord: take them away. When I was a servant of sin I would not meddle with the truth, and now that I am a servant of Christ I will not trifle in the opposite direction; I have done with all but Jesus."

Think, my brethren, when we were servants of sin in what way we served it; for just as we used to serve sin, so ought we to work for Jesus. I do not speak to all here present, but I speak to many who were sinners of an open kind: how did you serve sin? I will answer for them. They did not require to be egged on to it; they did not want any messenger of the devil to plead with them and urge them to unholy pleasures and unclean delights. Far from it; some even of their own companions thought them too imprudent. Now, dear friends, you ought not to want your ministers or Christian friends to stir you up to good works; you ought to be just as eager after holiness as you were after sin. Evil was very sweet to you once. You used to watch for the day when you could indulge in a sweet sin; did you not? When the time was coming round when you could take a deep draught of iniquity, you took the almanac and looked for it as a child for his holidays. You did not mind travelling from town to town to make a round of dissipation. Brother, serve Christ in the same way. May His Holy Spirit help you to do so. Watch for opportunities of doing good; do not need whipping to duty. Instead of requiring to be urged forward in evil we needed holding back: did we not? Our parents had to put the rein upon us! Sometimes mother would say, "John, do not so," and father would cry, "My boy, do not this." We wanted a deal of restraint.

I wish I had a band of Christians round me who needed holding back in the service of Christ; I have not met with that sort yet. I am prepared with any kind of curb when I meet with a high-mettled Christian, who goes at too great a rate in His Lord's service. For the most part my Master's horses are fonder of getting into the stables than out into the hunting field. I have not met with one who has done too much for the Lord. I shall never be guilty of too much work myself; I wish I could go like the wind in serving Jesus.

Oh, who will be my Master's servant? Here He comes! Do you not see Him? He wears upon His head no diadem but the crown of thorns; adown His cheeks you see the spittle flowing, His feet are still rubied with their wounds, and His hands are still bejewelled with the marks of the nails. This is your Master, and these are the insignia of His love for you. What service will you render Him? That of a mere professor, who names His name but loves Him not? That of a cold religionist, who renders unwilling service out of fear? I pray you, brethren, do not so dishonor Him.

I lift the standard this morning to enlist beneath the banner of Christ those who will henceforth be Christ's men from head to foot; and happy shall the Church be, and happy the entire Israel of God, if a chosen number shall enlist and remain true to their colors. We need no more of your nominal Christians, your lukewarm Christians, whom my Master spews out of His mouth; we need men on fire with love, all over consecrated, intensely devoted, who, by the slavery from which they have escaped, and by the liberty into which they have entered, are under bond to spend and be spent for the name of Jesus, till they have filled the earth with His glory, and made all heaven ring with His praise. The Lord bless you, beloved, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S SERMONS PUBLISHED IN THIS JOURNAL ARE INSERTED WITH HIS CONCURRENCE AND ARE REVISED BY HIMSELF.

A Dying Signal.—A Child of God was drawing nigh to the dark river. She had become a prey to consumption, which flushed her cheek and wasted her frail frame; but as the outward man perished, the inward man was renewed. At last the end came, and friends gathered lovingly around to catch her parting words. To speak was then impossible, but, anxious to testify of the Lord's power to sustain, the dying girl summoned all her strength to her aid, and, raising her bands, she spelt on her pale thin fingers, in the letters of the dumb alphabet, the simple yet sublime words—"PERFECT PEACE." Then swiftly her spirit winged its flight; but the testimony left behind shines forth as a bright beacon over the dark waters of sin and unbelief, and is a clear fulfilment of the declaration of Holy Writ—"Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee."

The Future of Egypt is thus Foreshadowed by a distinguished commentator, Dr. Schaff. In his recently published "Bible Lands," speaking of the Egyptians, he says: "Is there any hope for such a people? Undoubtedly there is, in God's own god time and way. Great political changes must precede. It is not impossible that Egypt, the highway to British India, will before long be annexed to England. The most intelligent men in Egypt, not interested in the present reign of the Khedive, desire it, knowing that England has a strong and honest government, would throw a vast amount of capital into the country, and promote liberty, education, and industry among the people. An English protectorate over Egypt would be a part of the solution of the Eastern Question. It would prepare the way for a still higher solution, the triumph of the Cross over the Crescent. 'The Egyptians shall cry unto the Lord because of the oppressors, and He shall send them a Saviour, and a great one, and He shall deliver them. And the Lord shall be known to Egypt, and the Egyptians shall know the Lord' (Isaiah 19: 20, 21)."

FATE OF THE POPE AND THE SULTAN IN 1882.

Three Definitions of One Period—The Antichristian Power—The Iron and the Clay—Two Cities of Seven Hills—Duration of Mohammedan Power—End of the Pope's Temporal Power.

"We must not," it is well said, "disregard the chronological evidences of the close of the present dispensation which God has caused to be written for our learning. They form part of God's Word, and we shall do well to take heed to them." God has on various occasions in past dispensations foretold to His servants the periods and dates of events specially concerning them, and He has, we have good reason to conclude, done as much for us upon whom the end of this age has come.

Now among the most prominent and important of the chronological periods embraced by this dispensation is that of the spoken of in the Book of Revelation as 1260 days and 42 months, and by Daniel as a time, (two) times, and half a time; these three definitions being obviously equivalent terms. This period of 1260 years has been supposed by almost all commentators of the historical school--so called in contradistinction to the Futurists who regard the whole of this period as still future—to define the continuance of a certain Antichristian power, or Antichristian powers; and has been applied by numerous writers to the Papal Power and the Mohammedan Power.

In order to give solidity to the argument, however, it is necessary to go back a little. All Protestant interpreters understand the Great Image, of gold, silver, brass, and iron, seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his dream, and interpreted by Daniel, to represent the four great monarchies which were to bear rule over Israel, and, as it were, usurp her place as the chief world-power during "the times of the Gentiles," namely, the Babylonian, the Medo-Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman, which, as we know, arose successively one after another (Daniel 2 and 7).

But the fourth and last of these great kingdoms was to be "strong as iron," and was eventually to become, in its divided condition, "part of iron and part of clay, partly strong and partly broken." We know how exactly all this was fulfilled in the great empire which was reigning when our Lord was crucified and the Gospel was promulgated in the world. The very name of Rome, derived from ρώμη, "strength," as Solinus and other Latin authorities suggest, seems to be alluded to in the prophecy which foretold that the last of the four kingdoms was to be "strong as iron."

Now, it is a remarkable fact in the interpretation of Apocalyptic prophecy, that about two hundred and fifty years after St. John wrote, the Roman Empire was divided into two parts, East and West, answering to the two feet of Daniel's image; and it is a very significant circumstance that the capital cities alike of Old and New Rome—as they were called—are found to have been built upon seven hills. The language of Revelation had clearly pointed out that "the seven heads of the scarlet-colored beast were seven mountains on which the woman sat," and "the woman" which St. John saw symbolized "that great city which was then reigning over the kings of the earth."

In St. John's age there was but one city in the world to which these words were applicable—the world-wide famous city of Rome. The names of its seven hills were well known as the Palatine, Quirinal, Aventine, Cœlian, Viminal, Esquiline, and Janiculan. And the unanimous voice of the Roman poets during more than five hundred years proclaimed Rome as "the seven-hilled city;" to which they proudly added, like Nebuchadnezzar of old, the lofty titles of "The Great," "The Mighty," "The Queen of Nations," "The Eternal City," "The Mistress of the World."

And so with regard to Constantinople, Von Hammer, the distinguished historian of the Turkish Empire, in his account of its capture by Mohammed II., in 1453, says, "Thus fell the city of seven names, seven hills, and seven towers, taken from the 7th of the Palæologi by the 7th Sultan of the Ottomans." The seven different names of the city alluded to were Byzantium, Antonia, New Rome, Constantinople, Farruch, an Arabic word signifying "earthdivider," Istambol, "the Fulness of Faith," and Ummeddunja, "the Mother of the World."

Let us now, then, mark the condition to which the heads of both Old and New Rome are reduced at the present time, as affording one of the most srtiking signs of the times in confirmation of the truth of God's sure word of prophecy and the proximate expiration of the great period of 1260 years.

THE PAPACY AND THE TURKISH POWER

arose about the same time.

About half a century ago there was discovered in the ruins of ancient Rome the "Pillar of Phocas," the inscription of which shows it to have been erected A.D. 608. In that year Phocas marks his favor to the Pope by giving him the Pantheon, a temple originally dedicated to Cybele and all the Pagan gods, but which was now characteristically dedicated to "the Virgin Mary and all the Martyrs," as a witness to the predicted apostasy of the Church of Rome.

It was just 1260 years after this that Pope Pius IX., after promulgating the heretical dogma of what was called "the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary," consummated the apostasy of the Roman Church by assembling the Vatican Council, which two years later proclaimed the Pope for the time being to be "infallible."

Speaking of the Mohammedan power, Luther, in his "Table Talk," at the commencement of the sixteenth century, says that "the Pope and the Turk both began almost at one time under the Emperor Phocas." This is true so far, that within a few years after the Bishop of Rome had assumed the title of "Universal Bishop,' which constituted him, according to Pope Gregory I., the predicted Antichrist, the Mohammedan woe began to be poured out on apostate Eastern Christendom.

And just as Nebuchadnezzar and his successors were the appointed agents of God for punishing the faithless Jews, notwithstanding that they formed the nominal "Church" of the Most High, so Mohammed and his successors have been the manifest agents and instruments in the hands of Jehovah for meting out just punishments upon those apostate Christians of the East, who, as much as their Papal brethren of the West, have been guilty of that which is so abominable in the sight of God—viz., the sin of idolatry; but who, as Scripture declares, "have not repented of the work of their hands, that they should not worship the deified dead and idols of gold and silver, and brass and stone, and of wood, which can neither see, nor hear, nor walk: neither repented they of their murders, nor of their sorceries, nor of their fornications, nor of their thefts" (Rev. 9).

Judging from analogy, the Mohammedan woe was destined to last for the same period of "time, times, and the dividing of time," or 1260 years, as the Papal apostasy; and inasmuch as the Hejira, or the flight of Mohammed from Mecca to Medina, from which their well-known era is dated, coincides with Friday, July 6th, A.D. 622, there is reason to suppose that at the expiration of the 1260 years there will be, in 1882, as marked a change in the Turkish Empire as occurred with the Papacy in 1870, when the Temporal Power came to its destined end, to the delight and satisfaction of the whole civilized world.

And it is undeniable that what Scripture appears to describe under the term of the "drying up of the great river Euphrates," whence the Ottoman power arose ten centuries ago, has been rapidly progressing ever since the year 1820, about which time Lamartine uttered that memorable saying in the French Senate, "Turkey is dying for want of Turks."

The remarkable events of the last two years, as seen in the Treaty of Berlin and the probable outcome of England's taking possession of the Isle of Cyprus leading to a similar step in regard to the land which God gave to Abraham and his seed as an everlasting possession, alike point to the handwriting now visible on the wall—Mene, Mene, Tekel. And as in the case of the fall of the temporal power of the Papacy, which ran its destined course of 1260 years from 610—1870, so may we expect from the sure word of prophecy that the words of Daniel will be literally accomplished in or about the year 1882:

"He shall plant the tabernacle of his palace between the sea in the glorious holy mountain; yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him." The festering corruption which has been going on for ages in Turkey, and which is exhausting its vitals, is one of many proofs that her end is drawing nigh, and making its approaching dissolution more and more certain, according to the unerring Word of God.

ELOQUENT MISSIONARY ADDRESS.

By Rev. Dr. W. Morley Punshon, delivered at the Annual Meeting of the Baptist Missionary Society in London.

Opium Traffic in China—A Religious Home Desirable—Demon Energy—Old Philosophies—Entrance of the Gospel into Foreign Lands—Christianity Alive—The Way God Works—We Want Them All.

I am thankful to hear, from the report of your Society, that one of your missionaries, Mr. Richard, has been the almoner of bounty, in conjunction with missionaries of other denominations, to the famine-stricken in China. I do not know where it is likely to have been better dispensed, I do not know where it was likely to have been more remuneratively laid out, for the results which will follow in the abating of prejudice and in the opening of access to the people for instruction and salvation.

I want to read you an extract from a lette which has just come to hand in reference to the famine in this Shansi district. One of the almoners in that country writes: "One othe matter in connection with this village relief work I cannot but allude to. It impressed me deeply as I pondered over it.

"In the second or third village I visited asked the head man, 'Have you any opium smokers here now?' 'No,' he replied, 'they ar all dead, and we have issued a notification tha any person smoking shall be prosecuted according to law.' 'Have you sold any opium?' I asked. 'No, not a grain, and we have prohibite its being sold,' he replied. After leaving th place I made inquiry as to the respective value of the wheat crop and the opium crop, and found that those Shansi villagers, with starvation staring them in the face, refused to cult vate the drug which they know is blighting the land."

Now, my friends, there is a volume of comme cial reports recently published by Her Majesty Consul, at Chi-ang and Che-foo, and he says tha one thing might be predicted with tolerable ce tainty, and that was that much less opium woul be grown in Chang-tung and King-su and Ho nung for the next few years than had been grow lately, because it was a widespread idea amon the Chinese that those sent from heaven for the increased cultivatio of the opium plant.

I do not enter into the largeness of this que tion now, but I do say that I trust from th Christian churches in this land there will rise u a protest, terrible in its intensity and passio earnest, calm—for passion is calm sometimes-sober, thoughtful, and determined, that th Christian country shall arise and shake its from complicity with that accursed traffic.

As to the general aspects of the mission caus we have room to be disheartened, some peop say, because really we have done so little. We we have done little compared with what we e pect to do, but we have done a good deal notwit standing. You have done a great deal; y have made a great lot of people—I was going say Baptists.

Let me tell you that it is a matter of sincere rejoicing to me. I would a thousand times rather that you made them Baptists than that they became nothing. Stop a bit; let me tell you what I mean—I do not like Christians unattached. I like regular armies better than guerilla forces.

The fact of the matter is, a man that loves everybody so well and so warmly that he has no time to love anybody specially has a selfish heart within his bosom; and if I were in a position to give counsel to the ladies—which would be presumption indeed—I would say, Beware of general lovers—who lounge about in cafés and clubs, and flirt and compete with everybody, but who have no sense of a home, no understanding of the meaning of the word.

I want every man to have a religious home. I do not care where it is. Therefore, I would a great deal rather men were made Baptists wholesale than that they had a general, hazy idea—sentimental, perhaps, or perhaps real—of the great truths of Christianity, and remain unfolded, unhoused, and scattered abroad here and here, doing no good, if not doing positive mischief spiritually—with their hands against every man and every man's hands against them.

"Well," you may say, "after all, the world s not converted." True, if you look at the matter in its human aspect. We forget we have omething higher to depend upon. If we look imply upon the human aspect, there is somehing disheartening. You look upon every impurity and oppression practised by every nation given over to idolatry, and you regard all these s the embodiment of rebellious minds.

It is the alien nature of the human intellect, f the human feeling, that gives to all this its gnificance and its energy of mischief. The enser is a very foolish thing if it were not for he mind that swings it; the fetish rite would be dumb cruelty if it were not for the mind that evelled in its blood; the idol apart from the aind that crouches to it would be an ugly and armless lie; but it is a mind rebellious, mind gainst mind, the human against the Eternal, he thing that is made lifting itself up against he Being that made it, and striving patiently to reak the bands of His merciful government sunder.

ith which we have to contend; and we see so uch of this rebellious mind everywhere, that e may well be disheartened, after all, when we ok to the merely human aspects of the case e are trying to promote. And yet there is encouragement even in that, and I like to put on se-colored spectacles always when I can safely. do not like green spectacles at any time.

They are apt to give the impression, at any te, that a man has had the jaundice—and everydy you look at appears colored by the distemr which they give to the vision. Now, if you ok at the other side of the question you may ad, I think, a sense in which even in false stems there is a good deal to encourage u. The consciousness of sin, of unrest, is uck into the universal heart of man, in spite sceptics in all ages of the world.

All the records of the old philosophies, what they but records of mourned feebleness, ntic efforts to regain an ancient but a forfeited oral power? There is not an idolatrous sysn that ever cursed the earth that does not emdy in the midst of all its filth and in the midst all its foulness a wailing of the benighted in ir darkness and of the polluted in their ame; and it is just this element in them that preserved them from utter destruction, this ent confession of need, this latent earnestness rescue, which has been to them an antiseptic ment of life.

Men have had dim conceptions of great truths, they have moulded them like clumsy artifis who shape unsightly figures out of stone, l who achieve a monster when they try to ect a man. And yet through this, everywhere been the yearning cry for light and for help and for peace. People wonder sometimes because they think there is very little stir about the triumphs of Christianity.

Why should there be stir? Does not God work silently? Is not the very purpose of God's government an imperial quiet—a quiet but energetic manifestation of Himself by which all things are gradually subdued unto Him? Men make noises—God is quiet. God does not need to make a noise. Imperial silence is His highest and divinest energy, and all His plans have been worked out, after that particular fashion.

If you look into the past, do not you think that prophecy might help history? How many of the foolishnesses of the heathen, and of the vain imaginings of the Church or of the people, have already collapsed, and have collapsed into utterest infinity! What a host of them!

Why, the Jewish rulers imagined that they had strangled the faith of Christianity at its birth, and that in the sepulchre "hewn out of the rock" they had entombed both the Impostor and His doctrines. But aye, and to-day, in spite of all the sceptics, the mightiest of moral forces in the world.

The Roman emperors imagined, like some modern imitators of theirs, that their sway extended over the consciences as well as over the bodies of their subjects, and persecution lifted up its head and Christians were cast by human tigers to the more merciful tigers of the arena, and the blood of the martyrs was shed like water and there was none to bury them. What was the result? Why, the red rain only made the harvest ampler and whiter for the gathering by the sickle, and the cry of Julian when he was dying, "O Galilean, thou hast overcome!" was the wail of the tyranny of the entire Roman world.

And then, to come closely to our own times, kingdoms have sometimes set themselves against the truth; they have refused it an entrance. There have been nations whose whole policy has been intolerance and wrong, or who have been given over altogether to idolatry. Where are they now? Their influence has declined; the congresses of nations do not know them; and when the strongest fabrics of power have spent themselves in the struggle, and when the quarrel has been continued to the bitter end, you cannot find their site upon the map.

The owl and the dragon inhabit the palaces where their princes dwelt, their speech has taken its place among forgotten dialects, and another race has succeeded to their inheritance of power. Egypt and Nineveh and Babylon and Tyre, where are they? They rebelled, they refused, an entrance to the truth, and where are they? Why, the Pyramids have entombed the pride as well as the dust of the Pharaohs, and the Sphinx stares out vacantly over twenty centuries of ruin.

Fifty years ago, my friends, how jealously was nation after nation locked against the entrance of the truth, and how quietly have those locked doors been opened, one by one. China has had to submit to a great many breaches in her great wall; Japan, where the tender foot of the infant used to spurn the Cross, is now hungering for Western civilization, and there are not a few Japanese, as I happen to know, who, for the sake of the Crucified, are prepared to repeat ancient histories of martyrdom.

The descendants of Montezuma have come to find that the quicksal for which their fathers waited was not all a dream, and Mexico opens its gate to Protestant preachers of the truth, and longs for the Jesus of Nazareth, who will be indeed her fair God of the morning. We go with our Gospel message without hindrance, or with only a spasm of hindrance, into the city of the Hapsburgs and into the city of the Cæsars.

Russia has relaxed her hold upon the consciences of her vassal tribes, and if it is worth anything, the firman of the Sultan in behalf of religious liberty may be regarded as the latest blast of the herald of the coronation of King Jesus. All these things came when men were not looking for them, naturally and noiselessly as the morning. Here, a people to-day adverse or inaccessible; to-morrow an open door of entrance and many hungering for the truth.

Here a Church bent upon its knees; yonder, in some sunny Madagascar, a very gracious rain of spiritual blessing; and men wonder at the subtle wires, subtler than magnetic, that connect each incident with the other and both incidents with God. The hour strikes; men look around and wonder what is coming, and somewhere or other—it may not be always in the same parallel of latitude—there is the man, full grown, heroic, ready, well furnished to do his work.

THIS IS THE WAY GOD WORKS.

I do not wonder that those who were so anxiously looking out for the palpable triumphs of missions did not see them. "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation." The whirlwind of political excitement and the earthquake that shakes the nations, and the fire consuming all wrong and all encumbering circumstance, may be the couriers of the coming of the Lord, but He speaks in the "still small voice" that marvellous whisper that always makes a silence for itself, however loud and rude the clamor—that does not strive, that does not cry, but, without striving and without crying, makes its way into the consciences of the world.

Well, now, my friends, is this Word less mighty than it used to be? Dare we as a Church commit ourselves to so faithless an avowal? What did the Saviour mean when He said, "He that believeth in Me, the works that I do shall he do also, and greater works shall he do, because I go unto the Father." He was just under the shadow of His passion when He said that.

He gave sight to Bartimeus the blind, and He raised up Lazarus from the dead; but Bartimeus could not give sight to other blind, nor Lazarus call other dead from the grave. But those whom we heal instrumentally, and raise, may be the prophets unto generations yet unborn.

Those whom He healed He healed only for a season. The blind man looked for a while, for a few years it may be, upon the beauties of nature and upon the light of friends, and then the blindness of death overtook him. Lazarus even went into the homestead at Bethany only for a brief while, and a second time death claimed him, and the Saviour did not interfere. But those whom you heal and whom you save instrumentally are heirs of the immortality that has been brought to light by the Gospel.

Now, my friends, I take it, if we do not believe in something diviner than the most perfect human organization, we may as well disband ourselves and go home. But if we believe in a present Deity as our helper, we may thank God for the past, and we may take courage for the future. And I want you all to come into connection with this great movement.

There is not a single member of a single church that is exempt from the application; every one of us, the young with their ardor and enthusiasm, and their fresh affections growing after God; the princes of our Israel, ripe and wise, valiant for the truth upon the earth; the fathers who sit upon the summit of their honored age, and are so much nearer heaven—we want them all. They, like Moses, are too infirm to fight, but they are up like Moses, over the plains of Amalek, and for the same reason, too, they can rule the fortunes of the war; for when Moses' hands were held up, Israel prevailed; and when Moses' hands hung down, Amalek prevailed.

We want them all. Manhood with its sublimity of enterprise and devotedness of consecration—every man's tribute of manliness, every woman's spikenard in alabaster, every child's Hosanna of ardent praise; the rich with their large benefactions, the poor with their cheerful drachms of sacrifice.

There is room for all, there is work for all, and, thank God, there is recompense for all! Oh, let us give ourselves, one and all, with all we have and are, upon the altar that is worthy because it sanctifieth both the gift and the giver, and God will give us the blessing.

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

HARD LESSONS.

WHEN Effie suggested as an advantage of the yellow room for Mrs. Cross that she would there be near her nephew, she thought she had carried the fortress of the old lady's opposition. But that was a mistake of Effie's. Mrs. Cross did not consider it an advantage to sleep too near that lively young gentleman.

"Oh! thank you, I don't care particularly about that," said the stout aunt; "Fred is not used to be much looked after; he's restless as a squirrel, and there's just one thing which I can't stand, and that's being roused up by his clatter at four o'clock in the morning. Besides, you will be near him, you know, and I am sure that you would go to the dear child if he should waken and cry in the night."

Effie's cheeks were growing very hot. Alec's expression, "two mistresses in one house," was full in her mind, and she felt that she had unexpectedly entered on her first struggle for rightful dominion in her own home. It was a new thing to Effie to have to be resolute and firm, but she was determined to hold her own, and not to be defeated in that first struggle. The young wife was far more excited than the middle-aged widow, who had set down her bird-cage, and was resting her broad back against the wall, like one calmly preparing to resist an attack.

"My dear Mrs. Cross," began Effie, whose voice betrayed some agitation, "matters might have been differently arranged, perhaps, had I known your wishes before. But everything now is quite settled; the drawers in the pink room are filled with my clothes; I cannot consent to have everything altered, however anxious I am to please you."

"Shall I look to the horse?" suggested Tom Hunt to Effie; "I can carry up them things afterwards when I knows to which room to take 'em."

"Don't take the horse out of the cart," said Mrs. Cross, in a tone of command; "I may want them to take me and my boxes back to the station. I am sorry to put you out," continued the lodger, turning towards the rather indignant and altogether perplexed Effie, "but the yellow room has an eastern aspect, and there's just one thing I can't stand, and that is a room facing the east." Mrs. Cross looked anything but consumptive, but she probably felt, like her young antagonist, that victory in this first skirmish for power was all-important.

"What's to be done!" thought Effie; "I must get my husband to back me; I am scarcely a match by myself for that great tall woman, who seems to forget that I, and not she, am the mistress here. I will speak to Holland," she said aloud, going with a quick step towards the open door, where she met Robert, who had just come damp from the field. The young wife laid her hand on her husband's arm to prevent him from coming farther, and said in a voice too low to reach those who stood at the bottom of the stairs, "Robert, only think, that woman wants to have my pink room; she says she has slept in that for the last fourteen years."

"Well, then it seems natural that she should like to sleep in it still," answereed Robert, who had quite recovered his usual good-humor, notwithstanding the trial of the hail. "Why not change the arrangement, my pet? one room is as good as another." Pink room or yellow room made not the slightest difference to the farmer, but it was not so with his wife.

"You can't mean, Robert," said Effie, still speaking almost in a whisper, "that your wife, the mistress of your house, should be turned out of her room, and at such inconvenience, merely to humor a stranger!" Effie's heart was beating fast, and her eyes were filling with tears.

"Mrs. Cross seems hardly a stranger in a place of which she so long was the mistress," observed Robert Holland. "Poor soul! it must be rather hard to come back as a lodger to her old home!"

"She is unreasonable!" persisted Effie, who was disappointed and provoked by Robert's taking a view opposed to her own.

"Unreasonable or not, we can't afford to offend her," said the farmer, in rather an impatient whisper. "How can you make such a fuss about the color of a paper! The yellow room is as good as the other."

"It looks out on the pig-sties," said Effie, who was provoked at being accused of making a fuss about trifles.

"Better look out on pig-sties than have no pig-sties to look on!" cried Robert, who had clearly before him the fact that his possession of the farm depended on his keeping on good terms with the widow.

"Oh! if you don't care about my comfort and pleasure, I don't care where I am, or what I do!" exclaimed Effie, and down

"Oh! if you don't care about my comfort and pleasure, I don't care where I am, or what I do!" exclaimed Effie, and down her cheeks rolled two big tears, seen by Robert, though not by the widow and Tom, for Effie's back was turned towards the two, who were waiting still at the staircase.

"Silly child, what are you crying about?" whispered Robert, who was greatly vexed by the sight of the tears of his wife.

"Where am I to take this 'ere luggage, sir?" asked Tom, who was tired of stopping in the kitchen, and wished to get back to his horse.

"Where Mrs. Cross pleases," was the hasty reply. Robert was particularly anxious that neither his lodger nor his man should see that Effie was crying, and therefore was in a hurry to send the widow and her boxes upstairs.

Effie was defeated, and she could hardly endure the sense of defeat; she had not had her will, and she could scarcely bear to give up her will. The young wife felt as if her husband had deserted her cause. She walked up slowly to the kitchen fireplace, and busied herself with the fagots and coals, while Robert assisted Tom to carry up the luggage, and talked to Mrs. Cross of the weather. Effie was well pleased to have every one out of the kitchen, for she wanted to be alone.

She did not turn round when little Tom ran in from the yard, and only muttered, "That noisy child," when he clattered up the staircase after his aunt. Effie remained stirring the fire, and half crying to herself, till Tom and his master came down; the former left the house directly, but Robert walked up to his wife, and caressingly laid his hand on her shoulder.

"Come, Effie, pet, you must not be sulky; we can't have everything our own way, even in this Salem of ours," said the husband. "I'm sorry, mighty sorry, that you and Mrs. Cross have set your hearts on the same room, but one's happiness does not depend on such trifles. You had better go upstairs and look after your goods and chattels, since all will have to be moved. Put the best face on what you can't help, my pet!" and Robert followed up his advice by a kiss, which had the effect of a little softening Effie's vexation, and restoring good-humor.

But that good-humor was not proof against the trials which awaited Robert's wife when she went to perform the hateful task of emptying out her drawers, and carrying her little ornaments from the pink room to the yellow.

Master Fred had been beforehand with her, having taken a fancy to make himself useful for once in a way. Whilst Mrs. Cross was on her knees in the pink room, unpacking one of her boxes, the boy was pulling everything out of Effie's lowest drawer, which was unfortunately open. The wedding-dress, with its pink fluting, was hugged in the muddy arms of the child, who could not carry it across the room without dragging half its length upon the floor.

"Oh, you monkey!" exclaimed Effie, darting forward, and hardly able to refrain from giving the boy a box on the ear as she wrenched the dress from his grasp. "And oh! my bonnet, my bonnet!" she cried, half in despair, for the clay-caked boot of little Fred was on it, and had stamped it quite flat—flowers, feather, and all!

Mrs. Cross raised her head at the sound of Effie's shrill exclamation. "Dear! what a pity!" she quietly said, and resumed her unpacking. Mrs. Cross generally took such matters calmly, especially if the property injured did not belong to herself.

Effie could not take the misadventure quietly at all. She chid the child angrily, but he only laughed in her face, with the grin of a monkey enjoying a piece of mischief, one of the most irritating ways in which it is possible to receive a reproof. Effie had too much self-command, or perhaps too much prudence, to slap the provoking child. Her only resource was to remove as soon as possible all her goods from the reach of his fingers.

Effie performed the work of emptying out her drawers, and bearing off their contents, with no good grace, for she was thoroughly put out, and felt angry with all the world, scarcely excepting her husband. It was some time before Mrs. Holland's numerous articles of dress, little china ornaments, and pretty keepsakes, were conveyed to the yellow room, which still smelt strongly of smoke. Effie then shut the door, almost with a bang, and went moodily up to the fireplace.

The young wife was much vexed at the injury done to her wedding bonnet and dress; the latter she might partly repair when the mud should be dry, but the bonnet was spoilt beyond recovery. But it was not the loss of a piece of finery that weighed most heavily on the spirits of Effie; the sorest wound was that which her pride had sustained; for she had more of that pride of life which so truly is of the world than she, or perhaps any one else, had suspected before.

Robert's wife had been foiled. Her very husband had not made her pleasure his first object; nay, he had treated her as if she had been spoilt child! Had Robert not told the mistres of his house not to be sulky, and wondered a her making a fuss about trifles? How could h speak so to her? How unkind was his conduct how strange! Effie felt as if her new home wer Salem no longer to her; it could never be so a long as Mrs. Cross and that horrid child remained in the place.

Those who have lived longer in the worl know that an unmixed cup is never placed in th hand of any one. In the happiest lot there a some drops of gall. It is often invisible to ou siders, but we are taught that "every hea knows its own bitterness" (Prov. 14: 10), an in the life of those men think most enviabl there is always at least one bitterness, known f well to the envied one. How to bear that bi terness is the question to be solved. Philos phers prescribe Stoicism as the best antidote, b the true and only remedy is that used by Pa when he was attacked by the thorn in the fles "I besought the Lord" (2 Cor. 12: 8). Effie yet had not learned to carry her troubles ther

Mrs. Holland's eyes rested at first almost u consciously on the picture which she had hers hung just opposite to the bed in the yell room, with Miss Temple's text-card beneath "Love not the world" shone from the latter tetters of gold. Effie had been so wrapped up her own little world of enjoyment that, ami her many blessings, he had almost forgotten Giver of all.

Effie turned with a sigh from the firepla On her bed lay the little book of devotion, gift of Miss Temple, which Mrs. Holland h brought with other things from the pink ro when she had emptied her drawers. That bo had never been used, had scarcely been open there had been no family worship in the fa house; it was not likely that there ever wo be. Again Effie gave an involuntary sigh.

The quiet of the place was now broken some unusual sounds from the kitchen bel Effie turned her head quickly to listen. noise merely arose from Robert and Fred b at high romps. Loud laughter and shriek merriment resounded through the house as farmer chased his little lodger about the kitc seemingly enjoying the fun as much as did young boy himself. They at least were m enough, and the noise of their gayety added bitterness to the vexation of Effie. She sat down by the bedside, and burst into tears. Foolish Effie! she had better have reserved these tears for a time when she might have more cause for weeping.

Effie was learning her lesson. A very hard one, but very necessary. It comes to all sooner or later, and all have to go through the struggle. "Thy will, not mine," is the sublimity of victory. Happy they who arrive quickly at that point.

While Effie was musing at the farm over her altered prospects, a struggle of another kind was going on at the great house, where another gentle nature was learning "in patience to possess her soul." Edith Temple day by day had to listen to words of contempt poured on subjects she held dearer than life, and yet to be patient and calm.

As she sat with Mr. Vernon, writing at his dictation, often would her soul be raised in prayer for strength to bear and to do her duty wisely and well.

On this day Mr. Vernon had been unusually aptious and bitter, and Edith's patience was nearly worn out. "Where is Alec?" she said at last to change the subject. Mr. Vernon did not know, but rose to ascertain.

Now Alec Stewart, after his unsuccessful mision to Holland's farm, had gone into that of Gibbs, getting drenched through by the rain and he hail on his way. He was then returning to Eureka House, driving a lamb before him, and barely in time to serve up the family dinner, which Mr. Vernon took at the unfashionable hour of three. Mr. Vernon in his abstraction had forgotten all about Alec's mission till reminded of it by the sight of the man with his harge. Then he remembered, and eagerly welcomed his servant.

Dinner must be attended to, or Mr. Vernon would have been glad to commence experiments mmediately; but in deference to the wants of he body the inquiry was postponed for a few ours.

Mealtime was often an uncomfortable time to Edith Temple. Weary as the lady frequently felt from reading aloud for hours at a time, she referred the dry books of her uncle to the kind f conversation in which he sometimes engaged, s it seemed, expressly to tease her. Mr. Veron was more than usually sneering and provoking on the present occasion. Edith never reorted, but ate her meat almost in silence, thinking what a relish sympathy and kindness would ave given even to a dinner of herbs.

"She is a patient lady, and a good Christian," hought Alec Stewart, as he carried out the ishes; "my master can't get the fire-flashes om her, as he does from his electric machine, ith all his rubbing."

But it was not impossible to rouse the spirit f Edith Temple. Long-suffering as she was hen sneers were only levelled at herself, she as jealous for the honor of her Master.

"Fancy the folly of our parson here," oberved Vernon to his niece after the servant ad left them alone together. "I suppose that e has noticed that I've given up wasting my me in listening to his droning, so, as I don't to hear his sermons, he has sent a printed rmon to me! I call that a piece of impertience; as if"—the philosopher smiled proudly s he went on—"as if he could instruct me—ighten me—or convert!"

Edith thought silently, "Would that he uld!"

"I have no objection to a well-considered, asonable discourse," continued Vernon as he led his glass with water; "if it please those ho care to hear such things, and make the poor ntented, I have nothing to say against it. But make out that all are sinners who don't oose to believe matters that are past their mprehension, and to say that such are in dan-r of endless perdition, is what no man has a ght to do, merely because he puts Reverend be-re his name, and speaks from a pulpit."

THE MINISTRY OF RECONCILIATION.

S. S. Lesson for August 3d—2 Cor. 23 : 10–21—Golden Text, verse 20. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Our subject for to-day begins with the declaration that we, believers, ("all the saints which are in all Achaia," 2 Cor. 1 : 1), "must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." Thus, while it is clearly stated, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 8 : 1), it is nevertheless most evident that "God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil" (Eccl. 12 : 14).

Paul adduces this as the reason for his evangelizing work, "Knowing, therefore, the terror" (Greek, fear) "of the Lord, we persuade men." But he takes pains to show the Corinthians that he does nothing with the view of commending himself to them, and thus he adds, "For whether we be beside ourselves, it is to God: or whether we be sober, it is for your cause," never in any case for themselves; for Paul and Timothy, who wrote this Epistle, sought not their own, but the things of Jesus Christ. Now, is our evangelizing done in the light of the judgment-seat of Christ? Do we watch for souls as they that must give account? and do we show them by word and deed that they also must give account? And do the issues at stake act upon us as upon these two holy men? Do they make us sometimes beside ourselves to God for souls?

And Paul continues, "For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then all died" (see Greek), "and that He died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him which died for them and rose again." The love of Christ was still stronger with Paul than the love of souls. He saw the great purpose in the death of Christ to comprise all, so that in His death God saw all men as though dying for their sins. And Paul understood that the purpose of God did not stop short here, but it was in order that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him which died for them and rose again. He saw in the inclusion of each soul in the death of Christ a corn of wheat cast into the ground to die, in order that it might bring forth much fruit, glorious fruit, the resurrection life of Christ.

Beloved reader, do you see yourself and own yourself to have died with Christ? Do you acknowledge the justice of God's sentence of death upon you which Christ has borne in your stead? and do you recognize that God could expect nothing, and you can expect nothing, from that flesh which God has condemned in the person of Christ? How, then, will you longer live to yourself? How will you live to that which is dead? How will you expect any thing from the self which is crucified with Christ if you are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God?

It is just this self-life which all the precepts of Christ are bent upon extirpating in us, that our life may be a partakership of His Divine Nature, and that eternal union with Him may be a moral possibility. But our own nature, which seeks its own, "is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God" (Rom. 8 : 7, 8). And this is why we must die to our own efforts and energy as much as to our own sins, that the life of Christ replacing our old life, may be made manifest in our mortal bodies. Thus it is our privilege to be deaf, dumb, and dead to all which touches ourselves, but alive in every sense and power to all which touches Christ, who is our life.

And it is only thus, when we cease to recognize ourselves after the flesh, that we cease also to know others after the flesh, i.e., in their relation to us, what they think of us, say of us, do to us. "Henceforth know we no man after the flesh." We know all men in their relation to God. Oh, it is so intensely important that we maintain our right position with regard to God, in order that we may maintain a divine position with regard to others. We can afford to love our enemies when their hatred meets with only Christ in us; we can afford to dispense with all personal satisfaction when His joy is in us and our joy is full (John 15 : 11). "Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we Him no more." No more self-seeking in our relations with our Lord, no more seeking how He may minister to us and our interests, but how we may minister to Him and subserve His interests.

"Therefore, if any man be in Christ he is a new creature" (or new creation): "old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new." Yes; for He has said, "Behold, I make all things new" (Rev. 16 : 5). It is new, indeed, for one whose centre of life and purpose has been always in self, to find it transported into Christ, and neither to have nor to desire any thing except in Him. This is the true preparation for the ministry of reconciliation. God said to Abraham, "I will bless thee . . . and thou shalt be a blessing" (Gen. 12 : 2). In order to bless others we must first be blest. Thus, when we recognize that all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to Himself by Jesus Christ and hath given unto us the ministry of reconciliation, then, and then only, are we prepared for the exercise of such a ministry.

And what a ministry! what a message to a lost world! "God was in Christ." God has come half way to sinful man in Christ. God has met and dealt with our sinful nature in Him. God stands no longer afar off; in the person of Christ He stands between His own just law and the sinner, and He declares that as far as He is concerned the breach is healed, and the separation at an end. "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them." God is come as far as Christ to meet every sinner. And yet more, He has committed the work of reconciliation not to angels, but to one child of man for another, He "hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation."

When He saves a soul from death, by the very call to live no more unto himself, He constitutes that soul a minister of reconciliation. "Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God;" we beseech sinners to come as far as Christ to meet God. But we cannot be "in Christ's stead" unless we cease to live to ourselves. Every evangelist, every Sunday-school teacher, is called to be in Christ's stead a minister of reconciliation. Every converted member of a family has the same call to the unconverted. We are blest, not simply that we may be blest, but that we may be made a blessing. Dear reader, is there in your whole life and character and conversation something which makes an appeal to every worldling with whom you come in contact? Is there that which says as plainly as your words, "Be ye also reconciled to God?"

And here is the blessed unanswerable ground for reconciliation. "For He hath made Him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him." The offended and wronged party, the God against whom we have sinned, provided the marvellous way of escape from His own condemnation of us. "He made Him to be sin for for us who knew no sin." The second Adam, who was "tempted in all points like as we are," and who, as far as His human nature was concerned, "suffered being tempted," became nevertheless victorious over sin in every particular, stood every possible test, and after submitting to the proof of all the wiles which Satan's four thousand years of practice had acquainted him with, it could still be said of Jesus our Lord, He "knew no sin." And His purpose was that "we might be made the righteousness of God in Him," that "the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit" (Rom. 8 : 4). A less result was never contemplated by Him in His death for us.

Sir Garnet Wolseley in Zululand.—A despatch to the Daily Telegraph, dated Maritzburg, July 1, says :—"Complying with the requirements of Lord Chelmsford, Cetywayo sent to the British camp the cattle demanded and also an ivory tusk. The demanding officer detained the cattle, but refused to accept the tusk (which was an emblem of peace). Sir Garnet Wolseley immediately disowned this act, sent messengers to Cetywayo explaining that the refusal of the tusk was a blunder, and asked that three leading chiefs be sent to the frontier.

Russia and Germany are Displaying considerable coolness towards each other. The cause is said to be that the effect upon Russia of Prince Bismarck's protective tariff will be to lock all her railroad lines to the westward. Whenever Russia is in difficulties with England or any Mediterranean Power, the German railways become the only practicable outlet for her commerce, and if her produce is to be heavily taxed at the German frontier she can be practically shut out of Western markets whenever she is in trouble, and Germany feels disposed to take advantage of them." This situation is sufficiently embarrassing to aaccount for the unpleasantness.

A Tract Society in China.—The first annual meeting of the Chinese Tract Society has been held at Shanghai. The society is composed of representatives of all the societies, Bishop Schereschewsky being President of the Board of Trustees, of whom one half are natives. The native preachers show great zeal in the support of the society, and they took a prominent part in the proceedings. The tracts are hereafter to be distributed by unpaid native agents. Grants of $1000 from two tract societiesthe London and the American—were received.

Prince Napoleon Jerome has accepted the leadership of the Bonapartist party. He has been a very pronounced and measurably consistent Republican, an ardent sympathizer with Poland, with the North in its anti-slavery conflict, and with the people of France against the Cæsarism of Louis Napoleon. He counsels his followers to give their adherence to the Republic, and states that he shall not plot against it, but so long as it commands the confidence of the people he shall be loyal to it. He does not say what he would do under altered circumstances, but as the first Napoleon was a soldier of the first republic, and on several occasions swore to uphold it, it is not difficult to predict what his admirer and descendant would do, should opportunity open the way to an imperial crown.

Russia has Deemed it Advisable, after the plain intimations of the Powers represented at the Berlin Congress, to fulfil her promises. The Marquis of Salisbury has stated in the House of Lords that not a single Russian soldier was left in Roumania. Count Schouvaloff had assured him that the Russian troops west of the Pruth were going to Varna to embark for home. The last Russian left Philippopolis on the 13th.

Szegedin, the Hungarian City recently destroyed by inundations, is to be rebuilt. Kossuth has written a long and interesting letter to the Hungarian papers concerning its reconstruction. He draws attention to the vast undertaking of rebuilding a town for 80,000 inhabitants, with all the modern appliances which will be necessary in order to enable it to assume the importance which it once held. He urges that the greatest care should be taken with the foundations of the houses, as the unsatisfactory condition of the few solid buildings that remain shows the state of the ground.

Prince Bismarck's Conciliatory Policy toward Roman Catholics has occasioned much surprise, as "the man of iron" was supposed to have entered on a conflict from which he would not withdraw. The London Times, in explanation of the change, says: "The key of Prince Bismarck's present policy toward the Vatican will be found in one of his recent speeches, in which he said that it was praiseworthy under certain circumstances to fight a quarrel out to the bitter end, but when ways and means presented themselves of toning down the ascerbity of a conflict without affecting the principle at stake, he would not deem himself justified in neglecting such proffered opportunity."

Wesleyan Methodism in England.—The British Wesleyans are surprised and alarmed at the decrease in their numbers, as shown by statistics just collected. It appears that, though upward of 40,000 new members were received last year, there is a net decrease of 3308, which is shared by all the districts. The losses are largest in agricultural sections and manufacturing centres, and are attributed to emigration on account of financial depression and strikes. The Wesleyans continue their activity in London, where in twenty years they have built chapels enough to bring their church accomodation from 40,000 sittings up to 100,000. Lancashire and Yorkshire, where Wesleyans are strongest in point of numbers, are the counties where the depression of trade is most severely felt, and from which the tide of emigration has consequently been the fullest.

C. H. SPURGEON'S WORKS.

UNPRECEDENTED PRICES.

The writings of the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, the greatest preacher of the age, are fully as much admired in America as the United Kingdom, but their circulation has hitherto been limited by the high prices charged for them.

With the view, therefore, of placing these invaluable works within the reach of many who have long wished to posse them, we have obtained a consignment from London, and we now offer them to the public at the prices mentioned belo which are twenty-five per cent less than the books can be obtained for elsewhere. Remittances must accompany orders.

In his preface to Lange's New Commentary on the Psalms, Dr. Schaff, the New York editor, thus refers to Mr. Spurgeon's recently published work: "The most important homiletical and practical work of the age on the Psalter is the 'Treasury of David,' by Charles H. Spurgeon. Full of the force and genius of this celebrated preacher, and rich in selections from the entire range of literature, especially from the Puritan divines."

"No man, whatever his theological predilections may be, who has a spark of justice in him, will hesitate to pronounce the work of great merit, revealing an intellect of remarkable vivacity and vigor, and a soul aflame with religious earnestness."—Homilist.

This unparalleled fact, unprecedented in the pulpit of any age or church speaks for itself, and is a higher eulogium than the most friendly reviewer could pronounce.

America has been exceptionally blessed by God in the character and lives of her prominent sons in all the generations which have arisen within her borders. Poets, painters, divines, warriors, and statesmen have left behind them records of which any land might well be proud. It was left for George Peabody to add to this list of worthies the name of one whose record should go down the stream of time as that of the most beneficent and princely giver the world had seen. By his noble charities he rendered the name of his country an honored one in the country of his adoption, so that while time shall last the great metropolis of England will record with gratitude the name and fame of George Peabody the American citizen.

George Peabody was descended from an ancient English family the members of which emigrated to this country so long ago as the year 1635. Though occupying but a humble position in their native land they boast of a genealogy to which even the English peerage can furnish few equals. They claim to have descended from one Boadie, who fought under Boadicea in the wars against the Romans in the year A.D. 61. After the defeat of the Queen he is said to have fled to the Cambrian Mountains, and thus it was that the prefix "pea" signifying mountain became attached to the name.

George Peabody was born in the town of Danvers, Massachusetts, on the 18th of February, 1795. Of his early life little is known, except that he was nurtured in a family where pious example and wise precept united in moulding the character of an amiable, high-spirited, and robust youth. The period assigned to was, according to the custom of the times, limited by the superior claims of business, and, at the age of eleven, the lad's school life was over, and he was entered as a junior clerk in a grocery store in his native town; there, happily, he had the example of a master who, in the midst of his busy life, guarded the morals and stimulated the virtues of his young helper; and it soon became apparent that the boy, from no feeling of discontent, but from the natural promptings of a laudable ambition, panted for a wider scope for the exercise of the superior powers of which he gradually became conscious.

Mr. Prockter's store in Danvers was left behind, in 1810, and, at the age of fifteen years, George, a smart, open-faced, ingenuous youth, was known as the intelligent apprentice of David Peabody, his own elder brother, who was engaged in in the thriving town of Newburyport. This service was not of long duration, for a fire occurring in the town, in the midst of the conflagration, the dry-goods store was consumed, and the business came to an end.

George was now out of employment; but, says Mrs. Hannaford, in her memorial of him, "he was not one to eat the bread of idleness. He sought for employment; and his uncle, John Peabody, who had settled in Georgetown, adjoining the Federal capital, invited young George to become his commercial assistant. To the South, for the first time, he went; and there he tarried two years, managing with peculiar ability a large part of the business, though still in his teens. His honesty was unquestionable, his tact unusual, and he soon succeeded in winning friends and securing trade."

In 1812 while he was still in his uncle's employ, broke out the war with England, and George entered the service of his country as a volunteer in a regiment of Artillery then posted at Fort Warburton, which commanded the river approach to Washington. Here though he won no military honor, he showed that he had the soul of a patriot and the nerve of a soldier.

After the war he returned to the dry-goods trade with his uncle, with whom he remained in all two years. At the conclusion of that period, he entered into partnership in a wholesale drapery business with Mr. Elisha Riggs; Mr. Riggs furnishing the capital for the concern, and young Peabody agreeing to transact the business. It is said, that, "when Mr. Riggs invited Mr. Peabody to be a partner, the latter said there was one insuperable objection, as he was only nineteen years of age. This was no objection in the mind of the shrewd merchant, who wanted a young and active assistant." His unfaltering perseverance and indomitable energy had full scope; and they who may be supposed to know of the matter, say, that, to all concerned, the partnership of Riggs & Peabody proved a most successful and satisfactory arrangement. In 1815, the house was removed to Baltimore; and, seven years later, its extended operations were such as to justify the establishing and opening of branches at Philadelphia and New York: and about the year 1830, by the retirement of Mr. Riggs, George Peabody found himself the senior partner and the virtual director of one of the largest of mercantile firms.

It is said by those who knew him well that the one strong love of George Peabody's life was for his mother. He appears to have cherished from a boy the most tender regard for her, giving her the first dollar he earned in boyhood, and bestowing the last thoughts of his honored old age upon a memorial of her Christian character. Mr. Peabody's devotion to his mother and family was as thoughtful as that of a woman; and, after he became very wealthy, the old townspeople used to revive reminiscences in that direction concerning him.

"I recollect hearing" says one, "my mother say, that, as soon as he was established in Baltimore, he wrote to his mother that 'he should be able, for the future, to supply the family with flour;' and Mrs. Peabody remarked, as she mentioned the circumstance to a friend, that 'it was a great comfort to have George prosperous enough to bear the expenses.' And, from that day to her last, George never allowed his mother to want any thing that filial love could bestow.

In 1827, while partner in the Baltimore firm, he visited London, and there his quick business perception showed him an opportunity he was not slow to grasp. After a few years he withdrew from the firm and carried his capital to London, where he established himself as a

MONEY BROKER AND BANKER.

While so engaged he was appointed one of three commissioners by the State of Maryland to restore its pecuniary credit. In this enterprise he was entirely successful, and with the generosity and patriotism which characterized the man, he refused all payment for his services. For his exertions in this cause he received a special vote of thanks from the Legislature of that State.

Americans in Europe were always glad to know Mr. Peabody, from whom they gained, if they deserved it, the most useful assistance, as well as the kindest welcome. His private hospitality—not less delicately than freely offered, though he was a bachelor, simply and cheaply living in chambers—was exerted without stint of cost for the pleasure of those who called on him with a letter of personal introduction. He used to give them pleasant little dinners at his club, or at Richmond, or Hampton Court—places dear to the American visitor.

The anniversary of American Independence—the 4th of July—he used to celebrate with a semi-public dinner at the Crystal Palace. Mr. Peabody, indeed, was, of all men, least like a hermit or ascetic; but his taste was, to be social in the enjoyment of all good things. He would spend little for himself: his only solitary gratification, we believe, was the peaceful sport of the angler, in which, like Mr. Bright, he was an adept.

Mrs. Hannaford says: "Mr. Peabody had a strong faith in American securities. He dealt in them largely and confidently. That keen business-instinct, indescribable, unacquirable, inborn as much as the power of poetry or of art, secured for him the happy result of a wise selection among investments which certainly were not universally perfect. The result was, that his wealth, not previously remarkable, began to roll up rapidly and enormously. He remained a shrewd business-man to the end of his long life.

Munificently as he gave away, he never, in the strict matter of making money, grew lax or unbusiness-like. Very properly, he kept the two functions entirely distinct, and did not confoun liberal generosity with merchant-like dealing In private life his habits were little changed b the acquisition of riches. Frugal from necessit in early life, frugal he remained, so far as th gratification of his own tastes was concerned, t the end. But his hospitality was exceptionall wide-spread and sumptuous, and such as is a ways considered to be needful and becoming i the complete picture of the ideal 'merchan prince.'

Men who spent lavishly for luxuries and sho often pointed with something like a sneer at h modest bachelor quarters. But while he w sheltering the poor of a great kingdom, and e ucating the ignorant in a mighty republic, l could afford to let the cavillers have their say.

He supplied at his own cost the expense co nected with the United States Department at t Great Exhibition of 1851, for which Congr had made no appropriations, and he largely co tributed to the Kane Arctic Expedition in sear of Sir John Franklin, in 1852. His services his own country, meanwhile, were not limited those best known to the public, for, besi these, he did much to assist in the loans secu for different States, giving his guarantee them, once and again. The rise in the price cotton, and the fluctuations in Northern sec ties, caused by the great civil war, were great sources of his fortune, shrewd speculat in both directions having raised him to m than princely wealth.

In the month of June, 1852, the town of D vers—the name of which has since been chan to that of Peabody in his honor—held its C tennial celebration, and Mr. Peabody was inv as one of its most distinguished sons. His l ness engagements prevented his accepting invitation, but he sent a letter of congrat tion, enclosing a sealed envelope which he as might be opened when the toasts were prop as it contained a sentiment.

The envelope was opened at the time he wis d, and was found to contain the sentiment " cation—a debt due from present to future n erations," and with the sentiment a chequ of $20,000 to forward the cause. The money as spent in founding an Institute and a pub li- brary, and was expended with so much wis m and prudence that Mr. Peabody was encou ed to supplement his first donation with ot rs, until at the time of his death it is said the ti- tute had received from him $250,000!

In 1856, when he visited America, the to of Danvers gave him a most enthusiastic rece on. On his return to England, Mr. Peabody at ice set to work on an object he had long h in view, namely, the amelioration of the con ion of

THE POOR OF LONDON.

For this object he gave in the years 1862 the sum of $1,750,000. The Illustrated L don News thus described the gift and the m in which it was used:

"On March 12, 1862, Mr. Peabody add ssed a letter to Mr. C. F. Adams, American Mi ster, the Right Hon. Lord Stanley, Sir J. E. T net, Mr. (now Sir) Curtis M. Lampson, Bart., a Mr J. S. Morgan, his own partner in busine , informing them that a sum of £150,000 stood the books of Messrs. George Peabody & Co., applied by them for the amelioration of th condition of the poor of London.

"The gentlemen above-named duly ent d on their trust, which has been applied in the mode indicated by the donor; namely, in the e tion of model dwellings for working-men. Ir January, 1866, Mr. Peabody added another £ ,000 to the fund; and, on December 5 last, h made ke no confessions, perform no penance, and aid their ghostly adviser. "But," he said, time comes when they have to die, and are rhaps suddenly seized with a mortal illness. en, in hurry and dread, the priest is sent for; e good man in his anxiety obeys at once the l of the alarmed sinner, taking with him 'the red viaticum,' the holy oil, and the consecrat- wafer, and makes what speed he can; but s! notwithstanding, he, to his horror, is too e; for, as he raises the knocker of the door the sick man's house, and before it falls, the nmons has come, and a soul, with all its sins on it, has passed into a dark eternity." *

THE COMING STONE KINGDOM.

By F. E. Hastings, an Officer in the Anglo-Indian Army.

e Kingdom of God and the Kingdom of Israel—Nebuchadnezzar's Prophetic Image and the Subsequent Stone-Kingdom—Recent Calamities—Probable end of the 1260 Years in 1881.

WHEN the disciples inquired of our Lord what uld be the signs of His Second Coming and the End of the Present Dispensation, He re ed "Nation shall rise against nation and king- m against kingdom, and there shall be earth- akes in divers places, and there shall be fam- s and troubles: these are the beginnings of rows."—(Mark 13: 8.)

We see many of those events now taking ce before our eyes; it cannot therefore be erwise than profitable to ask what they an, and what they should lead us to expect.

An answer is to be found in Luke 21: 31, "When ye see these things come to pass, know that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." is is a reply which will readily present itself to e minds of all who are looking for those things ich are coming on the earth; but we would w wish to draw attention to the question of at is meant by the "kingdom of God," and w and in what form we may expect it to ap- ar.

The Jews rejected the Messiah because His ap- arance did not coincide with their expecta- ns, and they were disappointed in His not at ce establishing the kingdom of Israel. Chris- ns of the present day are apt to run into the posite extreme of error, and refuse to believe a kingdom of Israel at all.

After our Saviour's resurrection, His disciples t to Him the question, "Lord, wilt Thou at s time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" d our Lord, so far from discouraging the be- f in the possible existence of any such king- m, in His reply distinctly implies its futurity cts 1: 6, 7).

Old Testament evidence on this subject is so pious that our chief difficulty is to choose that st applicable. We will, however, take the age in aniel 2) as establishing our point; at the same ne, to all who are inclined to a disbelief in the eral fulfilment of the prophecies made to Is- l, we would recommend a perusal of Jeremiah ; Ezekiel 34: 20–31, 36, and remaining chap- s.

In the last phase of the image of Nebuchad- zzar's vision we have ten kingdoms and a ne, the particular function of which "stone" to break in pieces the ten kingdoms, after ich it becomes a mountain and fills the whole rth. This stone, we hold, typifies the "king- m of God," and its earthly dual the "king- m of Israel." In Daniel's interpretation of e dream, and in reference to the stone, we find, rse 44, "In the days of these kings shall the d of heaven set up a kingdom which shall ver be destroyed." This is evidently identical th Daniel 7: 14, "His dominion is an ever- ting dominion . . . and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." So far the kingdom of God.

The "stone," then, is co-existent with the ten kingdoms; it is set up in their days, and it evidently also means a nation and a kingdom, but which, to keep up the distinction made in Numbers 23: 9, is foretold under an emblem distinct from the others.

It breaks in pieces the ten nations, who become like "the chaff of the summer threshing floors," which the wind carries away. But this is precisely the mission foretold of Israel. Israel, in the last days, is to be an instrument in God's hands for the punishment of the apostate nations of the world. See and compare Isaiah 41: 14-16; Jeremiah 51: 19, 20; Ezekiel 39; Micah 4: 11, 13; and Zechariah 9: 13, 15.

Whether it will be the restoration of the Jews to Palestine, the discovery of proofs establishing the identity of lost Israel, or the amalgamation of these with Judah, whatever it may be, the re-establishment of the Hebrews as a political power on the earth is inseparable from the kingdom of the future. That Palestine is again to be occupied by Israel nationally, is to be found in Ezekiel 36; "the desolate land shall be tilled," and is to "become like the Garden of Eden" (5: 34, 35).

The re-establishment of the kingdom of Israel, however, will not be allowed without opposition from the powers of evil, and then comes that period of tribulation, the reign of the personal Antichrist; the gathering together of the nations; his and their destruction and overthrow; and the Advent of the Lord Jesus, followed by the universal establishment of His kingdom, to be found in Isaiah 2: 10–22; Ezek. 38 and 39; Daniel 2: 35-44; 7, 8, 11, 12; Joel 2, 3; Micah 4: 11–13; Zech. 12, 13, 14; Mal. 4; Rev. 19: 17–21, and other passages.

Having discussed the manner of the end, we will conclude with a few words on

THE TIME.

"When ye see these things come to pass, know that it is nigh" (Mark 13: 29), "these things" being wars, earthquakes, famines, and pestilences. The world has been somewhat familiarized with each of these calamities at different times during the last twenty years, but at the close of the present dispensation they may be expected to occur, both collectively and in greater intensity than at any previous period. "These are the beginnings of sorrows." This is the reading to be found in St. Matthew's Gospel, for which reason it appears to have been adopted by the translators into St. Mark's version, but the more correct reading of the latter is given in a marginal note—"the pains of a woman in travail."

St. Peter was one of the four disciples to whom our Lord confided the events of the last days; it is probable, therefore, that this simile was actually used by our Saviour and must be allowed its full significance.

St. Paul makes use of a similar figure of speech when he says, "the whole creation groaneth and travaileth." Briefly, therefore, the kingdom of God must follow a period when the four calamities indicative of its approach are universally impressed on men's minds.

Recently war and famine have been prominently before the notice of the world, and, latterly, typhus fever and other maladies have followed in the track of the war, pestilence in a lesser degree, while earthquakes have been felt in various places, though the shocks have been so far mild that they have not attracted attention beyond the localities of their immediate occurrence. Still it would appear that the time is nigh, even at the doors.

A few words before we conclude as to dates. As regards the prophecies in Scripture regarding a period of 1260 days, or years, if these apply in a great measure to the duration of Antichrist, the only difficulty is to fix upon a starting-point for the 1260 years (Revelation 11: 3; 12: 6).

Of late years we believe the opinion has been gaining ground among students of prophecy that symbolical prophecies have a double fulfilment—one a literal one, and the other antetypical. Thus, for instance, Balaam's prophecy, "there shall come a star out of Jacob," was doubly fulfilled; our Saviour, the Antetype, was born into the world, and at the same time His star appeared to the wise men.

Let us apply this example to Antichristian prophecy. We have, first, the antetypical Antichrist, whose temporal power lasts 1260 years; and then also the literal, personal Antichrist, whose reign is to extend 1260 literal days, or three and a half years.

The question remains, what may we consider the antetypical Antichrist to be? We venture to suggest that one solution of the difficulty may be found in Mohammedanism. When we consider the rise, progress, and nature of Islam, and its effect on the Chrsitian world, especially on the early Churches of Asia and Africa, it would indeed be remarkable if it found no place in prophetical Scripture, and it can scarcely be better described in one word than as Antichristian. Here, at all events, we have a starting-point clear and distinct; whether we be right or wrong in assuming it is another matter. The Mohammedan era began July, 621. 1260 years bring us down to the middle of

and by that time Islam as a power may have ceased to exist. And its extinction as a faith will speedily follow its decay as a political entity: the dry bones of Mohammedanism undergo no revivification. We may perhaps then see many people go and say, "Come ye and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob, and He will teach us of His ways, and we will walk in His paths."

A DYING NONAGENARIAN'S STATEMENT.

THE Rev. Dr. A. Bonar, in presiding at the ordinance of the Lord's Supper at Mildmay Conference, in London, June 27th, said: "It was when the Lord's Supper was spread as it is before us now that one who afterwards long served the Lord got a vivid sight of Him.

"A minister had word brought him that an old saint, fast approaching the age of ninety, was about to die, and that if he wished to see him he must hasten to his bedside. He immediately went, and found that the aged saint lived in a cottage quite alone. When he reached the door he saw it open, and walked in.

"He seated himself by the bedside of the old man, whose eyes were dim, and who, not being able to see his visitor, went on speaking as if no one were present. The words he murmured were these, 'Remember my death till I come. Do this in remembrance of me.' The minister said to him, 'Whose death is it that you wish to remember?' The old saint replied, 'I am thinking of the death of Him by whose death I got life, and shall so be enabled to go through the valley of the shadow of death, and have no fear.'

"'Is it long since you knew Him?' inquired the minister. 'Forty years ago,' was the reply. 'It was when I was looking on at some people partaking of the Lord's Supper, and just as the minister lifted the bread and broke it, and said, "This is My body broken for you. Do this in remembrance of Me," I got a sight of my Saviour which I never had before, and I saw the meaning of Christ dying for sinners. It was then I knew the Lord. When you came in just now I was thinking of that Communion scene, and I was repeating the words "Do this in remembrance of me."'

"The dying man's voice then faltered, and he ceased speaking. 'Shall I pray with you?' asked the minister. The aged saint said he would be glad, and suggested one of the petitions which should be offered. The minister had not long engaged in prayer when there was a deep silence in the room. At the close of his prayer he looked towards the old man, and found that his soul had fled. He had passed through the valley, and without fear.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The National Debt, which in 1865 Stood at $2,756,431,571.34 was on July 1st, 1879, reduced to $1,996,414,905.63. The population in the interval has largely increased, so that while in 1865 the proportion of debt to each individual was $78, it is now only $40. The interest per head was in 1865 $4.29; it is now $1.69. Peace and returning commercial prosperity, with a wise manipulation of the various bonds and securities of the government, have thus in fourteen years effected a reduction of debt to which no nation on earth can show a parallel.

The Yellow Fever at Memphis, though declared to be of a milder type than that of last year, is rapidly becoming epidemic. So many people have now left the city, and so many places of business have been closed, that the place begins to look deserted. The Secretary of War is about to send 1500 tents and rations for 10,000 people for twenty days to the infected city. A rigid quarantine is being enforced at all Western cities, except at Louisville, and the whole State of Tennessee has also been quarantined against the city of Memphis.

The colored population at first showed a decided disinclination to move into military camps, but leading citizens assured them that the military would have nothing to do with the camps beyond the preservation of the peace and the suppression of crime. They were told that they would be allowed to form colonies, each composed of fifty or a hundred families, to which tents and rations would be issued. This had a pacifying effect, and it is now believed that no trouble will occur in the camp movement.

The rumored stoppage of mail facilities caused much uneasiness until Saturday last, when the officers of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad announced that they would endeavor to keep up regular mail transportation with an engine. The last train went out on that road to-night, and on Friday trains on the Memphis and Louisville road will cease running south of Clarksville. Trains will be kept ready on each of these roads to be used in emergencies.

A general Committee of Safety, of which Mr. D. T. Porter is president, has been organized, which has issued an appeal to the inhabitants, calling upon all to unite in an effort to meet the emergency in a becoming manner. The appeal concludes as follows:

"We call upon Memphians to unite in shouldering the heavy burden once more laid upon us. We implore one and all to protect the good name of the city from the possible imputation, by the world at large, of being a community of beggars, sitting idly down and expecting others to take care of our interests and feed our poor. Let the good men of Memphis do their whole duty now, and with economy, honesty, and a thorough system in our management, we hope earnestly not to be compelled to ask charity of the world. Let it be understood that all moneys or supplies sent to us will be used for these purposes—feeding the sick, aged, and helpless in camps selected for health, giving employment to the able-bodied men thrown out of employment by the fever, guarding property, public and private, and in such public works as will promote the health and business of our city when the fever abates. We shall keep careful records of all receipts and disbursements, publishing the same in such a form as will be a sufficient guarantee to all contributors that their donations have been properly and economically applied."

Refugees from Memphis have carried the yellow fever to Shelbyville, Tenn., Brooklyn, N. Y., and Hoboken, N. J., one case being reported at each place. Two families came on to New York and settled in a tenement house in 109th Street. Shortly after their arrival one of them developed symptoms of yellow fever and died. Other members of the families have since become ill, and considerable apprehension has been caused. The whole party has been isolated, and it is hoped there will be no spread of the disease in the city.

Precautions were taken at the General Post Office, in this city, on Friday last, for the first time, to prevent the dissemination of yellow fever by means of mail matter from Memphis and other doubtful localities. Postmaster James ordered a liberal supply of disinfectant, and all mail-bags and packages from the South will be thoroughly treated. Three mails arrive here via Memphis daily.

Jewish Persecution on a Small Scale.—The president of the Manhattan Beach Company, has publicly expressed the wish that Hebrews shall not patronize the Manhattan Beach Hotel or Railway. He declares that he is influenced solely by a desire to render the property of the company as profitable as possible, and to keep a resort to which the best class of people will be glad to go. The president appears to have been born some hundreds of years after his proper time. His ideas belong to a century considerably earlier than this. "People" must have strangely degenerated if the "best class" are deterred from staying at an hotel, or riding on a railroad, by the fact that it is open to persons of any sect or any race who can pay for the accommodation. In this boasted land of equality this president will probably learn that his petty persecution meets with the merited contempt of all classes.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey Arrived in New York from Europe July 26th, and will remain a short time with Mr. Moody to assist Mr. Sawyer in his Gospel Temperance work at Cooper Union.

Mr. Sankey sat in the congregation in Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle on Sunday July 13. He was recognized by the great preacher, who deputed a deacon to invite him to the platform. Then the preacher asked the evangelist to sing for his people in the evening. The Tabernacle was crowded, and Mr. Sankey sang "Who is on the Lord's side?" Mr. Spurgeon announced the American evangelists intended departure, and when afterward the latter sang "Hold the Fort" the entire congregation rose to their feet spontaneously and joined in the chorus so lustily that Mr. Spurgeon remarked that the roof of his Tabernacle having withstood that volume of sound might be considered safe. The enthusiasm of the audience was so great that Mr. Spurgeon had the chorus sung over three times. That was the evangelist's last song in Europe. Mr. Sankey thinks Mr. Spurgeon is the most original preacher of the age.

The Saloon Keeper's Dogs Tamed.—In a Western city a few devoted women were praying on the sidewalk before a saloon. The proprietor, in a fit of anger, set two dogs on the leade of the meeting. With a quiet yet fearless spiri she laid her hands upon their heads and continued praying while they crouched at her feet. Tha saloon has now been used for three years for gospel temperance meetings, the man very soon giving up his business, and he and his six brother have all become Christians.

Dr. Talmage's Tour in England Appear from reports in the English journals, to have bee any thing but a period of rest for the eminen preacher. All the principal towns of Great Bri ain have been eager to receive him, and wherev he has been, crowds of people have thronged listen to his sermons and lectures.

The English edition of the CHRISTIAN HERA of July 16th, announces that Dr. Talmage wou lecture on July 16th at Preston; 17th, at Middl boro'; 18th, at Maiton. Sunday, July 20th, se mon at Leeds; 21st, at Bradford; 22d, at Hu dersfield; 23d, at Bolton; 24th, at Halifax; 25t at Derby; 26th, at Burslem; 28th, at Colne; 29t at Perth; 30th, at Aberdeen; 31st, at Dundee.

Dr. Talmage would also lecture again in Gl gow in St. Andrew's Great Hall on Friday, A gust 1st, and preach there on Sunday, August and lecture again in Manchester Free Trade H on Monday, August 4th. Very large and ent siastic audiences have attended his lectures.

The Mormon Elder, George Reynolds, w was recently tried and sentenced for polyga has been transferred from the Nebraska Penit tiary to a prison near Salt Lake City. Thi considered as equivalent to a pardon, and i cates that the Government are not in earnest their efforts to put down the "peculiar inst tion" of Mormondom.

A Patriarchal Church.—A Missionary of American Sunday-school Union describe a church of eighty-five members which has gr out of a Sunday-school established by him. the school is a man seventy-eight years old. has fourteen children and over a hundred gr children now living. He says he never had casion to call a physician to his family. wife, who never went to school but three mo taught him his letters after he was thirty old. For forty years he says he has stuc the following as his rules of health: "Se the Scriptures daily. Owe no man. Live p ably with all men. Work hard. Drink spring water and buttermilk." He walk to church regularly every Sunday, though three miles away from it. Most of the men are related to the venerable patriarch.

A Jewish Rabbi Converted at Mr. Mo meetings.—The New York Evening Post that "Mr. Moody's most remarkable conv Baltimore was Professor Reider, a Jewish who has now entered the M.E. ministry. He will soon give a series of lectures at Balti explaining how and why he became a Christ

The First Volume of the "Christian H and Signs of Our Times," comprising Nos 39, from October 24th, 1878, to June 26th, will shortly be ready, and may be had, bou cloth, for $2.50, on application at this offi 63 Bible House, New York.

The Cost of Whiskey at Trenton, N. J., is stated to have been on July 4 a heavy account. Some patriotic citizens celebrating Independence Day in Chinese fashion fired a rocket which fell on the roof of the Third Presbyterian Church and set it on fire. The fire department was at once communicated with, but they are stated to have celebrated the day by imbibing copious draughts of whiskey, and with the idiotic firmness which this liquor is celebrated for producing they insisted that they were bound to obey their orders to remain where they were. As a consequence the fire in the church effected injury to the extent of nearly fifteen thousand dollars. Had the firemen been in a condition to do their duty the damage would have been trifling. If the loss could be imposed as a fine on the man who made the liquor, the man who sold it, and the men who drank it, there would be a general feeling that justice had been done.

Relief in Answer to Prayer.—The Prayers of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting were requested on July 10 for a young Hollander who had lost his employment through sickness. Consumption set in, and with that baleful disease upon him he wandered through the streets homeless, and for three nights found his only resting place in a depot. Having a sister and brother in Holland who he thought would care for him, he desired to return to his native land. But he had no means to pay his passage, and in his sore strait asked prayer for Divine interposition. This, of course, was at noon. By six o'clock that night the way was open, the means provided.

A Curious Preservation of a Bible.—There is a Bible in Lucas County, Ohio, which has a remarkable history. It belongs to Mr. Sheboldt, a native of Bohemia. It was formerly the property of his grandmother, who was a very devout Protestant. During one of those unfortunate periods when religious persecutions were common in Austria, a law was passed at the instance of the Roman Catholics that every Bible in the hands of the people should be surrendered to the priests, to be burned. Mrs. Sheboldt determined to save hers, and when the party came to search her house she had just prepared a huge batch of dough for the oven, and, taking her precious Bible, she wrapped the yielding dough around it and quickly deposited it in the oven. Here it was thoroughly baked, but it was saved uninjured from the fiery furnace of the priests. It has passed through several generations as a memorial of the days when men were not allowed to worship God in accordance with the dictates of their own consciences.

A Sad Calamity.—A most terrible powder magazine explosion occurred at Bodie, California, July 10th, by which eight persons were instantaneously killed and more than forty seriously injured. The scene at Miners' Union Hall, used as a temporary hospital, was heart-rending. The building was filled with the killed, the wounded, and hundreds of people seeking friends and relatives. The magazine contained about five tons of giant powder, and the shock was felt on the surface a distance of twenty miles. Many boarding-houses, restaurants and other buildings were more or less shattered.

The Haste to be Rich we know leads to a snare. In San Francisco as in other cities the snare often takes the form of suicide. Sixty five persons have committed suicide within a little more than four years in the city of San Francisco, the cause in each case having been attributed to stock gambling, or to difficulties arising out of stock gambling.

Queen Victoria and Liberty of Conscience.— It is stated that a short time ago some bigoted officials dismissed from the royal household a domestic whose behavior the Queen had observed with approbation. The Queen missed her from her accustomed place, and on learning that the girl's attendance at a Baptist meeting-house had led to her removal, Her Majesty immediately commanded her restoration to her former position.

An Extraordinary Family.—About four hundred people gathered at Salem, Mass., July 10th, to engage in the reunion of the Dodge family. William E. Dodge, the well known Christian merchant of New York, was chosen president, with several vice presidents and secretaries. In the course of proceedings, the chairman introduced General Augustus Cæsar Dodge of Iowa, saying that he served in the United States Senate with his father. The Senator spoke at some length in regard to the branch of the family to which he belonged, and at the request of the chairman spoke of some of his father's experiences in the West. William E. Dodge spoke at length of his father, and said that the American Peace Society was formed in his father's house. A committee was chosen to arrange for the publication of a genealogy. Robert Dodge of New York said that the family approached a million of descendants!

Revenue from Drunkards.—The Extent to which the vice of drunkenness prevails in the city of New York may be learned from the fact that during the month of June last the sum of $2777 has been received as fines imposed on that proportion of drunkards who have been disorderly.

The New Bishop of Jerusalem.—When Canon Tristram felt constrained to decline the English Premier's offer of the See of Jerusalem, some anxiety was felt as to the selection of another substitute. Upon the recommendation of Lord Shaftesbury, however—who is now the sole survivor of the four originators of this Protestant bishopric—Lord Beaconsfield has been induced to offer the vacant mitre to the Rev. Dr. Joseph Barclay, Rector of Stapleford, Herts, a well-known author, skilled in Hebrew, Arabic, and German, and the translator of, and commentator on, parts of the Talmud. Dr. Barclay has accepted the offer, and the appointment is generally considered a very suitable one.

The Assegai, the Destructive Weapon used in Zululand with such disastrous effect, is thus described by a traveller in South Africa: The shaft of the instrument of warfare is about five feet long and about as thick as a man's little finger. It is made of wood not unlike the mahogany, brittle and elastic, the latter quality giving the spear a vibratory motion, on which its accuracy of flight depends. The head of the weapon is generally blade-shaped, with a raised edge along the centre like the feathers of an arrow. The tongue of the head is made red hot, and so burns its way into the wood, around which a band of wet rawhide is bound; that contracting as it dries, holds the head as firmly as an iron ring. The Zulus fling these weapons with great accuracy, and they carry oval rawhide shields impervious to these darts to cover their entire bodies. Besides three or four missile assegais a Zulu soldier carries a shorter and stronger stabbing assegai.

Dr. Cullis and others, of Boston, have purchased the old buildings of the Randolph-Macon College, in Mecklenburg County, Va., and propose to establish an educational institution for the intellectual and spiritual improvement of the colored people, on the faith principle, as adopted by Müller, of Bristol, England, in his Orphanage, and by Dr. Cullis in his home for incurable invalids.

The President as Arbitrator.—President Hayes has been acting as arbitrator in a dispute between Paraguay and the Argentine Republic over a strip of land. On the formal transfer of the land to Paraguay its principal city was named Villa Hayes.

A Colored Bishop Called for.—The Colored preachers of the Washington Methodist Episcopal Conference, holding appointments in Baltimore and vicinity, have held a meeting and adopted a resolution to the effect that the time has come when one man of African descent should be elected to the office of bishop, and urging colored members of the Methodist Church to agitate the question, and if necessary demand his election by the General Conference, which meets in Cincinnati next May.

THE PRESENT CRISIS.

A New Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face: in their affliction they will seek me early."—Hosea 5: 15.

God's Withdrawal the Worst of Calamities—National and Individual Consequences—I. National Troubles—England's Present Grievous Adversity—War, Depressed Trade, Gloomy Harvest Prospects—National Prayer Demanded—Why National Prayer might not Avail—Punishment may be Necessary—The Prayers God will not Answer—National Prayer may not be General—Unbelievers and Formalists—What is to be Done—True Believers the Hope of a Country—Every Christian a Priest to Plead—II. Personal Trials of Believers—Chastisement First, then Withdrawal—The Christian's Duty—III. Personal Trials of the Sinner—The Only Way of Healing.

The Lord does not always tell us what He will do. "Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself, O God of Israel, the Saviour." He has told us that "it is the glory of God to conceal a thing," and our Lord Jesus has said, "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power." When He does make known to us what He is about to do, it is not to gratify our curiosity but to direct our conduct.

In this case the Lord speaks aloud concerning His intentions. He had grown weary with chastening His people, and therefore He was about to withdraw Himself from them and leave them alone, as a man leaves a hopeless work, or as a judge leaves the bench and gives over the prisoner to condemnation. He says, "I will go and return to my place," as if His waiting time was over, and He would no longer remain in their midst to be provoked by their obstinacy. This withdrawal would occasion the non-acceptance of their prayers and offerings, even as He had said in a former verse, "They shall go with their flocks and with their herds to seek the Lord; but they shall not find him; he hath withdrawn himself from them." This He tells them, in order that they may be led to implore Him to remain with them; or that if He be already gone, they may by hearty confession of their sin, and an immediate seeking of His face, prevail upon Him once more to visit them in His grace.

If God is about to go, then all is going, even hope itself is removing. The divine departure is the worst of calamities, and therefore it is but right that those who are threatened with such a judgment should put their thoughts together and consider their ways, and use the best means to hold Him by the skirts ere yet He has departed, or to bring Him back again before He has effectually closed the door between Him and them. There should be an eager desire to bring the King back, that once more the heart may sun itself in the light of His favor.

Dear friends, I shall speak this morning with the most anxious desire to be practical; longing and praying in my heart that wherever sin has begun to separate between us and God we may be stirred up to acknowledge our offences and to seek His face, and that where such a separation has long existed there may arise an intense desire of the whole soul to return from its banishment and draw near to God.

We shall this morning use our text first in reference to our national troubles, for the words were originally spoken with regard to the national troubles of Israel and Judah; secondly, we shall use it in reference to our personal trials as believers; and then, thirdly, in its relation to the personal trials of the unconverted. Lessons may here be learned instructive in each of the three cases. May the Holy Ghost speak the truth home to the heart.

I. And first with regard to our present

NATIONAL TROUBLES.

I desire to speak of these things as before God in all sincerity and simplicity. I know it is impossible to touch upon such a subject without being suspected of political bias, but I can truly declare that from all such partiality I desire to be freed, that I may not speak as a partisan, but as the servant of the living God. Calmly and solemnly would I speak words of soberness and truth and justice. It is a burden to my heart to speak a hard word of my own beloved country, and if I seem to do so it is not in wantonness, but because of a pressure upon my conscience which will not let me be silent.

Surely no one will deny that our country is passing through a season of great and grievous adversity. We have been perplexed for many months, and even for years, with perpetual rumors of wars. For a long time no man knew when he went to rest at night but what the journal of the morning would inform him that our nation had plunged into war with one at least of the great powers of Europe. Our policy has been such, whether wise or unwise, that we have been constantly on the verge of conflict. It is wonderful that we have escaped from embroiling ourselves in long and serious war, for many a time the flames of contention have threatened a general conflagration.

This disquietude of itself has been a serious injury to the prosperity of our country, for trade and commerce make prosperous voyages upon the waters of peace, but even before those waters are disturbed by the storms of actual war, while only the threat of battle ruffles the surface, they make small headway or are driven back. Commerce is timid as a dove, and is fluttered by every turmoil or whisper of coming trouble. In a thousand ways political agitations stab at the heart of national prosperity.

In addition to this we have been actually engaged in two wars at the least, wars certainly expensive and questionably expedient. In these two conflicts it was impossible for us to gain honor, since they were cases of the mighty assailing the feeble. Laurels gained from nations so far inferior to us would have been unworthy of a place upon the brow of a brave nation. We have invaded one country and then another with no better justification than the law of superior force, or the suspicion of future danger. Disaster has followed upon the heels of disaster, and at the end of it all there are great expenses to be met.

Our acts of aggression must be paid for not only with the blood of our soldiers, but with the sinews and sweat of our working men. Results of industry which ought to have gone to support the arts and promote the comfort and advancement of the race have been thrown away in wasteful feats of arms. The food which should have fed our children has been flung into the mouth of the lion, to be devoured by war, that its evil spirit may become yet more ravenous. Wilful waste, it is to feared, will be followed by woful want unless God in His mercy shall interpose.

We have meddled in many things, and have threatened at least three of the great quarters of the globe either with our fleets or our armies. Nothing could content us till we had drawn the sword against a brave though savage people, whose fighting may well be fierce, since it is for their invaded fatherland. These wars, whatever their issue, are SERIOUS CALAMITIES.

On the back of all this war has come depression in trade. Everywhere there is complaining, and not without cause. Even the most cheerful of men, who have always been rejoicing when others have lamented, begin at last to look very serious, and to own that the times are threatening. Striving tradesmen wonder whether they shall be able to "provide things honest in the sight of all men." Many a man now plans and labors, but his care and toil earn but a scant reward. All trade is dull, and some trade is dead. Some branches of industry are already paralysed, and there is but little prospect of their ever being revived. The land mourns, and men's hearts sink for fear. Matters are not so bad as despondency would paint them, but even hope is unable to draw a cheerful picture. It is a day of darkness and of gloominess, a day of clouds and of thick darkness.

As if all this were not enough, the heavens refuse to assist the processes of husbandry. For the most part the crop of hay, so needful for the cattle, may be regarded as lost, and now the great peril is upon the corn. In some places the corn is too backward to have suffered much at present, but in others the prospects are dark indeed. It seems certain that a continuance of this constant rain must deprive us of the most precious fruits of the earth. Farmers are beginning to cry out bitterly, and there is a demand that prayer should be offered in all the churches for fair weather. May God be pleased to look upon our land and deliver us in this hour of trouble, for indeed it is a time of loss and ruin to thousands!

In the first matter, that of a warlike policy, we may by God's goodness make a change. It may be possible that ere long better principles will come to the front, and we may no longer be made to appear as a nation of snarlers and growlers, breathing defiance, and delighting in war. God grant it speedily! But as to the two other matters, what can we do? We are powerless to quicken trade, we are certainly powerless to stay the bottles of heaven. If God wills it, the clouds will gather from day to day, and drench our fields with their pitiless downpour. Deluge will follow deluge till the corn shall rot in the fields, if God so determines.

Prayer is therefore desired, and well it may be. But by some prayer is desired as if it were quite certain that if certain pious words are repeated the rain must necessarily cease and the weather become favorable. I am not quite so sure. Let prayer be offered by all means, but only under certain conditions can it prove effectual. I know of many reasons why it may be possible that such prayers as are likely to be offered will not be heard, but instead thereof the threatened judgment of God may nevertheless come upon us.

I desire, this morning, to speak about prayer in the way of warning, lest men should place an unwise confidence in the formality of reading a form of prayer in churches, or uttering extempore formalities in meeting-houses. Few men believe more thoroughly in the power of real prayer than I do, and I have tested and proved it in many remarkable ways so fully that I can have no doubts as to its efficacy, but heartily magnify the name of our prayer-hearing God. But still we must use our understandings, lest we be deceived, and come to expect what we shall not receive.

I would call to your recollection the fact that, under certain circumstances, God does not answer prayer. Our text says, "I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence"; and, if this be the case, there will be no answering of prayer till repentance is manifested. Sometimes the heavens are brass, even to good men, and their cries reverberate and come back into their own ears, not without a blessing to themselves, but still without any visible reply as to the people for whom their intercessions were offered.

David, doubtless, prayed earnestly that he might escape from the chastisement of his sin when he numbered the people, but it could not be removed. He had a choice of three evils, but one of the three was inevitable. When God has come to this pass with a people, that He must and will smite them, prayer is their only resource, and even that may fail to avert the threatened stroke. A child may have so transgressed that his father may feel bound to punish him, and then he will not spare the rod because of his crying. I pray God that the rain may cease, but if it should be continued it will not be because the Lord cannot help us, or has ceased to answer prayer. Here is the secret of it all, and with trembling do I quote the words: "Behold, the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save; but your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid his face from you, that he will not hear. For your hands are defiled with blood." (Is. 59: 1-3.)

Remember, too, that not only may God withdraw Himself in anger, but it may be His determination to punish a people out of a far-seeing design for their good. Perhaps, as a nation, we have had too much prosperity. Ease and plenty have begotten pride and luxury, and these may have weakened the spirit of the nation. It may have become absolutely necessary for this favored nation, if it is to be still the stronghold of liberty and the fortress of gospel truth, that it should again endure those northern blasts of adversity which have aforetime strengthened it at heart. It will not be the first time that our land has suffered for her good.

Bad harvests and decaying trade are not new things to Englishmen. There linger among us now a few venerable men and women who can tell us of the straits of the old war time, of how there was great scantiness of bread, and heaviness of taxation, and frequent alarms from abroad and riots at home. What a long and dreary time it was when the sound of cannon might almost be heard across the straits, and watchfires were ready on every cliff and height! Yet good came of the affliction, and since that gloomy time the country has made rapid progress in many respects, and especially in freedom, civil and religious. It may be so again. I would not wish ill to my country, but if our fellow men will not remember God except in adversity, adversity itself might be desired by the kindest heart.

But, saith one, "We hope we shall have

NATIONAL PRAYER."

I hope so, too, but will there be a national confession of sin? If not—how can mere prayer avail? Will there be a general desire to do that which is just and right between man and man? Will that be a declaration that England's policy is never to trample on the weak or pick a quarrel for her own aggrandizement? Will there be a loathing of the principle that British interests are to be our guiding star instead of justice and right? Personal interests are no excuse for doing wrong; if they were so we should have to exonerate the worst of thieves, for they will no invade a house until their personal interests invite them. Perhaps the midnight robber ma yet learn to plead that he only committed burglary for fear another thief should take th spoil, and make worse use of it than he. Do the footpad stop a passenger on the road for an other than his own interests?

When our own interests are our policy, nob ity is dead and true honor is departed; but fear that only a minority are of this mind. W the nation repent of any one of its sins? W it settle itself down like the people of Jerusale during the great rain of Ezra's time and do th which is right in the sight of God? Rememb what they said in that day: "The people a many, and it is a time of much rain, and we a not able to stand without, neither is this a wo of one day or two: for we are many that ha transgressed in this thing." If stern reform tion went with supplication, I am persuad that prayer would prevail; but while sin is g ried in my hopes find little ground to rest up

But will there be general prayer? No, the will not. I speak sadly, but I speak no more than the truth. There are numbers among us who say that prayer is of no use with regard to the winds and the clouds, for certain laws govern the weather, and prayer cannot affect these laws. These men, therefore, will not pray, and there are multitudes of others of like spirit whose atheism is practical though it is unavowed. How, then, can prayer be general when such vast numbers utterly disregard it?

Turn your eyes to Nineveh. When Jonah threatened that great city, and upon its repentance the judgment was withdrawn, of what character was its humiliation? From the king on the throne even to the beasts in the field all were clothed with sackcloth, and fasted, and cried out to God, and therefore we marvel not that He heard them. Will there be any such crying to God among us? I trow not. A defiant silence will seal millions of lips. But that those who are supposed to pray ; are all these en of the Elias stamp, whose fervent prayer uld open, or shut the windows of heaven? We re not put much confidence in the prayers hich will be offered. Will they be offered in th by a tenth of those who will repeat them? vish I could hope so.

By many the public prayer will be regarded as solutely ridiculous, and by many more as a ere matter of form, which it is proper to use, it in which no confidence whatever can be aced. Do not therefore say, if the rain should ntinue by the month together, that prayer as ordered by the Archbishop of Canterbury, id that God did not hear it, and therefore all ayer is idle. No, but see what kind of prayer will be, and how little connected it will be with nfession, and how little it will be general, and w little it will be sincere, and then you will ot wonder if no comfortable answer comes of it. may be that my text will be the sole answer of e Lord—"I will go and return to my place, ll they acknowledge their offence, and seek my ce: in their affliction they will seek me rly."

WHAT THEN IS TO BE DONE?

This much is to be done. All hope for a untry lies in the true believers who dwell erein. Remember Sodom, and how it would ave been spared had there been ten righteous en found therein, and know that ye also are e salt of the earth, by whom it is to be conrved. Loathe the spirit of those who say that, ecause we are citizens of heaven we are to have othing to do with the concerns of men below. more un-Christianlike sentiment, a more selfh sentiment, never degraded spiritual minds. Wherever the Jews dwelt in the days of their cattering they were commanded to care for the ood of the people among whom they dwelt. Here are the words of the Lord by Jeremiah: Seek the peace of the city whither I have aused you to be carried away captives, and pray nto the Lord for it: for in the peace thereof hall ye have peace." Surely Christians are not o be less generous than Jews.

Happily we are not under a despot ; in Engand we are our own governors, and the man who in this land does nothing to secure the good government of the country is, by his silence, on the side of wrong. You cannot shirk our responsibility anyhow except by clearing out of the land altogether, and then if it suffers y your absence you will still be found guilty. You are part and parcel of the nation, for you hare in its protection and privileges, and it is yours as Christian men to feel that you are bound in return to do all you can in the midst of it to promote truth and righteousness.

What then? What couse should we now pursue? Let us make confession of sin on behalf of the people as Moses and Jeremiah and Daniel did aforetime. You may not consider that to be sin which I judge to be so, but, my brother, you see sin enough all around you of one sort or another. Take it to yourself, and as the high priest went in to the holy place to plead for the people, so act you as a priest before God, in your quiet personal devotions. Confess the sin of this nation before God. If it will not repent, repent for it. Stand as a sort of consecrated sponsor before God, and let the sin lie on your heart till you fall on your face before the Most High.

Remember, the saints are intercessors with God for the people. Ye are God's remembrances, and, as ye are called to make mention of His name, keep not silence day nor night, but in this hour of trouble pour out your hearts before Him. Get you up to your Carmels and cry aloud, you that know how to cry unto God, that He may send deliverance, and when you have prayed for this people and asked the Lord to forgive its sin, and also to take away the chastising rod, then all of you promote by your daily lives, your precepts, and your actions, "whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report." Be on the side of temperance and sobriety ; be on the side of peace and of justice ; be on the side of every thing that is according to the mind of God, and according to the law of love. Love God and your fellow men, and seek to promote all interests which look that way.

I believe that a country can never have a larger blessing, a truer safeguard for the present, or a firmer security for its future greatness, than a band of praying men and women who make mention of it before the throne of God. English history from the first day till now is as full of instruction as the history of Israel from Egypt even to Babylon. Did you ever read Cowper's wonderful description of the care which God has taken of this little island, how He has favored and protected it? When all the nations were in arms against it they could not touch its shore, for God was there: and on the other hand the Lord has laid low, and made us suffer, when we have boasted of our fleets and armies.

Our nation has been as much under the peculiar and especial providence of God as were the descendants of Jacob themselves, and therefore God deals with us as He does not deal with other nations. The smothering of black men with smoke in the caves to which they had fled, the burning down of human habitations, and the hunting of men as if they were wild beasts, is a greater iniquity with us than it would have been in savages, or even in Papists or Mahomedans. Our religion is higher, nobler, purer than theirs ; and we ought to be ashamed to act as they do. Bloodshed by some nations God winketh at, for they know but little better, but a country which has in it the very sun of the Gospel shining in the fulness of its strength should set to the world an example which it can follow, and, if it does not, it may expect to have trouble after trouble and blow after blow from the hand of God.

Thus have I spoken what was burdening my heart ; make what you will of it, it is the warning of an honest lover of his country, who fears the Lord and fears none besides. Judge me to have spoken with political bias or not, and censure me as you choose, I could say no less, or I would gladly have held my peace. Before God I am clear in this thing of any attempt but an upright one. May God grant that my feeble protest may touch the hearts of those who ought to feel its truth. I am not very sanguine that it will be so, for we have fallen upon evil times, and the heart of the people has waxen gross.

II. And now, secondly, let us view the text in reference to our as believers. Brethren and sisters, let us now commune with one another concerning the ways of God with our own souls. The Lord will not cast off His people ; notwithstanding their faults they are His own children, and they shall be His children forever. But when His children sin, God is sure to chasten them for it. "You only have I known of all the people, therefore will I punish you for your iniquities." He leaves His enemies alone for a while, but He smites His sons. His foes shall go unpunished till the end shall be ; but as for His beloved, He is exceedingly jealous over them, and He will make them smart when they sin.

Has the Lord been chastening any of us of late? Has the moth been in our estates, or has the lion been tearing our peace? Let us turn at His rebuke ; let us say unto the Lord, "Show me wherefore thou contendest with me. Lord, if thou art smiting me, I would not be as the horse or as the mule which have no understanding, but I would turn unto thee at once, before thou smitest me again." It is good to repent at once, and seek our heavenly Father's face betimes.

For, note next, when chastisements are of no avail with drawment follows. The Lord has promised that He will not forsake His people, nor will He utterly do so, but there are withdrawments which are not included in that promise. God may so hide Himself from His servants that they may have no conscious fellowship with Him, no enjoyment of His word, no power in prayer ; in fact, they may pray and He may shut out their prayer. Their life may be sapless and spiritless ; joy and peace may flee.

They may possibly try at such times to make up for their loss by enjoying the world. They may run after carnal pleasures and vain amusements, but they cannot fill their minds therewith ; they are spoiled for such empty vanities ; grace has made them incapable of finding soul food in the corn and wine of earth : they must have their God or die. Let me tell you most solemnly that it is a very sad thing when God has withdrawn from a believing spirit, and the more holy a man has been the more sadly will he lament that he is now under a cloud, and the more earnestly will he cry, "Oh that I knew where I might find him, that I might come even to his seat."

When these withdrawments of God are painfully felt, then we should begin most eagerly to search out the sin which has caused them ; for sin is at the bottom of it all. If, believer, there be a quarrel between thy Beloved and thyself, is there not a cause? Our Lord Jesus is no fitful lover, who in a pet will leave the soul which is espoused to Him merely to indulge a whim. Far otherwise ; He never trifles with us, but treats our love as a sacred thing. There is some grave cause whenever the Beloved frowns.

Now for a thorough search, a sweeping of the house, and a cleansing out of all things that offend. Throughout the heart, the understanding, and the lips let a search warrant be issued, and if any sin be detected—and it will not be long before it will be—let it be brought to light and judged. Set it in the light of God's countenance and there confess it and lament it. Make no apologies, and excuses, and explanations, but honestly confess the wrong and leave it.

But, beloved, when you have obtained a sense of the sin or sins which separate you from God, and have made a full confession, then take care that you seek the Lord with hopefulness and confidence, for, notwithstanding all this, you are His child still, and must not give way to a paralyzing despair. You are married unto Christ, and there is no divorce with Him, "for the Lord the God of Israel saith he hateth putting away." He will not cast off for ever nor put away his erring spouse. Come, therefore, unto Him with humble confidence. He hath torn and He will heal, He hath smitten and He will bind us up.

If He withdraws, it is only that you may sigh after Him and seek after Him. A nurse, when her little child will go away from her and fall into danger, will sometimes hide herself away from it, to teach it better. She sees the child still, though the little one cannot see her. She is near to help, but the child cannot find her, and so it begins to cry for her, and does not rest till she is found. The child will not so soon wander again. Even so may the Lord hide His face to make us cry after Him, but He is very near us all the while, and He will yet be found of us.

III. And now my time is almost spent, indeed I have but a few minutes to use on the third head, and I would therefore speak few words, but speak them very earnestly indeed. We shall now think of the personal TRIALS OF THE SINNER.

Oh, you that are unconverted, if God means to save you, He will before long begin by chastening you in body or in mind. You will have trouble. You are a wandering sheep, and God will send His black dog after you to fetch you to the fold. If one trouble does not do it, you will have another, and another, and another. Perhaps I speak to some who, as the result of providential chastenings, and the work of conscience on their spirit, have already been aroused ; let them take heed of trifling with their awakenings. After that earnest sermon, or after reading that stirring book, you did begin to pray, but your desires and feelings have now subsided. I would have you greatly grieve over this. Let me warn you that God may withdraw Himself from you altogether.

Some have been sitting in this Tabernacle now for years from whom I fear God has withdrawn Himself; for you used to feel much moved by the Gospel, but it is not so now. You would not come when you were called and admonished, but you revolted more and more, and now mercy is growing weary of you. You were smitten again and again, but you still rebelled, and now God says, "Let him alone." This is a more terrible calamity than you suspect; unless it be averted it will be your ruin.

You must now return to your God, or you will never be right. It is vain to look to priests, or sacraments, or religiousness: all these things put together are nothing; you must have personal dealings with your God, and you must confess your sin to Him, or you will be eternally undone. Go and do it this morning. Tell Him all that you know about your sin, and ask Him to have mercy upon you for Jesus' sake. Seek to know Him as He manifests Himself in Jesus. Be willing to believe whatever He pleases to reveal. Be anxious to be reconciled to Him. Long to be at peace with the great God who made the heavens and the earth. Why should there be a quarrel between your Creator and your soul?

The way of reconciliation is by the blood of His Son Jesus Christ. You must, therefore, trust Jesus, and you shall find the peace of God. Oh may His Spirit help you to do this now. Seek Him, and seek Him intensely, resolving that you will never cease to seek till you find God full of mercy and love to you. Come, I pray you, and turn unto the Lord now, and may the Holy Spirit aid you in so doing. He hath torn and He will heal you. He hath smitten and He will bind you up. After two days will He revive you, in the third day He will raise you up, and you shall live in His sight.

The smitings of His providence are meant to separate you from the love of sin, and drive you to your God. In Jesus Christ the great Father stretches out His arms to you and says, "Come now, and let us reason together: though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." Believe in Jesus and live. "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found, call ye upon him while he is near: let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon." God bless you, my beloved friends, for His name's sake. Amen.

A DOUBLE TIE.

A Recollection by Major Malan.

Joe Enlists in the Hope of Becoming a Traveller—His Mother Draws her own Conclusions from his First Letter—He Leaves for the Seat of War—His First "Despatch" Home—A Wounded Officer Arrives in the Village—He is Wounded by the Arrow of Love—He Dines at the Manor House—He Returns to the Seat of War.

A HEARTY country lad was striding along the lanes of an English village early one morning, as if he had important business on hand, which he meant to settle that day. He was dressed in his best; his black wide-awake cocked on one side, and the stick which he swung, as he whistled a lively air, gave him the appearance of being what he really was, a very happy, honest young man. He had passed through a gate, when, turning suddenly round, he stopped whistling, and took a good look down upon a peaceful valley beneath him, in which stood a few cottages. He then once more resumed his stride.

"Where b'e going this morning, Marshall?" said a neighbor who met him on his way to the farm.

"To 'nlist," was the short answer.

"What! Thee be going for sojer? and what do the old people say?"

"Oh, the old folk they don't mind. Mother feels it a bit. But then she say, 'Well, Joe, you go along and see them parts, and come back again and tell us about them.' Terrible' fine places I've heard!"

"But suppose you gets killed, Joe!"

"Yes, but suppose I don't! There's old John Manton up there at Crook, he's been having a shilling a day these many years, and he's got a medal. He's always telling us young chaps we shouldn't stop at home. "Be sojers, boys, be sojers,' says John. So says I to myself, 'Well, anyhow, I'll try my luck, and here goes!'"

"Well, good luck to'e, Joe. Take care of yerself," said the worthy neighbor, as he shook Joe's hand very warmly. "The Lord bless'e."

"Thank'e, thank'e, Willum. I hopes to come back again some day. Give love to mother, and tell her to keep up her heart."

So saying, honest Joe resumed his march. It was a pretty long one, nearly twenty miles, but before evening he had reached the country town, where he went straight to a recruiting sergeant of the Royal Artillery, and entered Her Majesty's service.

Men of his stamp soon make good soldiers. He never complained of having made a bad exchange when he gave up the life of an agricultural laborer for the duties and discipline of the army.

Joe couldn't write, but he dictated a letter to a comrade, by whose pen he sent his mother a good report of his new condition, which cheered her heart, and served for a subject of conversation in that and the adjacent hamlet for several days. Five-and-twenty years ago a newspaper was a very rare visitor in many of the peaceful valleys of England. The convulsions of nature and nations in other lands never disturbed the tranquillity of those homes. A letter from the absent son or brother or a returning sailor or soldier, was the only means of communication with the outer world.

The departure of young Marshall for the army was quite an event. Mrs. Marshall had of course discussed the subject with her neighbors, especially with a family in which it was supposed that Joe was more than usually interested. There was a daughter there, a very good girl, and although Joe had never said any thing, he was supposed to fancy her, as the saying is in those parts. When his first letter came, with best respects to Mr., Mrs. Golder and Louisa, Mrs. Marshall drew her own conclusions; but she did not communicate them.

Joe had just mastered the rudiments of military art when the Crimean war broke out, and he went off with his battery to join the army in the field. It was a fearful contest. From time to time tidings reached England of battle after battle. His mother kept up a brave heart, and as she was a sincere Christian, she knew where to look for comfort concerning her son. "He's a good lad, ma'am; he's a good lad," she would say to the lady of the manor-house, who often visited her; "he's a good lad, sure, ma'am, and 'll not come to any harm."

At length a letter came from Joe. It was quite a despatch. He spoke about battle as if it came in the ordinary day's work. He did not complain of wet nights, hard fare, and other necessities of campaigning. He mentioned the fact that they were going to lay siege to a large town, and that his battery expected to be in the front.

The manor-house already referred to was rented by a retired cavalry officer, who, with his wife and family, resided there. The old soldier was of course deeply interested by every item of news from the seat of war, and the fact that Mrs. Marshall had a son there led to many a word of sympathy which helped to cheer the mother's heart. With his wife and elder daughters he visited the cottages in the surrounding hamlets. Their presence was always welcome, and gladdened the honest laborers and their families.

The winter had passed—a time of much anxiety and sorrow at home, and of great suffering to the army, exposed in tents to the rigors of snow and ice, without proper clothing, and with very scanty provision. Joe had got through it all right, thanks to the hardening of his early farm life.

As the spring wore on the siege progressed; sorties were made by the enemy, but without success. At length tidings came that a general assault had taken place, but that it had been repulsed.

The arrival of a wounded officer in a littl country town is an event of no small importance The entrance of the covered waggon, with a war worn soldier marching by its side, is not ar everyday occurrence, and for want of any thing better to think of, the town folk are considerabl occupied with the stranger. The reputation o the local surgeon, although it cannot be raise higher than it stands in the estimation of his fellow-citizens, receives a certain confirmation b the fact that this important case is under hi care. The local tradesmen anticipate a sligh improvement in trade when the warrior become convalescent, and everybody is generally pleased Perhaps the young ladies are most interested afte all. Their tender hearts imagine all sorts o sufferings in connection with wounds, eve when in a fair way of recovery, and their sympathy is, therefore, probably much stronger tha the harder sex.

The news of such an unusual arrival in th neighboring town soon reached the manor-house The old soldier felt it his duty, as the only representative of the service in those parts, to cal on the wounded man, and show him what attention he could. He often took him fruit, or sen it by his son, who was an aspirant for militar honors. The visits of the veteran were cordiall welcomed by the young lieutenant, who misse the cheerful society of his brother officers.

When the bed was exchanged for a sofa in bow-window, the wounded officer spent most o his time in watching the carriages and carts, an those who passed to and fro below. As th street was straight, he was able to command good view. He was occupied in this way on afternoon when he perceived his friend the colonel riding through the town, accompanied b one of his daughters. As he approached th house, the old officer looked up, and seeing th invalid at the window, reined in, and congratulated him on a first step toward recovery.

The subaltern thanked the colonel; but hi attention was wholly absorbed by the fair girl who in maidenly modesty sat on her horse, stroking its mane with her riding-whip, but neve venturing to look up at the young officer t whom her father was talking. He did not hea a word the colonel was saying, and replie "Yes" to every remark without hesitation. A length curiosity triumphed, and with a timi blush she turned her face upward, and looke at the young hero, as the local papers had style him. He at once turned his eyes toward he father, and appeared as much interested in hi observations as he had been previously in hi own. When she had thus for a few moment honored the wounded soldier with her regard she resumed her former occupation, and he a quickly returned to the contemplation of a picture which thenceforth was to be graven on hi memory. There was a sweetness and a gentleness in that lovely face which won his heart She seemed, as far as he could judge at a glance to personate all that he had learned to conside most worthy of admiration in woman. The interview over, she rode on with her father. Thi vision gave a new turn to the young soldier's life Whether or no he was ever to realize the drea of happiness which rose in his mind as h thought of the maiden who had looked up a him with a womanly tenderness and sympath of which he had been conscious, he must leav for the future. One thing was certain, he wa hit a second time, and although severely wounded, he had no wish to recover.

An invitation to dine at the manor-house wa sent to the young soldier as soon as he had recovered the use of his limbs. It was accepted as may be supposed, without objection. Havin no dress clothes, and not wishing to spen money in what he might never wear a secon time, as he purposed joining his regiment a soon as possible, he apologized for coming i uniform. It is needless to say that a soldier i me of war is always welcome in the uniform of is sovereign, and the scarlet coat created quite sensation in the drawing-room of the old coun- y house. A retired officer of the Guards, on a sit to his friend the colonel, courteously in- sted that the young officer should hand in to nner the daughter to whom we have been al- ady introduced. The happy subaltern could ardly believe his senses as he sat next to her at ble, and, by the kindness of her parents and er friends, was made to feel as one of the mily.

Duty soon called him to return once more to e seat of war. He did not forget the fair face left in the happy old English home; and a ng he had learned shortly before leaving Eng- nd helped to deepen its impression in his emory.

LONDON AND ANCIENT TYRE.

A Prophetic Parallel.

ondon and its Population—Ancient Babylon as described by Kinns and Buckley—Other Ancient Cities—Remarkable parallel between Tyre and London—The four great Sins of Tyre, National pride, Aggression, the Slave Trade, breach of the Brotherly Covenant—Are not Tyre's sins also England's?—England's future judgment indicated.

"LONDON," says the Registrar General of ngland, in his last Annual Summary of Births d Deaths, "is the greatest city of the world. s population exceeds three millions and a lf; or, if we add the population of the sub- bs in the outer ring, the total population FOUR MILLIONS AND A HALF. Its popula- on approaches the aggregate population of enty-two other large towns of the United ingdom. It nearly equals the aggregate popu- tion of Paris, Berlin, and Vienna; or, with th burbs, it equals the populations of the capitals France, Prussia, Austria, and Russia. The ea of this great city is 122 square miles, or a uare of a little more than 11 miles to the side; the density of the population is 29,322 people the square mile, and the proximity of the opulation 11.04 yards; or the people are at a ean distance of 11 yards from each other." oreover, these numbers, vast as they are al- ady, are increasing every year. London, in 78, had 43,693 more inhabitants than in 1877, d upward of a million and a half more than 1842.

This mighty metropolis, according to Colonel enderson, the head of the London Police, con- ins 100,000 foreigners from every quarter of the obe; it has 1500 miles of streets, and 2000 iles of sewers; for gas and water it pays over ,000,000 per annum; it has a birth every three inutes and a death every five minutes—i.e., 8 every day, 2016 every week, 8064 every onth, or 96,768 every year; which bears the roportion that three persons out of every gather- g of one hundred persons, or thirty persons out every gathering of one thousand persons, will e within a year. It has 38,000 drunkards an- ally brought before its magistrates; it has e-third of all the crime in the country com- itted in it; it has 117,000 habitual criminals its police register, increasing at an avarage 30,000 per annum; it thus affords a grand op- rtunity to every one of a philanthropic spirit assisting by personal service or money contri- tion the many efforts for the people's good.

These facts indicating the huge proportions to hich the English metropolis has grown carry r thoughts to other hose once "cloud-capped towers and gorgeous laces" are only known by heaps of stones, by story, and tradition. Dr. Samuel Kinns said st year that Nineveh and Babylon were nearly ice the size of London and its suburbs. Baby- n, he says, quoting from Herodotus, occupied 5 square miles, and was 60 miles in circumfer- ce, and was surrounded by a wall 350 feet gh, 75 feet in thickness.

It was the first city founded after the Deluge, and stood upon the site of Babel. It was in great prosperity in Nebuchadnezzar's time, about 600 B.C. The size of the ancient Eastern cities is by no means a guide as to the number of their inhabitants, because large open spaces, pleasure grounds, and gardens, were constantly formed within their walls, and the seclusion in which women were kept rendered a separate dwelling necessary for each family. Babylon is described by the prophet Jonah as being in his time a "great city," 862 B.C. (Jon. 3: 2).

But perhaps none of these ancient cities afford so striking and characteristic a parallel to London as Tyre, "the crowning city whose merchants were princes, and her trafficers the honorable of the earth" (Isa. 23: 8). Ezekiel gives a striking description of this of antiquity in the twenty-seventh chapter of his prophecy. The various trades carried on, the vast extent of her commerce, her riches and luxury, together with the causes of God's ultimate judgment upon her, are all depicted to the life. The work of the architect, the sculptor, and decorator, had been lavished on the palaces of the merchant princes of Tyre, until she could say, "I am of perfect beauty," and the prophet exclaims, "Thy builders have perfected thy beauty;" "Thy heart was lifted up because of thy beauty."

Other cities arose and fell, yet Tyre remained "the mart of nations." Spoken of B.C. 1444 as the "strong city Tyre," she outlived Thebes, and Babylon, and ancient Jerusalem. Grecian cities crumbled to dust before her; Rome was of comparatively recent date. Tyre was the parent of important colonies that enjoyed a long life and died. Carthage, its greatest colony, perished fifteen centuries before Tyre. Tyre was besieged by Nebuchadnezzar, but not destroyed. Alexander constructed an enormous artificial mole to unite the fortified island city with the mainland, and marched his troops upon it; but Tyre survived. In 1144 A.D. it surrendered to the Crusaders, but its downfall does not date till the spring of 1291. "The same day" that the Sultan of Egypt took possession of Acre, "the Tyrians, leaving the city empty, without the stroke of a sword, without the tumult of war, embarked on board their ships, and abandoned the city" to the Saracens. This was the turning-point in its history, exactly 1879 years after the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar.

Tyre had had intimate relations of friendship with the Lord's people in the days of Solomon, and a greater than Solomon taught and healed within her borders; nevertheless, "It shall be a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea." The silting up of rivers and the shallowness of harbors may change the whole current of commerce, but it is sin that brings down cities and desolates nations.

London, then, may well be called and since the laws of God's moral government are ever the same, and unchangeable, like causes ever producing like results, it will be well for us to inquire what were the special sins of Tyre which brought down upon her the desolating judgment of the Most High. They were mainly four:

1. National pride was one of the chief causes of Tyre's downfall. She sinned in becoming proud of her great riches. "Son of man, say unto the prince of Tyrus, Thus saith the Lord God: Because thine heart is lifted up, and thou hast said, I am a god, I sit in the seat of God, in the midst of the seas"—how often do we hear it said that England is and shall be "mistress of the seas," while one of the national songs of Britain is, "Rule Britannia: Britannia rules the waves"—"with thy wisdom and with thine understanding thou hast gotten thee riches, and thine heart is lifted up because of thy riches: therefore thus saith the Lord God, Because thou hast set thine heart as the heart of God; behold, therefore, I will bring strangers upon thee, the terrible of the nations; and they shall draw their swords against the beauty of thy wisdom, they shall defile thy brightness; they shall bring thee down to the pit, and thou shalt die the deaths of them that are slain in the midst of the seas" (Ezek. 28: 2–8).

2. Again, an aggressive policy on behalf of her colonies was among the sins of Tyre. "By the multitude of thy merchandise they have filled the midst of thee with violence, and thou hast sinned: therefore I will cast thee to the ground, I will lay thee before kings, that they may behold thee. Thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries by the multitude of thine iniquities, by the iniquity of thy traffic; therefore will I bring forth a fire from the midst of thee, it shall devour thee" (Ezek. 28: 16, 18).

"Herodotus and Strabo," says Sir Edward Strachey, "speak of king in the colonies of Tartessus, and for a parallel we need only look at the 'Company of Merchants trading to the East Indies,' extending their rule over a great continent, and there setting up and pulling down kings and emperors at their will. Tyre (like other nations) was noted for the severity with which she ruled her dependencies; but now their bonds are loosed, and the prophet tells Tarshish that she is free as the Nile—the river that least regards any bounds—to wander at her own sweet will. And the proud queen of cities herself, she who so long sat in glory, rejoicing in her wealth and power, and in that antiquity of which the Phœnicians were so proud, shall fly, a dishonored woman, and on foot, for refuge to her colonies.

3. The slave trade was another cause of Tyre's doom, as the opium traffic may be of England's India. "The sons of Judah and the sons of Jerusalem have ye sold unto the sons of the Grecians" (Joel 3: 6); and we notice also in Ezekiel's list, "the persons of men" brought from Javan to the Syrian market.

4. A fourth clause in the indictment against Tyre, is that she "remembered not the brotherly covenant" (Amos. 1: 9). This refers primarily, no doubt, to a friendly alliance between Tyre and Israel, but underlying this is the truth, so sadly exemplified by England, that trade has a tendency to lead men to regard each other simply as buyers and sellers, each considering his own interests, not his brother man's, and thus rapidly to degenerate into selfishness, injustice, and fraud.

Such were the sins of Tyre, and are they not also

THE SINS OF ENGLAND?

Shall it, then, be more tolerable for England in the day of judgment than it was for Tyre? England is now in these last days what Tyre was ages ago, and as the Tyre and Tarshish of the present time, not only her judgment, but the very form of it, seems to be revealed. As the greatest maritime power in the world, her glory is in her navy, and through this her boasted strength, will God prove to her, her weakness. Let the following passages be considered:—"The day of the Lord shall be upon every one that is proud and lofty"—all who glory in an "Imperial policy"—and "upon every one that is lifted up, and he shall be brought low; and upon all the cedars of Lebanon, that are high and lifted up, and upon all the oaks of Bashan, and upon all the high mountains, and upon all the hills that are lifted up. And upon every high tower and upon every fenced wall, and upon all the ships of Tarshish, and upon all pleasant pictures" (Isa. 2: 12, 16). "Howl, ye ships of Tarshish; for your strength is laid waste" (Isa. 23: 14).

It would seem from this passage as if some awful naval catastrophe awaited England. As if on some occasion when her magnificent fleet of iron-clads of which she is so proud, and which it is thought are sufficiently powerful to encounter and overcome the combined fleets of the whole world, are gathered together, some swift and sudden destruction will fall upon them. Whether that catastrophe will be of the elements, or of the tornadoes, or the warlike appliances of an enemy does not appear, but that the catastrophe will be sudden and overwhelming when it does come, seems unmistakable.

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

NOT WHOLLY PHILANTHROPIC.

Mr. Vernon having expressed his contempt for ministers of the Gospel and their teaching, looked at Edith to see what effect his remarks had taken on her. He knew how her sensitive mind would quiver under his contemptuous speech, and he waited impatiently for her reply. But none came; he saw, however, the blood mantling her cheek as she suppressed the indignation she obviously felt. At last he said:

"Do you not agree with me Edith?"

As Edith was directly appealed to, she replied, with a quivering lip, "Surely clergymen must not shrink from speaking the whole truth."

"Truth!" repeated Vernon, looking contemptuously at his niece through his large blue spectacles; "do you really believe that the Deity will punish in eternity those who have not what you call faith—those who refuse to tie down their own free opinions to any creed?"

"I do believe it, for He hath said it," replied Edith, her usually pallid face suffused with a glowing flush.

"You weak women so love to keep in your own narrow grooves," observed Vernon, pushing back his chair from the table. "I do not think that there ever yet was a woman who cared to use her judgment, or show anything like wisdom, when she was bent on having her own way."

"You remind me that it was a woman who listened, alas! to the first lie ever spoken on earth, ye shall not surely die," said Edith Temple. She knew that to the man before her, so wise in his own eyes, the tempter was at that moment repeating the same fatal lie.

"Edith, you are an idiot!" exclaimed Vernon, angrily, rising from the table. It was easier to insult the lady than to confute an argument drawn from the Word of God.

Edith Temple rose also, and walked quietly out of the room; but when once she had closed the door behind her, she ran rapidly up to her own apartment in tears.

"I cannot stay here; I will go back, back to my own peaceful retreat—to my own dear loving friends!" was the exclamation of Edith, as she entered that room.

But there was a secret spring of consolation that mingled with and sweetened the bitterness of her feelings. Edith was thankful that she had been given courage to speak even those very few words for her Master, that she had been strengthened to overcome the fear of man that bringeth a snare. Mr. Vernon had called her an idiot, but the words which she had spoken were not her own. Man might mock and despise, but the wisdom of the world is foolishness with God, whose Word alone endureth for ever.

Edith soon dried her eyes, and reflected calmly on the subject of her own position and duties. Would it be well, would it be right, for her to quit the home of her uncle? A very small matter helped Edith to form a clear judgment upon that question.

Wishing to take some writing-materials out of her desk, she unlocked it, and one of the first things that she saw within it was a small jewel-box, which contained almost the only ornaments which Edith now called her own—a chain and bracelet of hair, and a single diamond ring. That ring had been Mrs. Vernon's last gift to her niece, and as Edith now opened her little box, and looked on the beautiful jewel, the pale loving face of her poor aunt was recalled vividly to her mind.

That face seemed to wear the look with which the invalid lady had said, "Oh! Edith, if I should be taken, will you not be a comfort to my dear husband?" Miss Temple remembered that she had kissed her aunt as her only reply; that kiss had been given and received as a silent promise from Edith, and should she break it now because her uncle wounded her feelings and tried her temper?

"I know that I am a comfort to him," said Edith to herself, "for he makes so much use of my eyes. I believe that my uncle cares no more for me than he does for his glasses; but he would miss me, as he would miss them, were he to lose them.

"It is a trial," here Edith sighed, "to be so little fitted as I am to win my uncle's affection or to gain his respect. The fault may be greatly my own; it would be presumption indeed were I to think that all that I have to bear is for 'righteousness' sake.'

"Were I more talented, more bright, more engaging, I might possibly be able to attract my uncle more towards my religion. But I must not despair either of him or of myself," thought Edith; "I may make a tolerable sick-nurse for an old man, though I make a poor companion for a clever one. Perhaps some day, by God's blessing, I may become of more use in this house, and be better loved.

"I will wear this ring," and she put it on her finger, "to remind me of my dear aunt. It will remind me of something else." Edith was gazing on the beautiful star-shaped cluster of brilliants as she thought of one of those sweet verses in which the Holy One tells His people that, however the world may despise them, they are very precious to Him—"They shall be mine, saith the Lord of Hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels."

Edith knelt down and breathed a few words of prayer, then rose serene and almost cheerful. She did not remain in her own apartment to brood over her trials and wrongs, but carried her writing materials to the drawing-room, that she might finish copying out for her uncle a long and to her most dry article on metallic bases.

Edith sat down steadily to her occupation, transcribing page after page, and scarcely raising her eyes from her papers until her task was completed. Just as she was wiping her pen Mr. Vernon came into the room, looking unusually pleasant and cheerful, and holding a labelled blue glass phial in his hand.

"What, Edith, have you finished copying all that article already!" exclaimed Mr. Vernon.

"I have finished it," answered the lady.

"Well, I must own that you are a painstaking girl, and a capital scribe," said the philosopher, who was in a particularly amiable humor. "You deserve a reward, and you shall have one. If you promise not to put it into the hands of any chemist or quack, I will give you the first bottle of my priceless balsam, my Antidote," and with an expression of exultation on his face, Oswald Vernon set down on the table the phial which he had brought.

"Before I thank you for your gift, will you please to tell me what it is, and what I am to do with it?" said Edith.

Mr. Vernon, radiant with triumph, like a conqueror displaying his spoils, took a seat opposite to that of his niece. He then leant forwards to address her with the mysterious manner of one about to disclose a great secret. The philosopher, in his calmer moods, could work out his experiments and watch their results without needing or caring for human sympathy, though ever fond of human praise.

Vernon lived for himself, and in himself, his thirst for fame, his desire for applause, being almost his only links to the outer world. But there are moments when even cold natures lose something of their coldness; when even the selfish want some heart to share their cares or their joys. This was such a moment with Oswald Vernon, and it was this craving for sympathy that brought him to Edith Temple.

"Have you never heard," began the philosopher, "that in India alone, fourteen thousand persons are said to die every year from the effect of snake-bites?" Had Mr. Vernon been recording the most pleasant fact he could not have done so with an air of greater satisfaction.

"That is dreadful," said Edith.

"Dreadful indeed!" echoed the smiling philosopher. "If fourteen thousand thus die in one country, imagine the tremendous list of casualties that there would be from this cause could we procure statistics from all the lands where, beneath a tropical sun, the serpent brood has multiplied unchecked for ages! Think of Africa, Brazil, Chili, Borneo; think of the deep forests, the jungles, the morasses where half-clothed natives have no protection from the fangs of poisonous snakes!"

"There must be a fearful number of victims," observed Edith Temple.

Mr. Vernon bent closer towards the ear of his niece, and lowered his voice to a still more confidential tone as he went on.

"And now tell me, Edith Temple, if a man of science were to find out a cure for this evil, if he were to wrest from Nature a secret which should render harmless the bite of the most venomous snake, tell me, would not such a man be a benefactor to the whole human race?"

"He would indeed!" cried the lady.

"Would you compare with the work of that philanthropist the deeds of your Howard, your Wilberforce, your Shaftesbury?" The sneer on the lip of Vernon, as he asked the question, showed how lightly he esteemed the labors of these self-denying servants of God, and friends of mankind.

"I see no need to compare the works, all so good, so blessed!" said Edith, who rejoiced from her heart in the hope that her uncle had really, as he gave her to understand, found out a cure for the bite of serpents.

"Edith," said Vernon proudly, "the honor i mine of being the first to discover a perfect antidote for one of the most terrible of the evils tha flesh is heir to. I have tried the effect of my Antidote on various creatures—the chicken, the rabbit, the lamb—and in every case. without exception, have found the remedy perfect."

"Thank God!" ejaculated Edith.

A peculiar and by no means pleasing expression flitted across the philosopher's face, on hea ing that intuitive exclamation. He had neve thought of returning thanks to the Being wh had created his brain, directed his thoughts, an given success to his efforts. Vernon gave th credit of his discovery to his own science, pe severance, and wisdom; he had never eve thought of ascribing glory to God.

"It is much to be regretted," observed th philosopher, "that I have had no opportunity testing the effects of my balsam on a human su ject; men object to being bitten by serpent even if assured that the bite will do them more harm than the prick of a lady's needle."

Edith could not help smiling at the remar but without appearing to notice her smile, h uncle went on—"It is one of the great evils civilization that science is so shackled that t life, or even the ease of the lowest ragamuf must not be sacrificed for the good of the wh community."

Edith silently thought, "Very thankful an that science is so shackled, for otherwise to wh dreadful experiments on their fellow-creatu might not the pursuit of that science lead ent siasts like my uncle."

But the lady reproached herself the mon afterwards for harboring such a thought. H unjust she had been to Mr. Vernon! how no were his labors! what a benefactor he was to world!

Edith had not cared to study metallic bas but in any remedy for human suffering she t the keenest interest. It was with animation t she now expressed her hope that the valua balsam might be placed within reach of the po est native of every region infested by poison snakes.

"I have no doubt that our Government take up the subject," said Vernon, "and throughout her Majesty's dominions at least village will be allowed to remain unprovi with my Antidote."

"Is it needful to apply the cure quite rectly?" asked Edith; "must the poor bi native die if he chance to be wounded a mil two from a village in which the balsam is t found?" The question was asked with an e interest which pleased the inventor.

"It is difficult to answer your question with precision," was his reply, "especially as I have been unable to try the effects of my Antidote upon the human frame. The poison of different kinds of reptiles varies in power. Besides, much would depend on whether simple precautions were instantly taken before the balsam could be applied."

"What precautions would be needful?" asked Edith.

"Of course if the wound were sucked at once, there would be less danger of the poison spreading. A strong dose of ammonia would be useful, but this could not always be procured. But the most essential precaution of all is that the patient be kept in constant motion, not suffered for one moment to rest, as sleep would be certainly fatal.

If such means were used to delay the action of the venom, I think that I could guarantee the success of my cure, even if half-an-hour should elapse between the receiving the wound and the liberal use of the balsam."

"Oh, my uncle, how happy you must be!" exclaimed Edith, in the warmth of her heart. "I had rather have invented such a cure than be the Empress of India."

Mr. Vernon was gratified by the heartfelt congratulation of Edith, and felt more kindly towards her than he ever had felt before.

"How eager you must be to spread far and wide the knowledge of your precious balsam!" cried the lady.

"I am, indeed, eager to let the whole world know of my grand discovery," said the philosopher; "but nothing must be done prematurely. I have, of course, to secure a patent for my Antidote; for otherwise it is possible, just possible, that the advantages belonging of right to its inventor might be wrested from him by others."

Edith's warm sympathy cooled down a little at these words; it was clear that to benefit mankind was not the only object of her uncle.

"I have an idea," continued Mr. Vernon, that what cures the bite of serpents may also counteract the poison of mad dogs, and so prevent hydrophobia. I am most anxious to test by experiments whether this be not the case, but difficulties lie in the way.

One can't well advertise for mad dogs," continued the philosopher, with a smile; "and though they sometimes come when they are not wanted, when they are wanted they are not likely to come. I do not intend to apply for my patent till I can advertise my Antidote as warranted to cure wounds inflicted by rabid dogs as well as by venomous serpents."

"But, uncle, may not weeks, months elapse before you are able to do this!" cried Edith.

"Months, yes, perhaps years," answered her uncle. The progress of science, to be sure, must often be slow. Still, if circumstances favor my efforts, I hope to be able to get out my patent before the end of this year."

"And in the meantime hundreds, thousands of men, women, and children, will be dying from snake-bites!" exclaimed Miss Temple. "Oh! why not give them the cure at once?"

"Edith, you talk like a silly impatient child," replied Mr. Vernon in a tone of irritation. "Unless I can get a patent, the Antidote is hardly my own. I may never enjoy the fruit of my labors either in money or fame. I calculate that, if secured to me, its inventor, the balsam will be as a river of gold, bringing in an income of thousands of pounds (an English pound is worth nearly five dollars). If I sell the patent, as I probably may, it will only be for a sum so large as to suffice to gratify what for long has been the dearest wish of my heart."

Vernon drew himself up proudly as he went on. "Edith, I hope to found a museum in my native town, a museum which will carry down my name to remotest posterity, and be an appropriate monument to the discoverer of Antidote." The philosopher leant back in his chair, slowly rubbed his hands, and looked as if he already beheld statues reared to his honor, and heard speeches made in his praise.

THE FRUIT OF THE SPIRIT.

Sunday-School Lesson for Aug. 10th.—Gal. 5 : 22; 6 : 10. Golden Text, 6 : 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE object of our redemption is that we may be fruitful. The bitter reaping of the lost will be that they have lived in vain, and nothing for eternity has come out of their wasted life. "What fruit had ye then," asks Paul, "in those things whereof ye are now ashamed?" (Rom. 6 : 21;) they were but the "unfruitful works of darkness" (Eph. 5 : 11). But to the children of God our blessed Lord says, (John 15 : 16): "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain." And he explains (John 15 : 2-5) the discipline to which He subjects His children: "Every branch that beareth fruit, He purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit;" that He taketh away the unfruitful branch; and "he that abideth in Me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit." He teaches also, verse 8, that God is only glorified and we are only disciples if we bear much fruit.

What are the fruits of the Spirit? First, because greatest, comes love. Real love has no human element; it seeks nothing for itself, but loses itself in its object. "Christ loved the church, and gave Himself for it" (Eph. 5 : 25). Divine love is self-sacrifice. It does not depend on the return it receives. Being in itself a source of warmth, it does not become chilled by the coldness it meets with; it is self-existent. Human love, even the purest, such as between mother and child, cannot continue to exist without something to nourish it; all which is human fails and decays. Now it is self-evident, that in order to love God when we do not understand His dealings with us, to love sinners whose character and practices repulse us, to love enemies who are always seeking to hurt us, and more than all to love brethren in Christ whose want of unity with us and want of comprehending the heart of God bring upon us unspeakable suffering—all this demands a love which is divine, which is indeed the fruit of the Spirit.

And this love, which "seeketh not her own," prepares the way for the fruit of "joy." Just as in the case represented in chap. 6 : 1-4: "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself lest thou be also tempted." Here love has full play, no room for the spirit of judgment; it is the privilege of those who live nearest to God to restore or lift up the fallen in the Name and by the Spirit of Him by whom alone we stand. In the Spirit of our Master, although not sacrificially as He has done, we are to bear one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ.

This is the practical outcome of that member ship one of another, of which Paul writes (Rom 12 : 5; 1 Cor. 12 : 12-27), "and whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it, etc." Or again that practical uniting of Himself with others of which he speaks (1 Cor. 9 : 19-23), "To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak." Christ came where we were, in order that He might lead us where He is; became what we were in weakness and in dependence upon the Spirit's power and guidance, etc. (Luke 2 : 40; 3 : 22, 4 : 1; 14, 18), that He might make us partakers of what He is (2 Pet. 1 : 4). No sacrifice was too costly, no humiliation too great, for His mighty love. And it is our privilege to come down to the level of one who is fallen, without any respect to what it may cost us in reputation, or in personal inconvenience, that we may lift him up in the Name of the Lord. It is not without meaning that it follows, "For if a man think himself to be somewhat when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself;" and "without love," says Paul, "I am nothing." "But let every man prove his own work (i.e., by the restoring of a fallen brother), and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in the other. (See Gr.) The joy proceeds from Christ lived out in our lives by the power of His love conquering us, and conquering others through us.

And thus there is peace. A restless, agitated, disquiet spirit brings forth little fruit. Peace and dissatisfaction cannot go together. Thus it comes that we must learn to be wholly satisfied with God, and with what He permits, in order that the fruit of peace may be brought forth in us. With a calm confidence in the wisdom and love of our heavenly Father, and having no misconstruction of His motives, we cannot but be at peace with ourselves from whom we are expecting nothing, and we cannot but be at peace with others. Long suffering of others flows naturally out of this peace, of which it may be said to be a part; for how can we lose patience with one whom we regard in no other way than in his relation to God?

It would seem as if the whole force of our passage for to-day was contained in Abraham's blessing (Gen. 12 : 2), "I will bless thee, . . . and thou shalt be a blessing." The fruit of the Spirit seems to be that outflow of blessing to others which is the privilege of those who believe in Jesus, and out of whom "shall flow rivers of living water" (John 7 : 38). For all these fruits of the Spirit, including those we have not yet mentioned, "gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance," bear upon our relation to others; and reflecting of Christ to them, as we absorb the blessed rays of light and warmth, to shed them on all we meet. Against these fruits of the Spirit there is no law, no need of control here; all is in the normal condition of things when God can say, as of the work of His creation, that it is very good.

But when a man or woman who has found pardon through the blood of Christ, and who has some measure of love to Him, some measure of desire to live without sin, and get all this for his own soul's sake. where are these fruits of the Spirit? When he goes to Christian conferences, to hear every preacher who may bring fresh light upon the Word of God, attends and enjoys Bible readings, etc., and yet does nothing to win the unconverted to Christ, or to restore the unfaithful children of God, where are these fruits of the Spirit in such an one? Has such an one crucified the flesh with its affections and lusts? Is he not living as though he were head and master of his own life, as though God were made to minister to him, instead of the reverse—that he is created to minister to the glory of God. The flesh places self first even in spiritual things—the Spirit glorifies God.

"If we live in the Spirit, let us walk in the Spirit." Let there be consistency; we are sowing daily, hourly,—let there be sowing to the Spirit in having an object for eternity in all things. All sowing to the flesh, i.e., every thing we do to attain our own ends, produces only corruption. If in any of our work for God there is a lingering desire to gain the approbation of some minister of Christ, or of some revered Christian friend, we are sowing to the flesh; we have ourselves in view, and not the glory of God, we are "desirous of vainglory." And this is really akin to idolatry. To sow to the Spirit, our eye must never wander from God. "When our eye is single our whole body is full of light" (Luke 11 : 34). "I have set God always before me," says the Psalmist; and it is thus, with God ever in sight, that we can sow to the Spirit, and of the Spirit reap life everlasting. It is a simple but blessed test of all our conduct—Am I doing, saying, renouncing, this for God, or for myself.

Our whole subject is full of that which we are to others. While we fulfil the law of Christ, to love one another as He has loved us, by bearing one another's burdens,—we are not to lay our own on others: "every one shall bear his own burden," i.e., by casting it upon the Lord (Ps. 55 : 22). "Then let him that is taught in the word communicate to him that teacheth in all good things, always ready to give, for it is more blessed to give than to receive," and it must not be merely by impulse. "Let us not be weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not. As we therefore have opportunity, let us do good unto all men, specially unto such as be of the household of faith."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Decisive Victory of the British over the Zulus is reported. The cable despatch states states that on July 4th a desperate battle was fought near Ulundi, in which the Zulus were utterly routed. The Zulu prisoners say that 15,000 men were engaged under King Cetewayo himself. The British troops, numbering 5,000, formed in the famous hollow square which in the historic battles of the Continent at the close of the last century and at Waterloo won them such renown. Against the sides of this living square the Zulus came with a rush in dense masses, but were unable to penetrate it. Falling back they were pursued by the English cavalry, and the rout was complete. The victors burned the king's kraal at Ulundi.

This victory is considered in the British camp as being so decisive as to virtually close the war, although it is possible Cetewayo may not submit for some time. Sir Garnet Wolseley has countermanded all reinforcements and supplies, believing that there will be no more serious resistance on the part of the enemy.

English Rule in India.—At a Meeting to discuss the state of India, held July 23d, Mr. John Bright said if it were really necessary as now to expend more than half the Indian revenue on the army, it seemed to him it would be almost better to confess failure, and say that the government of a great empire in Asia by rulers sent from England is impossible, and ought never to have existed. The speech has excited much hostile comment.

The King of the Belgians has Addressed an autograph letter to Bishop Crowther, the African missionary Bishop of the English Church, expressing warm interest in his work on the Niger.

The Commercial Depression in Great Britain, combined with prospects of a harvest far below the average yield, has produced a feeling of anxiety in all minds. Mr. Spurgeon deals with the subject in a bold and faithful manner in the sermon we publish this week. Its warnings are timely, and though just now specially appropriate to Englishmen may be read with advantage on this side the Atlantic. There is an impression only too prevalent that God has left the world to a mechanical control of law, and that what we understand as Providence is an obsolete doctrine. Mr. Spurgeon teaches that national sins bring about national disasters as a chastisement from God.

The New Khedive of Egypt is threatening resignation. The Sultan of Turkey refuses him the power of concluding treaties with foreign Powers, and Tewfik Pacha has signified his inability to conduct the Government unless this privilege is accorded him.

A Royal Present.—Queen Victoria has Sent to the ex-Empress Eugenie a frame made of violets in amethysts for the last photograph of the late Prince Imperial. The garland is surmounted by an eagle, which holds in its talons a three-colored streamer on which is written in golden letters the motto, "Not lost, but gone before."

The English Harvest Prospects Continue of the gloomiest character. The London Times says: "The prevailing opinion both in France and Germany is that the wheat crop will be short, both countries, like ourselves, having suffered from heavy rains. Southern Russia and America seem to be the only corn-growing countries whence an abundant supply can be looked for. With this outlook there can naturally be no improvement in the Manchester wool trade, which is as flat as ever, while in the metal districts things grow worse rather than better.

War between Turkey and Greece is reported imminent in consequence of the failure of negotiations on the question of the boundaries of the two countries. England has proffered her mediation, but the Greeks consider she betrayed them at the Berlin Congress, and are indisposed to avail themselves of her good offices.

The Earl of Kintore.—The Scotch Peer who sits in the British House of Lords as Baron Kintore is well known for his interest in philanthropy and religious work. He has lately been preaching in the East End of London to crowded congregations, in the Presbyterian Church, and in the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End Road. While the earl was holding forth the Word of Life to thousands within the building, his son, the Hon. Keith Falconer, was preaching to the overflowing numbers who could not get admission in an adjoining hall, and has also rendered important help to Mr. Charrington, a gentleman whose efforts in the work of evangelizing the lower classes in London have been attended with signal success.

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage.—The following paragraph from an English religious journal shows the esteem in which Dr. Talmage is held by the eminent London preacher:

Mr. Spurgeon said, "Mr. Talmage's discourses lay hold of my inmost soul. The Lord is with this mighty man of valor. So may he ever be till the campaign closes with victory. I am indeed glad of his voice. It cheers me intensely. He loves the Gospel, and believes in something, which some preachers hardly do. There are those about who use the old labels, but the articles are not the same. May the Lord win armies of souls to Jesus by this man. I am astonished when God blesses me, but somehow I should not be much surprised if He blessed this man."

C. H. SPURGEON'S WORKS.

UNPRECEDENTED PRICES.

The writings of the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, the greatest preacher of the age, are fully as much admired in America as in the United Kingdom, but their circulation has hitherto been limited by the high prices charged for them.

With the view, therefore, of placing these invaluable works within the reach of many who have long wished to possess them, we have obtained a consignment from London, and we now offer them to the public at the prices mentioned below which are twenty-five per cent less than the books can be obtained for elsewhere. Remittances must accompany orders.

In his preface to Lange's New Commentary on the Psalms, Dr. Schaff, the New York editor, thus refers to Mr. Spurgeon's recently published work: "The most important homiletical and practical work of the age on the Psalter is the 'Treasury of David,' by Charles H. Spurgeon. Full of the force and genius of this celebrated preacher, and rich in selections from the entire range of literature, especially from the Puritan divines."

The late Sir WALTER C. TREVELYAN, Bart., formerly President of the United Kingdom Alliance.

SIR W. C. TREVELYAN, BART.

President of the United Kingdom Alliance.

The Trevelyan Family—The late Baronet's Birth, Marriage, and Death—His Philanthropy and Exertions in the Cause of Temperance—The United Kingdom Alliance—Death of Lady Trevelyan, etc.

ALL who have the good of their fellow-man at heart heard of the removal by death of this distinguished philanthropist with regret.

The English temperance movement in general, and the United Kingdom Alliance in particular, lost in the deceased baronet a staunch supporter. Perhaps at no period of the history of the temperance movement have such men as Sir Walter been so much needed as in the present day, seeing that the whole question of how to deal with the desperate work of intemperance is forcing itself upon the country.

His well-known face and form will be missed from the meetings of philanthropists and social reformers. For the furtherance of such objects it seemed his delight to live. Even up to within a few weeks of his decease his untiring energy and love of the temperance cause manifested itself by drawing him to such assemblages by which his life-loved work was being furthered.

The Trevelyans are a very old Cornish family, having been long established in Cornwall, England, when William the Conqueror invaded the country—a period which forms the limit of ancestry of most British noble families. They take their name from Tre-Villion, an estate in Cornwall possessed by the family as far back as the eighth century. Their ancient arms were a lion rampant holding a bâton, but their present bearing is a memorial of a feat performed by one of their ancestors, who is reported to have swum on horseback from some rocks known as the Seven Stones to the Land's End, at the time of a fearful flood, which separated those rocks from Cornwall, and whose irresistible torrents swept over a great expanse of country. The motto of the house, a striking and true one, is

"TYME TRYETH TROTH."

A knighthood was in the family centuries ago, but the baronetcy was bestowed, in 1661, on the son of George Trevelyan, a gentleman who suffered severely for his loyal and firm adherence to his sovereign, during the wars between the Stuarts and the Parliament.

Sir Walter was the sixth baronet of that name. He was born on March 31st, 1797, and was educated at Harrow, and University College, Oxford. He was a deputy-lieutenant and magistrate for Somersetshire and Northumberland, and was high sheriff of the latter county in 1850. In both of these counties he possessed estates, comprising together 28,268 acres, with an annual rent-roll of 23,000*l* ($1,155,000). And though their respective surroundings were so widely different, yet their owner found means to further the interests of those upon each estate with much commendable zeal.

In travelling through North Somerset by Stogumber towards Exmoor, it soon becomes apparent to observant persons that they are passing through Sir Walter's demesne, by the remarkable paucity of public houses, the generally improved character of the cottages, and also of the occupiers of them.

He was married—first, in 1835, to Paulina (who died in 1866), daughter of the late Rev. Dr. Jermyn, of Suffolk; and secondly, in 1867, to Laura Capel Lofft.

He was the President of the United Kingdom Alliance for the Suppression of the Liquor Traffic, which office he has held ever since its formation in 1853, and the last annual meeting of which, held at Manchester in October last, he attended. He was a munificent supporter of the various temperance organizations in the United Kingdom, and a year ago increased his contribution to the United Kingdom Alliance from five thousand dollars to SIX THOUSAND DOLLARS PER ANNUM.

His support of the Permissive Bill was steady and consistent, and he was almost as enthusiastic an advocate of its principles as Sir Wilfrid Lawson himself.

Sir Walter found time, amid his numerous philanthropic engagements, to contribute to the "Transactions" of various societies, and to magazines, papers on geology, botany, and other scientific subjects. Nearly sixty years ago he visited the Faroe Islands, and wrote descriptions of their vegetation, geological formation, and climate. The herbarium which he then formed he subsequently, with his characteristic generosity, presented to the Botanical Museum at Kew. His letters on the opium traffic and the legislative aspect of the temperance question have attained a circulation of many thousand copies. He identified himself with the movement for spelling reform inaugurated by Mr. Isaac Pitman and Mr. Alexander J. Ellis, B.A., and he was president of the Phonetic Society.

Sir Walter Trevelyan was also a liberal patron of the fine arts, and about 20 years ago, when making some improvements at Wallington Hall, he commissioned Mr. W. B. Scott, the then accomplished master of the Newcastle School of Design, to paint a series of pictures illustrative of the different epochs in the history of Northumberland. The pictures form a valuable and instructive record of the social and political progress made in the North of England since the days of the Romans to the present time. The contrast between the picture of the busy Tyneside in 1879 and the time when the mosstrooper was an acknowledged authority in this district, is as striking as the change is satisfactory. On the panels, between the historical pictures, Mr. Scott has drawn with great grace and beauty specimens of the different kinds of agricultural produce and garden plants commonly grown in Northumberland. The walls of the court-yard of Wallington thus, through the wise liberality of Sir Walter and the artistic skill of Mr. Scott, happily illustrate all the leading points in the eventful history of this border-land—so many times the battlefield of rival kings and their proud barons.

Upon his decease there has been given forth through the local press upon or near his estates abundant testimony to the great worth of the departed baronet as a landlord and gentleman, as well as to his humble Christian disposition. Although a Liberal Churchman, he looked upon dissenters with the greatest deference and respect, often meeting with them on the temperance platform—a cause which he had so much at heart. Over forty years ago, before a church was built at Cambo, he and occasionally in the cottage of an invalid tenant. Sir Walter felt the loss of old tenants very keenly, and was much opposed to farmers being annoyed by game or rabbits upon his property.

At the time of the establishment of the United Kingdom Alliance, in 1853, temperance reformers had a fearful struggle in prospect against the prejudices of the public and vested interests of the drink traffic. Although the line of action indicated by the programme of this association is the only practical solution, there was some difficulty in finding a man of position who would accept the then invidious position of Chairman. Into this breach Sir Walter threw himself with his wonted energy, and has stood by it with a steadfastness worthy of such a bold beginning.

The estate of Wallington, with which the name of Trevelyan has been so long identified, was anciently owned by the Grey family, but in the fourteenth century we find it in the possession of the Strothers. In the seventeenth century, Sir John Fenwick, of Fenwick, married into the latter family, and thus became its owner. He was a high-spirited, high-living, turbulent man, an adherent of the Stuarts, and closely implicated in the transactions arising out of their fall. The career of riotous living, which led to his transfer of Wallington by sale, was celebrated in a local song:

> "Harnham was headless, Bradford was breadless,
> Shaftoe picked at the craw;
> Capheaton was a wee bonny place,
> But Wallington banged them a'."

In 1689, Sir John alienated the inheritance of his wife. It thus suffered the common lot of many ancient estates in England. It was sold by a decaying country gentleman, impoverished by his own and his forefathers' excesses, to Sir William Blackett, Bart, the purchase-money being the fruits of a commercial enterprise. A doggerel rhymer, referring to this transaction, says:

> "The wine of Wallington old songsters praise,
> The Phœnix from her ashes Blacketts raise."

In 1696, in the reign of William III., the unhappy Sir John was executed for high treason; and again the poets turned him to account. One of the number quaintly informs us that:

> "The State his head did from his body sever,
> Because, when living, 'twas his chief endeavor
> To set the nation and its head together."

The "head" of the nation, William of Orange, afterwards made an urgent application to the new owner of Wallington, Sir William Blackett, through the Prime Minister of the day (Chancellor Montague), with a view to induce him tc become one of the Lords of the Treasury, but Sir William preferred a private to a public station, and declined the honor. In 1773, Si George Trevelyan, Bart., of Nettlecombe, married Julia, only daughter of Sir Walter Calverley and sister of Walter Calverley, who afterward became Sir Walter Blackett, Bart. Lady Trevelyan and her brother Walter were the childre of a female Blackett; and Wallington, which ha come to the Blacketts through merchandise passed by marriage to the ancient Cornish famil of the Trevelyans—not, as we have before r marked, one of the Norman families that cam in with the Conqueror, but a stock already i the island when William achieved his conquest

Sir Walter made a great improvement in h property at Wallington. The land has all bee thoroughly drained, and the farm-houses rebui in a style at once convenient and comfortabl There is no estate in the North of Englar where a greater change for the better has bee made than in that of the late Sir Walter. Tl benefit of the improvement was felt by the pr prietor in an augmented rent-roll, and by tl tenants in increased crops and greater profits.

Sir Walter died on his estate at Wallingto Northumberland, on Sunday afternoon, Mar 23d last. He had been but a short while ailir but his advanced age, eighty-two, in some mea ure prepared his friends for his departure.

He is succeeded by his nephew, Alfred Wils Trevelyan, born in 1831, son of Arthur Trev yan, of Tyneholm, East Lothian, who di quite recently.

Sir Walter left a large cellar of wine, whi had been selected with some care before he l came an abstainer. Remaining undisturbed e since, its market value has considerably creased. Dr. Richardson, to whom it is left, tends to devote the proceeds of its sale to establishment of a temperance hospital.

Lady Trevelyan outlived her husband but tle more than a week. She was the daugh of the late Mr. Capel Lofft, of Triston H Suffolk, the patron of Robert Bloomfi the author of the "Farmer's Boy." He likewise the friend of Lord Byron, and well known in the literary circles of his ti Lady Trevelyan was seventy-four at the ti of her death, which took place on the decea baronet's estate at Wallington, Northumberla

WHAT IS THE UNITED KINGDOM ALLIANC will doubtless be asked by many of our read whose sympathies have not as yet been enli in its behalf. It is a non-political body friends of temperance, who believe that question as to whether intoxicating liq should be sold in a given district should be cided by a poll of the inhabitants of that dis and not left, as it is now, in the hands of agistrates, who are often connected with the quor interest.

It embraces many earnest men from all sec- ons of the State, and gladly welcomes aid from very quarter, accepting the cardinal principles its constitution, which may be stated, as Sir Wilfrid Lawson once put it :

"I take the principle of the United Kingdom lliance to be, that the people are best judges what is for their own interests. I think they now better what is for their good, and what e their wants, than any set of magistrates that ver existed."

The Alliance has branches in all parts of Great ritain, and we think it will be generally admit- ed, even by those who do not accept its policy, at the activity and earnestness which so promi- ently distinguish its management have done uch to stimulate the efforts of the clergy and thers in equally important, although less dis- nctively legislative, phases of the temperance ovement.

HE MILDMAY PARK CONFERENCE HALL IN LONDON.

How its Position was Settled.

IN the Rev. R. Braithwaite's "Life and Let- ers of the Rev. W. Pennefather, B.A.," we are ld the following story concerning the first steps oward the erection of the hall at Mildmay ark, London, which has become hallowed to he minds of thousands of Christians as the cene of conferences and meetings blessed to heir souls :

"Inquiries had been made in various direc- ions with respect to ground, but for some time without success. The spot on which the hall was actually to stand had not even been thought f when a gentleman called at Mr. Pennefather's ouse very unexpectedly to inform him that a plot f nursery-ground held by a neighbor on a long ease might probably be obtained for his pur- ose.

"The situation was in many respects desirable, nd if God was indeed pointing out the appoint- d site, who could doubt that every obstacle would be removed? But as yet all was very vague.

A substantial building could not be erected nless the freehold of the property could be ecured, and he did not even know to whom it elonged.

"It was at this juncture that, as he was going down the street one morning, some large pla- cards caught his eye announcing the freehold of several adjoining properties for sale, and among hem this very plot of ground. A member of he Mildmay family (who formerly owned a con- siderable part of the neighborhood) had died, and he sale had become necessary. The world would call it a strange coincidence ; the child of God can see his Father's hand and hear his Fa- her's voice in many a so-called 'chance.'

"Mr. Pennefather immediately requested a man of business to look at the piece of land, and give him his opinion as to the probable value of the freehold. He had at this time 500*l.* ($2425) in the bank, given to him by a lady who was much distressed at the crowded state of the church, and placed it in his hands as a deposit towards any building he might be led to erect. As yet it had not been added to, but when the valuer returned and estimated the freehold of the nursery ground at 500*l.* ($2425), the unseen hand seemed to point again in the same direction.

"'Go to the auction, then,' was Mr. Pennefather's answer, 'and bid for me 500*l.*, not a penny more.' 'I might have added a little,' he said, in speaking of it afterwards, 'but I did not choose to do it. I felt if that were the spot to be obtained for the Lord's work it would be bought for the 500*l.*

"'The man went to the auction mart. The bidding went gradually up from 100*l.* ($485), and it was knocked down for the exact sum I had in the bank. I felt it was the Lord's doing, and it was marvellous in our eyes!'"

SAVE THE CHILDREN.

Address by Rev. Dr. Talmage.

At the Princess Mary's Village Homes, Addlestone, England, July 10th, and Specially reported for the "Christian Herald."

Woman Dominant in Charities—The Queen's Beneficence—President and Mrs. Hayes' Religious Gatherings—Christian Women among the Wounded—Martin Luther as a Schoolboy—An Orphan Girl's Belief in her Mother—The Newsboy and His Five Dollars—Bridget and the Session—Mixtures at a Treat, etc.

I THANK you most heartily for your cordial greeting. It makes me feel immediately at home, and I can assure you that in my own country, among the names that are a synonym for Christian charity, and kindness, and usefulness, is the name of our President of to-day, Lord Kintore.

It is a great delight to me to be present at this commemoration. There is nothing that strikes an American Christian more forcibly in coming to England than the great multitude of your charities—institutions for the blind, for the lame, for the insane, for the decrepit, for the lost, for the wandering, for the orphans ; and if upon any people in all the world the benediction of Christ will come, most certainly upon the English people it will come in the last day, when He shall say, "I was hungry and ye fed Me ; I was naked and ye clothed Me ; I was sick and in prison and ye visited Me ;" and when you shall begin in self abnegation to say, "When did we do all this?" then Christ will say, "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, ye did it unto Me."

I have noticed that woman seems to be dominant in Christian work in this country, and that her hand is engaged in all these Christian charities. So it has ever been ; so it will always be. In all ages of the Church woman has been enlisted for God, and all the best interests of humanity. Miriam sounding the timbrel at the Red Sea ; Deborah leading the hosts of Israel into combat ; Hannah giving her Samuel to the Lord ; Dorcas sewing for the poor ; Mary hushing Jesus to sleep, while the angels of God made appropriate accompaniment, singing, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will to men."

But why need we go so far back to find that woman has been enlisted for Christ and for all that is good? In your own country you have had your Hannah Mores, and Charlotte Elizabeths, and Lady Huntingdons, and Florence Nightingales, and those who are in this hall this afternoon, whose names I may not mention lest it cause embarrassment, and who are trying in every possible way, and without any ostentation, to serve Christ.

And in your realm, highest in rank, is a Christian lady, interested in all Christian charities. her name honored therefore all the world over, so that wherever you find either an Englishman or an American, whenever her name is mentioned, every heart beats to "God save the Queen." Woman is gloriously enlisted for Christ in this most Christian work, and it is under the wing of that Beneficence we are assembled here this afternoon.

It has been so all the world over. We have on our side of the Atlantic a Miss Dix, toiling for the benefit of the insane ; we had a Phœbe Palmer, a Christian evangelist, bringing thousands into the kingdom of God ; and the lady highest in rank in our country, Mrs. Hayes, the wife of the President of the United States, may be seen every week amid the hospitals at Washington ; and when Saturday evening comes—indeed on every Saturday evening—with her husband, President Hayes, and with prominent men and women gathered into their parlors, they together sing, "Rock of ages cleft for me." "There is a fountain filled with blood," "Jesus, lover of my soul," and other great Christian classics. So that woman on either side the Atlantic is putting forth her hand for Christ.

In our late dreadful war in America man cast the cannon, man forged the musketry, man made the implements of war ; but woman scraped the lint, woman stroked the pain out of the aching brow, woman wept at the solitary funeral, attended by four men with a spade. The story will never be told on earth of Martha Breckinridge, who went down among the wounded on the battle-field, and who sometimes, after their wounds had been undressed for three or four weeks, dressed them herself, so that when the soldiers saw her coming, they shouted, "Three cheers for the Christian Mission ; God bless the women at home."

Then the record must not be forgotten of Mary Brady coming down from Chicago with blankets and pillows for the sick, and after she had made them as comfortable as possible, sitting down to take the message of the dying soldier as he sent word to his wife. "Don't fret for me ; meet me in heaven ; train the children for God and for heaven ; act like a Christian woman weeping for a Christian husband." In those times men did their work with shot, and shell, and carbine, and howitzer, but women did their work with socks, and slippers, and bandages and Scripture-passages, and stories of that land where they have no pain. Men knelt down by the wounded on the battle-field and said, "On which side did you fight?" Women knelt down by the wounded on the battle-field and said, "Where are you hurt? What nice thing can I make for you to eat? Do not cry. Look to Jesus." And, as the hand of one of them came down upon the forehead of one of those poor fellows, he started and said, "Oh, I thought it was an angel!" It was.

So I find woman everywhere engaged for the benefit of the world's condition, for the assuagement of suffering, and for the advancement of the cause of Christ ; and here we are this afternoon to bless the Christian women, and to bless all their friends who have assisted in the great enterprise of these Village Homes for children. Oh! the children, the darling children! We look at them, as our President said, and they look at us. Who are they? God only knows who they are, or what they are to be in the future in the way of happy and useful women.

I have heard that when a man many years ago went into a school where there were many children, he bowed very lowly and very reverentially before them, and some one present said, "Why do you bow so lowly and humbly before these children?" "Oh," said the visitor, "I do not know who these children may be after a while.' While he spoke there was one little boy whose eye flashed with intelligence. Who was it? Martin Luther, then a stripling, but destined afterwards to shake Christendom.

What these children may yet be for usefulness and generosity and kindness in the kingdom of God I know not ; and as I see them before me this afternoon I say, "God bless them!" They are not orphans, not one of them. Any institution that covers so many children as these under its wings is a mother to all of them—a glorious Christian mother, so that none of them are orphans. None are orphans that have God for a Father. He is your Father, my children. And, friends, they are all worth saving. Oh, yes, all the children are worth saving!

There was a little girl about the size, I should think, of the third girl on the second line there, who was seated at the gate of the battery in New York City one cold day ; and whilst she was sitting there she was shivering with the cold, and a gentleman who was passing said, "My little girl, what do you sit here for?" "Oh," she said, "I am waiting for some one to come and take care of me." "Why," said the gentleman, "are you expecting any one to take care of you?" "Oh," she said, "mother died the other day, and we were very poor ; and when she was dying she said, 'Don't cry ; some one will come and take care of you.' My mother never told a lie, and I am sitting here for some one to come and take care of me."

These children did not have to wait a great while before this Institution came to take care of them. Glorious work! But "Only a child," says some one. Perhaps there are people so grave and great in city and church that they would almost think it belittling for them to have anything to do with an institution that attends only to children. They may say it is only a child—only a little hand, only a little foot, only a little heart—only a child. Why a child has, covered up in its little body, A SPARK OF IMMORTALITY that will blaze on with untold splendor long after all the stars have gone out and the sun has died of old age. Only a child! But it is a grand, a glorious work to take care of the little ones. I suppose that there are a great many men and women in England who are putting forth their hand to this magnificent charity. Oh, this will be something to look back on when you come to die. The honor of having served Christ in such a department! Oh, the greatness of that honor!

There was a lad who came into the office of my brother in New York City, and, as he came in, an entire stranger, he said to my brother, "Lend me five dollars—that is about equal to one pound, I think, in this country—lend me five dollars." My brother said, "Who are you?" He said, "I am nobody; but lend me five dollars." "What do you want five dollars for?" said he. "I want to go into the newspaper business," was the reply; "and I think if I had five dollars I could get along very well." My brother was very much struck with something in the boy's eye and look, and although he was very ragged and wretched, he lent him the five dollars, saying, "When will you return these five dollars?" "Well," said he, "I will return them in six months." My brother never expected to see the five dollars again, but he let him have them.

Time passed. One day there was a boy came into my brother's shop and said, "There's your five dollars." My brother said "What do you mean?" He said, "Don't you remember six months ago to-day a boy came in here and wanted to borrow five dollars to go into the newspaper business?" He replied, "I remember that," "I am the boy. I was in rags then, now I am well dressed. My mother is an invalid, she cannot work. I have got a beautiful room for her. I am taking care of her, and getting along first-rate. There's your five dollars." Oh, was not that boy worth saving?

Don't be guilty of saying, "It is only a child." You might better say, "It is only an heir of heaven; it is only a prince of the Lord Almighty; it is only a queen celestial." Oh, let us encourage such charities as this. God Almighty has encouraged it; everybody that is toiling in it feels the satisfaction, and I want it to be understood that there is not a child on either of those nine benches who is too young to become a Christian. (Applause). How old must you be before you become a Christian? I will tell you how old a person needs to be in order to become a Christian. Just as soon as you are old enough to love your father and mother you are old enough to love Christ.

I am glad our theology is changing, and we have come to understand that all the children may be brought into the kingdom of God. (Hear, hear). Who is the sheepfold for? Old sheep? Well, yes, we want all the old sheep in the fold, but perhaps they could stand a storm or two if you leave them out, but the lambs cannot stand the storm; you want them all in, and I have noticed that where the lambs go the sheep go; and when these Christian women engaged in this charity take one of these little lambs and lead it into the kingdom of God, all who hear about that will be induced to go in the same direction.

If you want to get a father or mother into the kingdom of God take the little child. If the child goes the parent goes. If the lamb goes the sheep follows. It is good that we have come to believe in the salvation of children. There are some people who half believe in it, and some who do not believe in it at all. I believe in it with all my heart and mind and soul. All we want in England and the United States is to get one generation for Christ—just one, and then the world is saved.

I was amazed some time ago when a child of, perhaps, twelve years of age, came to my house and asked if she might join the Church. Twelve years of age. "Well," I said, "what is your name?" She said, "My name is Bridget." "Well," I said, "will you come on Friday night to the Church? and the session will be there then;" for I belong to the Presbyterian Church, the same as his lordship (Earl Kintore) here belongs to, and we have the session in the church. The girl came, and she asked if she might be a member. I said, "You come on Friday evening and talk with the session, and then we will answer your question." She came.

We wanted to find out whether she was a Christian. That is the great question about every one. I felt we would take her into the Church if she was a Christian, and that we could not take her in if she was not a Christian. So I went to work with a few plain simple questions that the smallest girl here might answer if she is a Christian, and when I got through an officer in the Church said, "Bridget, how many covenants are there?" Why, she could not tell. I suppose he wanted her to say, "There is a covenant of works and a covenant of grace." What did that little girl know about that? I said, "Brother, suppose I asked of some of these grown people here how many covenants are there?"

And turning round I said, "How many covenants are there, Mr. So-and-so?" He could not tell. I said, "Do not impose this task on a little child twelve years of age when some older people cannot answer it." I said, "Bridget, I wish you would just go into the next room while we consider this case." She did so, and when she came back I said, "Bridget, I want to ask you one or two more questions. You tell me that where you live they persecute you a good deal for your religion. How do you feel towards them when they call you hard names and strike you in the face? How do you feel? Do you feel angry with them?"

She said, "Oh, no; I feel sorry for them; I feel sorry that they do not love the same Christ that I love." "Well," I said, "brethren, she is as good a Christian as anybody in this Church. I think you had better take her in." We took her in, and I felt then as I feel now, that all people may become Christians just as easy at twelve years of age as at forty, and easier.

I have seen Christians five years old. I believe the time will come in the Christian Church when mothers will have so much faith in the salvation of little children that they will just put them at the very start in the bosom of Christ, and say, "Here, Lord Jesus is this child, an immortal, an immortal. I don't want it to grow up and go off on the dark mountains of sin. I don't want it to have the ordinary perils of childhood without Thy grace. Here is my babe, a year old; take it, Lord Jesus. Thou didst say, 'Suffer the little children to come unto Me.' I accept that, for here it is; take it for time, take it for eternity;" and I think the Lord Jesus will put His arm round it, and kiss it, and it will be His forever. How people misquote that passage, "Suffer little children to come unto Me."

Christ did not say it to the children; He said it to the Pharisees when they wanted to keep them back. When the mothers brought the children to Jesus, the children all struggled to go to Him right away. There was something in His face that was an invitation, and they made such a clamor to go to Christ—perhaps twenty or thirty all at once—that the Pharisees wanted to keep them back, saying, "Don't bother Christ with these children." Then Christ said, "Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Oh, that Christ this afternoon would enclose all these children in the arms of His mercy.

I suppose the time has nearly come for the close of my address. I do not want to be tedious, and I must stop. I remember very well what it is to have a luncheon in prospect when you are having a speech at the same time; and I remember a great time we had in Philadelphia when I was living there. One Christmas we thought we would go up and give the children a grand time, and we got a wagon-load of cakes, and pies, and candy; it was the greatest load I ever saw. We drove out to the place where we had what we call the mission-school, and there were just about as many children in the school as there are yonder. When we came to the school-house the boys and girls came out and shouted, "Three cheers for Christmas!"

So we all went in and distributed the cakes, and the pies, and some trinkets, and some oranges. The children were having a glad time and we thought perhaps we had better have a address, and make a moral improvement of th occasion; so we asked one good man if he woul not make a few remarks. A very good man h was, and he got up to meet the occasion in moral way. The children had had the cakes an the pies, but they had not had the peculiar kin of candy which is very popular in our country called mixture, that is all kinds of candies mixe up together. This candy we were going to leav as a sort of benediction for the children, and th children were all thinking about the mixture.

The good man attempted to address ther He said, "You did not come merely for these pi and cakes." "No, no! No, no!" they a shouted. "You came for better and grand and nobler things, did you not, my dear chi dren?" "Yes, yes! Yes, yes!" they all shou ed. "Now," said he, "my dear children, wh did you come for?" and they all shouted "Mi tures!" And I think we had better now ha our "mixtures."

As the two friends left the service in Roman Catholic Church, Alick Gogharty sa "Well, Percival, what do you think of Rom pictorial art and doctrine now? Shouldn't one, even with eyes half open, be tempted to sert for them old Huguenot simplicity and Sc tural belief? What a capital rejoinder, t Father Cahill's sermon to-day is to Greg proof the other Sunday that there is 'an o door before us, that no man can shut.'"

"Peace, Alick, do not be satirical!" said I cival, "and don't by your satire wound my h worse than it is. Oh, what a deluded fo have been! F this hour I shake off the anti-Christian not that had woven themselves so subtly around I renounce sacerdotalism forever, and shall my whole heart to that Bible truth which, as Divine Saviour says, shall "make me free."

And he did so. From that day he decide Christ and His Gospel, for that truth to m tain which the Protestant martyrs bled, from the mental struggles he had passed thr lived ever after, we are disposed to thin deeper religious life than if they had never known by him.

"The Black Forty-seven," the dreadful fa r in Ireland, was passed through in the ond year of Percival's university life. We ll not, in our present narrative, enter into any ails of its horrors. It will not be needful, ce Percival was able, from his unique and uliarly favorable position, to see to it that e suffered from starvation on the Percival ate. It was upon tenants under landlords h property mortgaged to the last degree— , alas ! they were many over the country at time—that the consequences of the potato rth most heavily fell. These landowners ld neither supply food to their starving de- dents nor forego rent, for to them the failure ne year's rental meant mortgage foreclosure hopeless ruin.

ut in regard to the old knight's property, not y was there no debt, but for several years re had been large accumulations in the bank he allowance made by the Court to Percival his mother, though liberal, being far below annual returns of the estate. Upon tidings he "blight," therefore, and the foreseen im- ative need for bread, Percival wrote to the stees of his property generously urging them pare no effort or outlay for the wants of his ple. "No matter," he said, "how it may uce capital : don't think of me, but of those listress. I shall feel deep regret if a single be lost through want of liberal foresight."

n any case the Court of Chancery, we sup- e, would have used the money of the estate uch a crisis of need ; but, encouraged and horized by this letter, a more than usual pro- on was no doubt made. The result was, that ile thousands daily were dying of hunger over land, Percival's tenants were fed. Beside s, he gave considerable sums for the general p kitchens and other methods of relief in his pted town, Portarlington, and more than e gladdened his mother's heart by going down give his own personal service at the depots of ef. She saw her deceased husband's self-sac- cing zeal live again, as it were, in her son.

nglish bounty flowed into Ireland during s "time of tribulation" with a copious and tinuous stream. Associations were formed r the whole kingdom for the raising of money. tish workmen and even school children denied mselves accustomed luxuries to send to per- ing men, women, and their little ones, what ld be thus saved. Not content with remit- ces of money, embassies of succor were sent the famine-stricken land, charged to visit sonally the districts most severely afflicted, l to distribute with their own hands the bene- tions they brought. In consequence Celtic ssings without number fell from grateful lips on the head of the once hated and execrated ssenach (Saxon). It was supposed by many t the antipathy between the two races sprung m an inborn difference of temperament, and sed by centuries of mutual violence and ong, was at last overcome ; that the great "middle wall of partition," which the nostrums ther of statesmen nor churchmen had availed remove, was at length broken down, beaten o utter and happy ruin, by having had dis- rged against it, from Cape Clear to the nt's Causeway, not a storm of shot and shell, t as it were of loaves of bread.

There can be no question that the frank, open- arted, and open-handed generosity of Ireland's er sister in her time of sore anguish and need ped, as no other event in the history of the o countries had ever served to do, to remove ter prejudice against England from multitudes the Irish people, and to exalt in their estimate otestant Christianity. English Christians, ough they denounced "popery," ate meat in nt, and would read the Bible, were, after all, was admitted, amazingly humane, and if rich re wonderfully ready to extend their bounty their Irish Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, d that with no niggard hand. Ireland, in op- sition to her previous ideas, was given to see at she was regarded in truth a part of the dy politic, and as such that the whole empire ffered with her.

Yet, on the other hand, there were many whom the events of the famine-year served not to reconcile, but to embitter against, English rule. They argued—it may be wrongly, yet to themselves convincingly—that had it not been for Saxon rulers, who in the past, to make England rich, had on principle, for a century and more, kept Ireland poor, the famine of forty-seven would have never occurred, and that when it did occur, stupid redtapism, at a time which called for new and special expedients, and a slavish adherence to mere routine upon the part of the English executive, and that in spite of all Irish warning and remonstrance, had led to the sacrifice of at least a million of precious human lives.

A controversy to this effect, right or wrong, was carried on, it is well known, for months by a portion of the Irish press, and with scathing invective and passionate reproach. The Young Ireland confederacy entertained, upon the whole, very much this view of the matter, and we fear that Percival Montaigne, influenced by the patriotic fervor and glowing eloquence of his club companions, as well as by his hatred from personal knowledge of landlord misrule in his own neighborhood at home, was very much in accord with these political remonstrants and talented enthusiasts. Certain at all events it is, he did not permit his devotion to Miss Lemaire, by whose friends he was looked upon at this period as an accepted lover, to interfere altogether with his attendance at the conferences and debates of his "Young Ireland Club."

It may be thought, however, that to one who in the Ribbon lodge long ago had tasted so bitterly the evils of secret political associations, and who also was affianced to the daughter of a Dublin Castle official, there is in this representation a great if not an impossible inconsistency for was not appeal to physical force an accepted doctrine of the Young Ireland faction? That it was, we believe, is a common idea, but it is incorrect. There were in fact, as is the case, we think, in all political crises, two parties in the Young Ireland brotherhood, which were much opposed to each other—an extreme left and an extreme right. The notorious John Mitchell was the leader of the one, and Smith O'Brien, who afterwards actually headed an insurrection, was, strange to say, leader of the other. The former was all eager and urgent for a resort to arms as the only probable method of national freedom ; while the latter would hear of nothing but moral expedients, at least until these should all fail, or a probability of success would make, as he said, a resort to physical force, not a political crime, but a virtuous war of liberation.

It was to the latter section of the Young Irelander's which was by far the larger, that Percival attached himself, and with a warm sympathy, for whatever else they might be, he felt sure these men were sincere and honest in their patriotism, and not mere disturbers of England's quiet like many whom he had known, with the sinister view of getting in due time a comfortable "sop" for themselves from the English Government on condition of holding their peace.

Many talented ladies at that time in Ireland drank in the spirit of the Young Ireland confederacy—the Girondists of the national party—and even lent their pens to prose and poetry to advocate its cause, Lady Wilde among the rest ; and therefore it is not to be wondered at that Miss Lemaire, as taught by Percival, soon became inspired with his sentiments, and sung no songs in her father's house with such fervor and "gusto" as those composed and published by the Young Irelanders.

But, then, was not the Christianity of Percival and his fiancée opposed to such a surrender of their thoughts and feelings to this Irish nationalism, and is not a case supposed untrue and unnatural? What has spiritual religion such as they are represented as possessing to do with "love of country?" Some, perhaps, would say it has none, but we believe and assert that, on the contrary, it has a great deal. Never was there a more patriotic heart than His, who, in the midst of His triumphal entry, paused, and wept over the existing and impending woes of Jerusalem ; and never did one labor so self-sacrificingly as He to uplift His nation, as a Jew, from the depths of its social misery and moral degradation. Percival and Miss Lemaire's "love of their country" may have been mistaken as to its ends. It may have dreamed of fancied wrongs and of delusive, and even at times of censurable, expedients ; but an ardent affection for their native land was in itself considered perfectly compatible with a simultaneous love for Jesus Christ, the Saviour, and was not less in harmony with their devoted attachment to each other, for it is one of our deepest beliefs that tenderest love to the dearest on earth, ardent love to "native land," and sacred and self-surrendering love to God, can glow, and at once, in the same human bosom—for who can measure the love possible to a creature first made in the image of God, whose very being is love?

Indeed, one part of the policy of the Young Ireland Confederacy was calculated to win the sympathy of any Christian heart, namely, to set on foot an effort to mitigate the rancor between Roman Catholics and Protestants in the sister country. One of the songs sung by Lucy Lemaire in the hearing of Percival and her own immediate home circle, a song composed by Davis, the poet of his party, illustrates this noble attempt, and the words are so beautiful, and, when duly interpreted, so true, that we are tempted to give some of them :

"What matter that at different shrines
We pray unto one God?
What matter that at different times
Our fathers won this sod?
In fortune and in name we're bound
By stronger links than steel,
And neither can be safe or sound
But in the other's weal.

"And, oh, it was a gallant deed
To show before mankind,
How every race and every creed
Might be by love combined ;
Might be combined, yet, not forget
The fountains whence they rose,
As, filled by many a rivulet,
The stately Shannon flows."

It would take long to tell of the many and fervent gushes of patriotic feeling which rose in Percival's heart as words like these, rendered vocal by a loved voice, entered his ear. He could gladly in such moments have given life itself to redress the wrongs and achieve the regeneration of his country.

THE SPEEDY RETURN OF CHRIST.

Sermon preached by Mr. G. Muller, of Bristol, founder of the Bristol Orphanages,
At Mildmay Park, London, on Sunday Evening,
June 29th, 1879.

"He which testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly : Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus."—REV. 22 : 20.

Passages proving the Personal Second Coming of Christ—I. Four Differences between Death and Christ's Second Advent—II. Events to take place at Christ's Return—1. The First Resurrection—2. The Binding of Satan—Shall we have a Glorified or Tormented Body?—Earnest Appeal—3. The Separation between the Good and the Wicked—The Parable of the Wheat and Tares—The World to grow Worse and Worse, and not to be Converted before the Return of Christ to Reign for 1,000 Years—The Prophecy of Increasing Wickedness in these Last Days in Timothy—We must seek to Stem the Torrent of Iniquity—III. We should be Waiting for Christ's Return—Solemn Appeal.

ALL the beloved Christian friends here present who are in any measure acquainted with the New Testament know very well how frequently our adorable Lord Jesus Christ refers to His return, and how frequently the apostles and the evangelists speak about the return of the Lord Jesus Christ ; and, as we see, the very record of God, the last part of the Holy Scriptures, closes with this very subject—the return of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The question naturally arises, perhaps, in the mind of one or other listener, "What is meant by the return of the Lord Jesus Christ?" The answer is unquestionably, most assuredly, the personal return of the self-same Lord who ascended into heaven. That this is meant by the return of the Lord Jesus Christ we see from numberless passages in the New Testament. But I will only refer very briefly to three or four. In the first chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, and the eleventh verse, we find the angels testifying to the disciples who had seen the Lord ascending into heaven, "Which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven."

The plain, obvious meaning of this passage is that it is not the return of the Lord Jesus Christ in spirit, but the personal return of the Lord Jesus Christ that is here meant.

Again, in John 14, we read in the beginning, in the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, "Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in Me. In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you." Now comes the passage, "And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto Myself; that where I am, there ye may be also."

The Lord Jesus Christ did go for the very purpose to prepare a place for His disciples; and thus assuredly, as He went, His statement is: "I will come again to receive you unto Myself, that where I am there ye may be also." Therefore, the plain inference is the personal return of the self-same Lord who went into heaven. In Thess. 4: 16, 17 we read: "For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

Here, again, the personal return of the Lord Jesus Christ is evidently brought before us.

Still further. In the ninth chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews we read in the last two verses these words: "And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment: so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many: and unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation."

The first time He came He was manifest in the flesh when He was born at Bethlehem. Now, the second time He shall come again also, and, therefore, a personal return of the Lord Jesus Christ plainly is referred to here. One or other may say: "But what great difference is there between my going to Him, and His coming personally again? Is it not just the same if I die, or that the Lord Jesus Christ comes again?" There is a vast difference between the two. Let us notice a few points though there are many other points which might be noticed to show the difference.

FOUR DIFFERENCES BETWEEN DEATH AND CHRIST'S SECOND ADVENT.

First of all, when we die we put off our earthly tabernacle, and the spirit goes to the Lord Jesus Christ. But this has only to do with us as individuals; for our beloved brethren and sisters in Christ, the church militant, we leave behind. Therefore, death affects us only individually.

But the return of the Lord Jesus Christ has to do with the whole body of Christians—not only has to do with all the saints living at the time on earth—not only has to do with the saints under the present dispensation having fallen asleep previous to the return of the Lord Jesus Christ, but has also to do with all the old covenant believers with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and those who, like them, trusted in the Messiah for the salvation of their souls, and, therefore, has to do, in other words, with the whole church of Christ. This is one difference. Secondly, when we die we individually are delivered out of the power of Satan. But Satan has still power over the individual saints left here on earth to a greater or less degree. They are yet exposed to his wild temptations, to his malicious hatred against them, whilst we individually are brought out of all this and safely landed in the presence of the Lord. But our brethren and sisters in Christ we leave behind, exposed to the same difficulties out of which just at that moment we escape, and, therefore, we see what a vast difference there is between our individual death and the return of the Lord Jesus Christ.

But more than this, thirdly, we individually do not receive our glorified bodies when we die. We put off our tabernacle, but we have no glorified bodies. This only takes place at the return of the Lord Jesus Christ. Only then we obtain the glorified body; and the whole church of Christ will at that time attain to a glorified body—at the return of the Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, in this particular there is a vast difference. Fourthly, when we fall asleep we are not at once seated with the Lord Jesus Christ on this throne because He has not yet taken manifestly His throne to Himself to reign. He is yet there seated as the great High Priest at the right hand of God on the Father's throne. He is not yet seated on His own throne. And so we the believers shall sit together with the Lord Jesus Christ, and this will only take place at the return of the Lord Jesus Christ; and therefore in this particular also there is a vast difference between our going to the Lord Jesus Christ at the time when we die and His return.

I trust this is enough to show that there is a vast difference between our dying and going to Christ and His coming again for the sake of taking the whole heavenly family to Himself, and for the sake of bringing about the resurrection—the first resurrection of believers. Rev. 20.

II. EVENTS TO TAKE PLACE AT CHRIST'S RETURN.

We will now consider, in the second place, some of the events which will take place at the return of the Lord Jesus Christ. Time will not allow us to enter upon them all, and, as I propose only to bring elementary truths before the saints this evening, it is on that account also desirable not to enter too minutely into the subject, but merely refer to some of the leading events which will take place at the return of the Lord Jesus Christ.

1. One of the especial points to be noticed is the first resurrection. In the first epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, chap. 15, we read this in the twenty-second and following verses: "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order: Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming." Notice this particularly, not as one or the other may suppose, a general resurrection, when the Lord Jesus Christ comes, of all who ever died previously; not so: but at the coming of Christ, those that are Christ's, those that fall asleep as believers in the Lord Jesus Christ previously—"they that are Christ's at His coming."

This, as we shall see afterwards, is called the first resurrection. It is particularly to be noticed not all will be raised up at that time. "Then cometh the end, when He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when He shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power. For He must reign, till He hath put all enemies under His feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."

Here reference is made to another resurrection; but this is still further set forth in the first epistle to the Thessalonians 4: 16, 17, a passage to which I have already referred, but in connection with this point we must allude to it again: "For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first." Notice this again: "The dead in Christ shall rise first." Then we which are alive and remain—this "then" meaning rather "afterwards," not the ordinary acceptation of the word then, but afterwards. Very small is the space between the two, yet there is a little space between the two, although it may be but minutes, when we "which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord." Here you see again the point clearly, distinctly, in the plainest terms, brought before us. This is one of the events which will take place at the time of the return of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Now one more passage. In the twentieth chapter of the book of Revelation we read in the fourth and fifth verses. "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for a witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection." Here you see again in plain terms stated that there will be certain individuals raised up, as we have seen in the Thessalonians and in the epistle to the Corinthians; but these individuals shall be they that are Christ's at His coming, the believers who fell asleep in Christ previously, or who were martyred for the sake of Christ—they will be raised again.

This is the first resurrection. Blessed is he that has part in the first resurrection; and all who will fall asleep as believers in Christ before that event takes place, before the return of the Lord Jesus Christ, even the weakest and feeblest believers, they will be raised again at the first resurrection, because they belong to Christ, because they are united to Him by faith in the risen Lord, because they are members of the body of Christ, of that body of which He is the head. Therefore they will be raised again to g with Christ. This is one event which will tak place—the first resurrection.

2. Another great solemn event is the bindin of Satan at the return of the Lord Jesus Christ In the beginning of this twentieth chapter w read: "And I saw an angel come down fro heaven, having the key of the bottomless pi and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hol on the dragon, that old serpent, which is th Devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousan years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, an shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that h should deceive the nations no more, till th thousand years should be fulfilled: and aft that he must be loosed a little season."—Sata at the return of Jesus Christ losing all his powe just previously having to the very utmost exe cised his power in the Antichrist, and in gathe ing together all the host of Antichrist—losing h power, now deprived for a thousand years enti ly of his power, now cast into the bottomless p into the abyss—shut up there, so that for a tho sand years he shall not have the smallest parti of power over the nations, over the saints, ov any one, but entirely deprived of power. will be completely deprived of all power duri a thousand years while the Lord Jesus Chr reigns. This is another great event.

In connection with the resurrection, I wo just mention that in this very chapter at end we have another resurrection referred and I will just read to you this verse; for have not to lose sight of the fact that wh there is the first resurrection, there will also another resurrection. We read, for instance the eleventh verse: "And I saw a great wh throne, and Him that sat on it, from whose the earth and the heaven fled away; and th was found no place for them. And I saw dead, small and great, stand before God; the books were opened: and another book opened, which is the book of life; and the were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works.

SHALL I HAVE A GLORIFIED OR TORMENTED BODY?

There is a day coming when all the wicked will be brought out of their graves, when in that very body in which they were dishonoring the Lord, and which they were using for the service of Satan, they will be punished, in order that they may be capable of the more abundant punishment and the more abundant recompense for all their evil wicked deeds. That this consideration is of the most solemn character every one of us here present will admit.

And the grand point is whether we all shall receive a glorified body in order to be able to enjoy eternity more abundantly in union with the precious adorable Lord Jesus Christ; or whether we shall obtain a body in order that we may the more abundantly feel the torment and the agony which the holiness and the righteous judgment of God must bestow upon us on account of having slighted the choicest of all the gifts He had to give—the gift of His only begotten Son—because we have not obeyed the Gospel; because we have shut our hearts and ears against the Gospel; because we would not receive that wondrous blessing manifested on the part of God, the gift of His only begotten Son, His only child Jesus, whom in our room and in our stead He wounded and bruised, and whom He punished for us, in order that we, through faith in His name, through the power of His precious blood, should be eternally saved.

Oh, let each of us lay these things to heart, and if there be a soul here present that has not yet obeyed the Gospel, that has not yet believed in Christ, oh, we beseech and entreat you, not to leave this hall without judging yourselves, condemning yourselves, and accepting the Gospel and putting your whole trust in the Lord Jesus Christ for the salvation of your souls, in order that you, too, together with us may obtain at last a glorified body, and be partakers of this first resurrection which is the blessed portion of those who believe in the Lord Jesus Christ.

3. I will only refer to one other event which will take place at the return of the Lord Jesus Christ, that is, the separation between the good and the wicked. In the thirteenth chapter of the Gospel according to St. Matthew, our adorable Lord Jesus Christ particularly speaks on this subject. We read His own words in this chapter at the twenty fourth verse. In the thirty-seventh and following verses of the same chapter, the disciples having asked Him for the explanation, He graciously gives it.

The point on account of which this parable is of such vast importance is that many real, true Christians have an erroneous idea that the world will get better and better, so that at last the whole world will be converted, and that this will introduce the state of the millennium. Now, this is in entire opposition to the whole of the statements of the New Testament. In the first place, the work of this dispensation is to gather a people out from among the Gentiles, not to convert all nations. I do not wish to be misunderstood in making this statement, as if it were not our duty to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature! Most assuredly it is; and it is the sin of the Church that so little, so extremely little comparatively, has been done, particularly within the first 1700 or 1800 years, to accomplish this will of our adorable Lord Jesus Christ.

But while it is the duty of the Church to go into all the world and do the very utmost in their power collectively and individually, nevertheless whilst we do this we have to keep before us what is the Lord's revealed will—not the conversion of the whole world, but to gather an elect people for His Church out from among the Gentiles.

Further, individually, we should do what we can now, in the latter part of the nineteenth century, to seek to bring about a revival in the Church, a revival among the people of God—bringing them into a more spiritual state, so that the Church be like a bride making herself ready for the return of the bridegroom, putting on the wedding garments, so to speak—practically, experimentally, ready for the return of the bridegroom.

Well, this is to be aimed at; and whilst we individually cannot work too earnestly till the return of the Lord Jesus Christ, and whilst individually we should seek to do what we can in winning souls for the Lord Jesus, and in strengthening the hands of our fellow disciples, we have to hold it fast, as plainly, distinctly, unquestionably revealed in the New Testament, that, instead of things getting better and better towards the close of the dispensation,

THINGS WILL GET WORSE AND WORSE.

Lawlessness increases more and more, and we see the beginning of those fearful days now.

What is socialism? What is the lawlessness of the day? It is the indication that we are getting nearer and nearer to the close of the present dispensation. That things instead of getting better and better will get worse and worse, till at last they will come to a state when the wicked conspire against the Lord and His Christ and His saints. That will be the close of the whole.

Let us take particular heed that we do not belong to any of these classes. Disobedience to parents, that is one of the sins of the last days; without natural affection, parents not having natural affection for their children, yet having a form of godliness; children not having a natural affection for their parents. Remember particularly this last word: "Despisers of those that are good." Just think of all this. That is just the precursor of the return of the Lord Jesus Christ, and that blessed One will come again for the very purpose of introducing a better state of things, a holy state of things, a heavenly state of things. He will come again to have the tares burned up, having first gathered them in bundles, and separated them from the wheat.

And now mark this particularly which follows: "Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." This is to be coupled with all the characteristics which are given previously regarding these individuals in 2 Timothy 3.

These words, "having a form of godliness," are to be added in connection with every one of these characteristics. Though men are covetous, though they are proud, though they are without natural affection, yet they have the form of godliness, but deny the power thereof. Now, consider this. My beloved Christian friends, this is the state to which things will come in the last days previously to the return of the Lord Jesus Christ. Oh, how it becomes us to rouse ourselves and to bestir ourselves that we do not belong to this class of men; that we do our part if it were possible yet for a while to stem the torrent of impending iniquity, as Hezekiah and Jehoshaphat did, and every man of God did—to do what lies in us to bring about a better state of things. "Oh," you may say, "this is prophecy, and this must come to pass. What can I do as an individual?"

It is impossible to say what even a poor single individual, feeble in health, can accomplish. But we should all consider, that by the help of God we may individually do a good deal, and we should not sit and fold our hands and say: "I can do nothing, because such a state of things is prophesied, and such a state of things will come to pass." It will come to pass; but how great the honor if we individually seek to stem the torrent; if we individually seek to live the opposite way; if we individually lend a helping hand to our fellow-believers, to strengthen their hands in God, to encourage them to withstand the impending torrent of iniquity! And if we seek individually as much as in us lies to pluck, like brands out of the burning, poor sinners, and lead them to Christ before the return of the Lord Jesus Christ!

Just further on in that chapter Paul speaks to Timothy to do his very utmost as far as was in him, in season and out of season, to preach, to do his utmost to make full proof of his ministry. That is what we have to do individually. And, oh, one word in connection with this! It is an honorable position for one in these days to be permitted to live for Christ, to labor for Christ; and happy are the men and women who will surrender the whole heart to the Lord, who will seek to be out and out a Christian in the highest degree, and in every way will greatly glorify God though things are getting worse and worse.

III. The third point I desire now very briefly to direct your attention to is this, that it is the will of the Lord that we should wait for His return. We have a plain commandment of our Lord that we should watch. We have the exhortation repeated by the apostles, and we have, lastly, the example of the first saints who did watch, who did look for the return of the Lord; for as we all know it was a common thing to wait for the return of the Lord Jesus Christ. It would be an entire exception if any one were not waiting for His return. That was the general state of the saints in the time of the apostles, and the apostles exhorted themselves continually, even as the Lord Jesus exhorts us.

Now, my beloved Christian friends, how is it with us? Let us honestly ask ourselves, "Are we looking for the return of the Lord Jesus Christ? Are we waiting for the return of the Lord Jesus Christ?" Next month it will be fifty-three years with me that I have been waiting for the Lord Jesus Christ, and, by God's grace, I am not less looking for His return now. I stay, waiting for His return now as I did at the first. Now, I ask my beloved Christian friends here, are you looking for His return? Do you with joyful anticipation go forward to the return of the Lord Jesus Christ? Is it a pleasant thought to you that Jesus Christ is coming to you? that He is coming again, that He will return, that He will not always be absent?

If the bridegroom leaves the bride, she looks for his return. The sooner the better, the bride says. So if the Church is in a right state, if there is attachment to the person of the Lord Jesus Christ, she longs for His return; she looks for His return. How is it with us regarding this?

What a solemn moment it would be supposing the Lord Jesus Christ were to be revealed from heaven at this hour. Who among us would be taken? who among us left? Oh, let every heart as before God ask: "Should I be taken or should I be left?" We should then be divided into two classes, those who would be taken and those who would be left. The believers would be taken and the unbelievers left, and this is at once the difference between the believers and the unbelievers.

Now, ask yourselves, should I be taken or should I be left? These are greatly solemn, deeply important, statements of Holy Writ.

IV. One word in the fourth place, with regard to the practical effects of this truth. Whenever we find that the heart is not benefited by what the Holy Ghost tells us in the way of prophecy, we should put aside our Bible, fall on our knees, and cry mightily to God that He would help us by His Holy Spirit that our hearts might be brought under the power of the truth.

Oh, my beloved fellow disciples, let this be our earnest cry and prayer this evening: "Lord Jesus thou wilt come again! Lord Jesus we hasten on to the day of Thy return! Things may get worse and worse, help me increasingly to live to the honor and glory of Thy name; help me to do as much as lies in me to strengthen the hands of my fellow disciples, and help me to be watchful that I do not prove a stumbling block to the world and a stumbling-block to any of Thy disciples, and help me increasingly to look forward to the day of Thy coming." Thus day by day we should try that in our little feeble measure we may more abundantly than ever bring glory to God, and that in our little feeble measure we may so strengthen the hands of our fellow disciples as that here and there little bands shall rise to stand forth to the praise and honor and glory of His name.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Yellow Fever at Memphis, Though Not formerly declared epidemic, has clearly established itself firmly in that city, and is doing its work with terrible fatality. The total deaths at Memphis were 44 last week, of which 26 were from the scourge. When it is remembered that large numbers of persons have abandoned the city, and others, too poor to pay the expenses of removal, have been conveyed to military camps, it will be seen that the fever has lost none of its malignity.

The theory is exploded that those who have had the disease and recovered from it are afterward safe from attack. Mr. B. Adams, who died last Friday, suffered from a bad attack of the fever last year.

There are no means of escape from Memphis now. Those who are in the city have no avenue of egress. They are shut off from the outer world. The last regular passenger train left on Friday last by the Louisville and Nashville Railroad. No mails are received from the West and East, and none are expected until Tuesday next, when will be inaugurated the plan of tri-weekly mail service.

A large number of colored people still refuse to go into camps, and the proportion of colored to white population in the city is about three to one. A memorial has been issued by a meeting of colored men, in which they appeal for money, and state the reasons which induce them to remain in their homes. One of the reasons alleged is that the damp and exposure of camp life is more fatal to negroes than the yellow fever. The committee of public safety have adopted a declaration declaring the policy of the colored men dangerous to themselves and to the community at large, and warning property holders against supporting it by contributions.

The Origin of the Epidemic is Attributed in the Memphis Avalanche to the criminal folly of those who either neglected or refused to destroy the bed-clothing, and especially the woollen blankets, upon which patients had died during the previous year.

It is now known that in many instances woollen clothing that had been hanging in sick-rooms was packed in trunks, and that during the winter the poorer classes slept upon bedding and between blankets that had been exposed to infection. One woman, for example, preserved in a wooden box all the clothing worn by her husband, who had died of the fever, and was unwilling to burn even the bed-clothes on which he had died, stained as they were with black vomit. The frosts could have no effect upon fever germs in fabrics that were kept warm by kitchen fires during the day, and, in some instances, by the heat of the sleeper's body at night ; and when the midsummer days came, the poisons of pestilence were generated anew. This is the theory which is generally accepted in Memphis.

The Platforms of the Rival Parties, so far as they have been declared in the States, show that the issues on which elections will be fought will be those of Finance and State Rights as opposed to National Rights. The Democratic majority at Washington has had the effect of producing unity in the Republican ranks. It has become clear to almost every member of the latter party that the only hope of retaining possession of the honors and emoluments of office for another four years depends upon the party sinking minor differences and showing a solid front. Secretary Sherman has dealt with financial questions in his speeches in New England, and there he received an enthusiastic approval. But other States show a disposition to encourage a policy of inflation, to which the Secretary is opposed.

An appointment the most coveted of all the prizes the President has in his gift has fallen vacant by the resignation of Minister Welch, Ambassador at the British Court, whose retirement has been caused by domestic affliction. Various names have been mentioned as likely to obtain the President's nomination ; among others George W. Childs, of Philadelphia, and to the surprise and incredulity of many, that of General Grant.

The Tivoli Theatre and the Pacific Garden, New York, two resorts we have alluded to in previous numbers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD as openly defying the law by holding Sunday concerts deceitfully called "sacred," were raided on Sunday, July 27th. The Society for the Prevention of Crime at length took cognizance of these places, and having obtained sufficient evidence, entered them, arresting the persons in charge and closing the performance. Gambling and liquor selling were going on, a disgusting performance occupied the stage, and a large number of intoxicated persons of both sexes were among the audience. This on a Sunday evening in a Christian city, and within half a mile of the hall where Mr. Moody was preaching.

Two Lost Children Found in a Pit Fifty Feet deep.—The wife of a miner named Henry, working at Pottsville, Penn., missed her two children last week, and their prolonged absence arousing fears in her mind, she induced her neighbors to assist in seeking them. They searched until after midnight without avail, but between one and two o'clock one of the party heard a faint cry for help issue from a thicket on a hill, and on running in that direction, came upon an old sink-hole, at the bottom of which he heard the children, who, in answer to his inquiries, said they were unhurt, but could not get out. His shouts soon brought reinforcements to the spot, and among them came Mrs. Henry, the distracted mother, who had spent the entire night in the hills looking for her little ones. As the pit in which the children were, is about fifty feet deep and has perpendicular sides, the children could not be got out without a rope. This was fastened around Mr. Henry's waist, and with a lantern in his hand he was lowered into the black depths of the pit. The boy was first hoisted up, and then Mr. Henry and the little girl. The children state that they were picking berries when the bank on which they were standing crumbled beneath their feet, and they were carried to the bottom. Strange to say, beyond a few bruises and scratches, the little ones were unhurt. The boy says the accident occurred about 9 or 10 o'clock, and consequently they were confined in the pit nearly sixteen hours. The persevering search, and the joy of the parents on the recovery of the little ones, remind us of the good Shepherd who "came to seek and save them that were lost."

Objections to a Candidate.—The Examiner and Chronicle gives the following objections which were made against a number of candidates who preached unsuccessfully in a vacant pulpit : 1. Too large ; 2. Too small ; 3. Perfectionism ; 4. Periodical resignation ; 5. Verbal repetition ; 6. Second Advent ; 7. More of a lecturer than a preacher ; 8. Long sermons ; 9. Long prayers ; 10. Sensational ; 11. Too old ; 12. Laxity of doctrine ; 13. Behind the times ; 14. Shallow ; 15. Plagiarism ; 16. Insincerity ; 17. Slovenly ; 18. Out of a place ; 19. Inarticulate ; 20. Chews ; 21. Slops over ; 22. Expensive ; 23. Worldly ; 24. Too anxious to come ; 25. No pastor ; 26. Gets "on a tear"—that is, goes rabid on all sides of a question by turns.

An Authenticated Anecdote of George Peabody, whose life and portrait were given in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD, is that when he was little more than a boy, and just beginning his business career, he solemnly vowed upon his knees before God that, if God would entrust him with wealth, he would devote it to His glory. How God answered him, and how well he kept his vow, our readers know. Not a few such cases have occurred, the first we know of being the case of Jabez, in 1 Chron. 4 : 10. But in most cases where such a prayer is offered either there is a weakness of purpose in making the vow, or God sees that, in spite of the supplicants' earnestness, he cannot safely be trusted with riches. As a general rule, it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God (Mark 10 : 25).

The Inspection of Tenement Houses in New York commenced last week, and reveals a state of affairs which proves how badly the inspection was needed. Overcrowding, lack of light and ventilation, and imperfect sanitary arrangements were discovered at almost every visit of the inspectors Were an epidemic to break out the city is in the most approved state to render its ravages most thorough and disastrous.

Ocean Grove, N. J., has been the Centre of Attraction during the past week for the thousands of persons interested in the camp meetings of the season. The tenth anniversary of the first religious services held at Ocean Grove was celebrated July 31st. Public buildings, churches, cottages, and tents were decorated with flags. During the morning the anniversary sermon was preached by Bishop Simpson, of New Jersey, in the presence of 5000 people. In the afternoon another vast congregation assembled in the auditorium, and remained nearly four hours engaged in religious exercises.

The Evangelists Pentecost and Stebbins are to hold Gospel meetings in the New Haven Opera House on Sunday evenings during the remainder of the summer, and in October they will begin a series of services in Salem, for which the evangelical churches of that city are now making preparations.

A unday Excursion had a Disagreeable ex- ce last week. A Seventh Ward club organ- d picnic up the Hudson from New York to sior Grove, and engaged two barges at a of $235 for the conveyance of the party. e return voyage a disagreement took with the captain of the steam-tug which wing the barges back to the city, and some sionists cut the hawser attaching the tug barges; whereupon the captain of the er went on his way, leaving the barges their freight of about a thousand persons ir fate. They were in a dangerous posi- and two of the number went ashore in a o request assistance. But all their endeavors secure another steamer were fruitless. arty were ultimately obliged to anchor and n all night on the barges. On Monday ng the owner sent another steamer to tow back to the city. Sunday excursions, it rs, are not always so pleasant as they are ented.

A Appeal from the South for Educational ses is to be made to Europe by Bishop John ore, who has gone to England on a mission oney in behalf of the negroes. He wants e funds to educate and elevate the colored o a greater extent than has been done by reedmen's Boards or other agencies already ng. His plan is to go among the men who n olden times prominent in the abolition nent. The Bishop carries letters from dis- shed clergymen and philanthropists of this ry, and hopes to make a successful strike ds.

A hony Wayne's Two Graves.—It is not lly known that the hero of Stony Point, imes called "Mad Anthony Wayne" from eckless bravery of his military career, is in two graves. He died at Fort Presque ow the seat of Erie, Pa., and was buried In 1815 the family obtained permission to e his remains to Chester County. The re- were found in a state of semi-petrifaction, eavy. Knowing that it would be impossi- r the son to carry the body to Chester y in that condition, Dr. Wallace determined move the flesh from the bones. This was by boiling and the use of knives. The of General Wayne were then carefully d in convenient form, and were delivered son on his arrival. He returned with the Chester County, where the contents were with appropriate ceremonies. A fine ment, commemorative of the dead hero and eds, was subsequently erected at the grave. ones reinterred at Fort Presque Isle were vered some years ago in a box bearing the al's name, and a stone was erected there.

A emarkable Coincidence is related in the York Tribune:

prayer was answered in the tempest of July The story is vouched for that a Connecticut n who owns a lot in the cemetery went to uthorities the other day for leave to cut a tree upon it, to make room for a monu- but was refused. She asked a second with no better success. Then she said he had prayed them to grant her request, ad been refused, and she should now ask ord to remove the tree. It was torn up roots in the course of the great storm."

the Red Man be Educated?—Bishop ington, of Central New York, answers this ion in a practical manner in a letter he has hed. The Bishop says that when some n ago the government set at liberty certain n prisoners who had been detained at St. stine, Fla., he invited four of them to visit al New York—one Comanche, one Klowa, wo Cheyennes. He believed from what he f them that they would repay the cost and le of educating. They were committed to re of the rector of a rural parish in a high healthy region in Oneida County, where were allowed to divide their time between or pursuits and the study of books, and they were under the influence of a refined, igent family. Bishop Huntington describes the result as most satisfactory. He says the minds of the four boys are thoroughly awake and eager for knowledge. Three or four hours of each day, with some vacations, they are reading and writing, or getting and reciting English lessons. Their rate of progress is about that of an average boy of twelve or fourteen. As to character, it would be difficult to find four young men in any New England village more completely free from the knowledge or practice of evil. They are all shrewd judges of the characters of other men. They like fun as well as anybody; and if they are habitually serious, it is easy to find in them, in its right season, the mirthfulness of a ripe and well-balanced manhood. In manners they are gentlemen.

A Converted Teapot.—One Sabbath Afternoon an evangelist, sitting among some members of the working class in a homely kitchen, noticed among a variety of cups and saucers, standing like the crowned queen of the table, a very remarkable teapot. Teapots have usually a tendency to be low and stout, but this identical receptacle of the fragrant herb was long and thin, with a waist like Austria's Empress. The only defacement of its aristocratic beauty was that the end of the spout was slightly minus, the lower lip having been broken off. A member of our homely tea party exclaimed, "The men are converted, their wives are converted, and the teapot's converted too!" "How is that?" was the natural inquiry. "Why, sir," said the informant, "on Sunday afternoons these men used to have their mates in the house drinking, and the teapot was filled with beer; but now that they and their wives are converted they've got the preacher to have a meal with them, and the teapot's full of capital tea—it's converted, and no mistake. And, moreover, these men are fine violinists, and their instruments will be converted too."

Mr. Henry Varley, the Evangelist, recently returned to England from Australia, said in the course of an address: "Well do I remember, before I left England, a meeting at which a beloved servant of Christ was present, and, speaking of the love of God, he gave us this beautiful illustration. 'I was with my little boy for the first time in his experience at Brighton, and when we returned to London I heard him saying in my study to one of his companions, "Well, I have seen the sea," and it was the first time the little boy had looked out from the coast of Brighton upon the sea view that presents itself there.'

"So his father took up his thought at that point, and said to us (and I confess it was an utterance of years of blessing to me), 'My little boy had seen the sea, but it was just the coast-line around there, that was all.'

"Now, when I myself recently went to Australia, we were eighty four days out of sight of land, and thus I saw not merely the coast-line but the sea itself, in all its shoreless length and breadth.

"Oh, that you and I might not rest satisfied with merely viewing the coast-line of the unfathomable sea of God's love, but might seek after a closer walk and acquaintanceship with Him, so as to know more of the lengths and breadths and depths and heights of the great ocean of Christ's love, and thus gain in our measure the massive power which makes our God the glory of His church!

The English Press on Dr. Talmage.—Among the many laudatory notices of Dr. Talmage which have appeared in the English journals is the following from the London Daily Standard;

"We have never seen a man possessed of such transcendent talents as those owned by Dr. Talmage who carried them with a more commendable modesty, even to that degree that it seems as if he were almost unconscious of his great possessions. He evidently owns a heart full of burning, loving sympathy for his fellow-man, and that heart is never more full of joy itself than when it is made the means of showering around the words of good cheer and dispensing happiness to others."

INSTANT, CONSTANT, EXPECTANT.

A New Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"Continuing instant in prayer."—ROMANS 12 : 12.

Prayer Related to all Duties and Graces—The Prayer of Hudson the Martyr—Prayer Should be—I. Instant—The Metaphor of Hunting Dogs—Of a Wrestler—How to Attain Urgency in Prayer—1. Realize the Value of the Mercy Sought—2. Your Need of it—3. That it can Come only from God—4. Have an Eager Desire—5. Plead for It with all Your Might—6. Pray with Strong Faith—II. Expectant—The Liberated Swallow—"We Won't Trouble the Lord with That."

THIS is placed in connection with a large number of brief but very weighty precepts. Prayer has a distinct relationship to all Christian duties and graces. It is not possible for us to carry out the holy commands of our Lord Jesus unless we are abundant in supplication. The Romans at the time that Paul wrote to them were subject to persecution, and in this verse he mentions two remedies for impatience under such afflictions—remedies which are equally effectual under all the trials of life.

The old physicians tell us of two antidotes against poison, the hot and the cold, and they dilate upon the special excellence of each of these: in like manner the apostle Paul gives us first the warm antidote—"Rejoicing in hope," and then he gives us the cool antidote, "Patient in tribulation." Either of these, or both together, will work wonderfully for the sustaining of the spirit in the hour of affliction; but it is to be observed that neither of these remedies can be taken into the soul except they be mixed with a draught of prayer.

Joy and patience are curative essences, but they must be dropped into a glass full of supplication, and then they will be wonderfully efficient. Have not holy men of old always sustained themselves in their worst times of grief and depression by betaking themselves to prayer? Mind that you do the same. Impatience will be sure to follow prayerlessness, but the endurance of the divine will grows out of communion with God in prayer.

I like that beautiful, though sad, picture of the Norwich martyr, Hudson, of whom Foxe tells us that, when he stood at the stake with the chain about him to be burnt, he fell under a cloud. The Lord had withdrawn the light of his countenance from him, and therefore this man of God slipped from under the chain to have a few minutes alone with God. Some thought that he was about to recant, and his fellow-martyrs began exhorting him to be steadfast and to play the man, but this dear believer knew what he was at, and when he had spoken with his God he came back to the stake with a bright and beaming countenance, saying, "Now, I thank God, I am strong, and fear not what man can do unto me," and stood in his place with his fellow-sufferers and there burned quick to the death without fear. Oh, the power of prayer! If we do but know how to get into contact with the Eternal and Omnipotent we shall be joyful and patient in all tribulations, and bravely endure even the keen edge of death.

Prayer is the lifeblood of duty, the secret sap of holiness, the fountain of obedience. Upon prayer as spoken of in the text may the Holy Spirit help us now to meditate. Three things I shall speak upon which will be remembered the better by being linked with three words—Instant, constant, expectant.

I. First, then,

INSTANT

—"Continuing instant in prayer." It may be proper at this stage to say that these words, though I shall dwell upon them in the English, are not identical with the Greek, in which there is but one word. I do not know that a better translation could possibly be given, and so I shall content myself with the very words of our own version.

The word "instant," as used by our translators, meant pressing, urgent, importunate, earnest. The Greek word is said to have the signification of "always applying strength in prayer," or continuing with all your might in prayer. Our prayer is to be full of strength; "blessed is the man whose strength is in thee."

Master Brooks says that the word is a metaphor taken from hunting dogs, which will never give up the game till they have got it. A hunting dog when in pursuit of its victim works itself into full motion, using every limb and muscle to follow as fast as possible. If you catch a glimpse of it you will see that it throws itself forward with intense eagerness, the whole body and soul of the dog is in motion towards one object; no portion of him lingers, not so much as a glance is given to any thing else; the whole creature is instant after the game which it pursues, urgently pressing, hot foot, as we say, to overtake the prey. Now this is the way in which we are to pray.

We must go with our whole soul to God or he will not accept us. It will be ill for us if we are half-hearted, for it is written, "their heart is divided; now shall they be found faulty." "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." We are exhorted to "knock," and as our model we are directed to him who at midnight aroused his slumbering friend.

How are we to attain to this urgency? God's gracious Spirit must give it to us; but what are the methods by which, under his direction, we may become instant in prayer?

1. I answer, first, let us study very thoroughly the value of the mercy which we are seeking at God's hand. Seeker, take heed to do this.

Whatever it is that thou art asking for, it is no trifle. Look at it. If it be a thing about which thou art not certain that it would be according to God's mind, lay it aside; thou hast no right to be very fervent about that which is of questionable necessity. If this may or may not be good for thee, put up thy requests to the great Father gently once or twice, and then lay them lightly in Jesus' hand.

But when thou art certain that the blessing sought for is a good and necessary thing for thy soul, then, in order that thy spirit may be strong in prayer, get a deep sense of its value, its goodness, and its necessity; examine it as a goldsmith inspects a jewel when he wishes to estimate its worth. A man's ardor in pursuit will be in proportion to his consciousness of the value of that which he pursues. Get thou to feel what a precious thing grace is, what it cost the Lord to bring it to thee; what blessings it brings with it for time and for eternity, and when thy heart sees that it seeks after an unspeakably precious gift, then will its desire be stirred up to pray with intense longings.

2. When thou hast done this meditate much upon thy necessities that thou mayest get a sense of thy need of the mercy thou art seeking. See thy soul's poverty and thine own undeservingness. Look at what will happen to thee unless this blessing come. If it be some absolutely indispensable spiritual blessing, picture to thyself where thou wilt be if God should withhold it, what evils will spring of thy continuing in want of it, and what further wants may yet beset thee. The more thy need smites thee the more eagerly wilt thou cry unto the Lord concerning it.

3. Endeavor also to get a distinct consciousness of the fact that God must give thee this blessing, or thou wilt never have it. It requires time to think over these things, therefore set thyself apart awhile from all other occupations, and think on these matters. Say to thyself, Here is such and such a spiritual mercy, and I can never get it out of myself, for I am a dry well. Nothing can come out of nothing, and I am nothing. I cannot bring a clean thing out of an unclean, and I am unclean. This spiritual blessing I cannot obtain from my fellow-man; nor king nor priest could bring it to me. I cannot climb to heaven after it, nor dive into the abyss to find it; nor earth nor heaven can yield it, nor can either time or eternity produce it. God alone must give it me, and he is a sovereign; he has a right to give or to withhold. I cannot claim it of Him as a matter of right; he must give it me of His mere mercy; it must be a boon of undeserved favor.

Oh, if you get that truth well wrought into your soul you will pray earnestly, and you will use the right arguments—"Have mercy upon me, O God, according to thy loving kindness, according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies." God alone can help you, and if he refuse, you are undone for ever; therefore cry mightily unto him.

4. Further to make you instant in prayer endeavor eagerly to desire the good thing. Stand not before God if thou wouldst win at His hands, as one who will be content whether or no. Say not, "Give it or withhold it, it is all one to me. I knock at thy door, and if thou open I will be somewhat pleased, but if thy door be shut I will be pleased too." Oh, no; such listlessness will never prevail with God. There are times when you must be brought to this condition that you will not be denied.

There is a holy "impudency," as the Puritans were wont to call it, to which we must be brought, in which we shall with holy boldness dare to say, like Jacob, "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me." Such language would be blasphemy if it were not permitted, it would be presumption if it were not encouraged; but there is little fear of our being too bold, for in these times men are more inclined to keep at a distance than to come too near.

5. I will suppose, dear brother, that you have followed these directions so far by the help of God's Spirit, and now you know your need of the mercy, and something of the value of it; you see that God alone can give it you, and you are anxiously desirous to have it. Now comes the tug of war; you are to plead with all your might. Gather up all your faculties to see whether this thing be a matter of promise or no. Take down the Book, your charter, and your Father's will, and see if there be any part of the charter wich promises this good thing to you. When you have found the promise lay your finger on it. Better still, with your spirit grasp it in your hand, and go before God with it.

If prayer be as Luther calls it, "bombarda Christianorum," with which he doth bombard heaven, then surely the promise is the shot which He sends forth. Plead the promise by saying, "Lord, do as thou hast said. Fulfil this word unto thy servant upon which thou hast caused me to hope." If you do not seem to prevail with one promise seek out another and plead it. This, perhaps, will be more to the point—a promise which your very soul seems to suck in as though it were spoken to you newly and freshly, as if never another man had ever received it.

THE CHRISTIAN'S GREAT GUN

Spread this second promise before the Lord. Nothing pleases Him more than seeing His own Word pleaded by His own children. Try this, and if it is manifest that you have not succeeded, turn to yet another promise, and another, and another, and another, and then plead, "For Thy name's sake, for Thy truth s sake, for Thy covenant's sake;" and then come in with the greatest plea of all, "For Jesus' sake and in His name I plead with thee, my God. O thou that hearest prayer, wilt thou not keep touch with thine own word, and be true to thine own Son?" You have prevailed there. By that sign you have conquered. Again it shall be seen that the Lord hath hearkened to the voice of a man.

6. Still there is one thing more wanted, and that is strong faith, not only that God is, but that He is the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him. You cannot be instant in prayer, nay, you cannot offer an acceptable prayer at all except as you believe in the prayer-hearing God.

The modern wise men assure us, with a patronizing air, that prayer is a pious exercise, exceedingly beneficial to ourselves, but quite inoperative with God. They are kind enough to allow us to pray, only we must not suppose that it has the slightest effect. And do they think that we are such idiots that we would stand and whistle to the wind and find good for our souls in such a stupid proceeding?

They must have formed their notion of our mental condition from their own if they imagine that we should pray if we knew that God did not hear us, and would not answer us. Prayer apar from the idea of a hearing God is not prayer; i is soliloquizing, or, in plainer words, a silly talking to yourself, such as one sees in half-witted ol persons who have outlived what few senses the once possessed. You must believe that God is and that there is real commerce between you soul and God, and that your pleadings are a pa of the divine way of blessing you, or else yo are not praying but maundering and chattering

The Lord does really listen to the pleadings His people, and though He does not alter H ordinance and His decree, yet in some way other He makes the prayers of His people to an efficient link in the machinery of His pro dence and grace, so that not without pray doth He bless them, but with it He doth bl them abundantly. Dear friends, may the Lo the Holy Spirit stir us all up to be instant mighty, energetic prayer.

II. Now, secondly, comes the word

CONSTANT.

—"continuing instant in prayer." To go back the hunting dog with which we set out. saw him rushing like the wind after his ga but this will not be enough if it only lasts fo little; he must continue running if he is to ca his prey. It matters not how fast the s hound goes if after having kept the pace aw he begins to slacken—the stag will escape f him. It is a sign of failure in the iron t when the furnaces are blown out; when busi flourishes the fire blazes both day and ni and so will it be with prayer when the soul i a flourishing state. If prayer be the Christ vital breath, how can he leave off praying?

We must maintain the ardor of prayer, must be intense always. Prayer is not to thing of yesterday, but of to-day, and to- row, until it changeth into praise above. haps prayer will continue even in heaven. tainly the souls under the altar cry " long?" and unfulfilled prophecies and pro yet big with future events will be pleaded there. Praise, however, is the chief charac tic of the future state as prayer is the char istic of the present one.

We are to get into a good place—"insta prayer," and then to keep it up—continui stant in prayer. "That is difficult" says Who said it was not? All the processes Christian life are difficult; indeed, they a possible apart from the abiding help Divine Spirit; but "the Spirit helpeth firmities."

Now then, brethren, that we may be hel keep up our fervency in prayer, please to that prayer must be continuous, because singularly mixed up with the whole gospel sation. As the incense filled the temple, prayer fill the gospel economy. The blo upon the mercy seat, and upon the alt the laver, and the candlestick, and the b was sprinkled everywhere in the Jewish nacle, and thus atonement was the most uous object in the worship prescribed by of Moses; but next to this, prayer wa prominent in the continual calling upo and in the smoke of the incense by whicl was symbolized.

Prayer was dear to Jesus when he was of Nazareth upon the mountain's lon and prayer is dear to Him now that as of God He intercedes in glory. Even the covenant hath this condition of p pended, "Ask of Me, and I will give heathen for thine inheritance, and the u parts of the earth for thy possession." is the atmosphere which surrounds E

: as the clouds hang on the mountains, so prayer linger over every great mercy of God. ayer is connected with every covenant bless- Why, beloved, it is to him that calleth the name of the Lord that the promise of tion is given. Our heavenly Father gives Holy Spirit to those that ask Him. Justifi- n was given to the publican rather than to Pharisee, because he had offered humble, ving, acceptable prayer; whereas the Phari- asked nothing, but only glorified himself. ption begets prayer, for it brings us the t of adoption whereby we cry, Abba, Father. n election right onward to perfection in st there is no blessing of the covenant but : is understood, received, enjoyed, fed upon, practically used in the way of prayer. Those would safely navigate the sea of life must their passage to heaven.

oreover, beloved, prayer has been connected every living spiritual experience you have had. Will you kindly look back to the hour you were under the fig tree and Jesus saw Were you not at prayer? When you first e to go to your Father, was not your first a prayer? When you received the assur- of salvation, was it not in answer to er? When His banner over you has been , have you not felt it sweet to pray?

ow, beloved, we are commanded to be con- t in our instancy. Is not this right? Is e any time when we can afford to slacken ver? Would you kindly put your finger on map of the way, and tell me where a Chris- man may leave off praying? Is it when he pers? No, for then he needs grace to carry ll cup with a steady hand. Is it when he is istress? Doth not nature itself teach us that he time of affliction we should especially v near to God in prayer?

hen should he pray, nay, when should he pray? Where may he pray? The answer e may pray everywhere, for, as one has well , a man who carries his temple about with is always in a place where he may pray; and w ye not that your bodies are the temples the Holy Ghost? Wherever you go you y your temples with you, and in every place may pray, and should pray, and need to y, and therefore be sure that you do pray.

ut specially we ought to be constant in yer, because such remarkable gifts are vouch- d to importunity. God often gives liberally to yer when it speaks but once, but frequent ding begets abundant answering. That is most soul-enriching prayer which is long in ning its way with God. When prayers, like at ships, have been long on the voyage you hope that they have gone far and have hered rich cargoes and will come home ghted with all the goodlier merchandise. If can but quietly hope, and patiently wait, all be well.

he very choicest blessings of heaven are re- ved for the Elijahs who can say, "Go again n times," for the men who come again, and in, and again, and never faint. Wait then n the Lord with holy importunity of prayer, your reward shall more than repay you. It ood for us to be compelled to pray like this; xercises the faculties of the soul; it makes n of us; it brings us up from spiritual child- od to perfect manhood. Therefore be ye stant in prayer, and gather strength for im- tunate pleadings.

he fishermen at Mentone keep on fishing h their great net; ay, by the score these fish- en take it out and haul it in again, and fre- ntly they get no more than one little sardine their pains. Many and many a time I have n no more than they could hold in their hand the produce of a net which covered acres of sea. But why do they go on? Because y are fishermen, and cannot do any thing else. u and I are praying men, and there is nothing e we can do but wait upon the Lord. So if, er many a throw of the net, we get but one all answer, we will try again, for this is all we do,

Continue in prayer, because the continuance of our instancy in prayer is the test of the reality of our devotion. Men that are in business and are in earnest cannot afford to open the shop and do a little occasional trade, and then put up a notice, "The proprietor of this shop has gone out for an excursion, and will resume his business when he feels inclined to." This would be trifling, and not trading; and it is so in prayer: a little bit of praying and then a stretch of neglect will prove a delusion and a snare.

A poor simpleton who had never been to sea before, when he was going to Australia asked a friend on board the vessel what the sailors did with the vessel at night. "Do of a night?" was the reply; "why, sail as fast as they can go." "I did not know," he said, "they worked in the night; I thought they stopped the ship." He must have thought he was out on some pleasure excursion along the coast, and that the yacht would anchor when the sun went down; but he was in an ocean clipper which was out for work and not for play. The man who means business must sail whether it is dark or light; and so in prayer we must serve God instantly, both day and night.

Real prayers are constant prayers. There is a fish, you know, that sometimes attempts to fly, but it is no bird for all that. It only takes a little flight and then it is in the water again; but a true bird keeps on the wing, especially if it is such a bird as the eagle, whose untiring wing bears it above the clouds. Beware of prayers which leap up like a grasshopper and are soon down again. Let your prayers have the wings of a dove, let them fly away from earth and rest in God. Hypocrites pray by fits and starts; the genuine Christian "prays without ceasing."

Beloved, we must continue in prayer: but the Holy Spirit alone can enable us to do it. We may, however, be much helped in it by occasionally setting apart a special time. Days of prayer, and hours of prayer, and set seasons of prayer, are very helpful. We ought to have our appointed seasons each day, but special times over and above our regular custom may stir the fire and enable it to burn more brightly. To unite with other Christians in prayer is often very helpful. Private prayer is more important than public prayer under many aspects, and is a better test of a Christian; still public prayer often reacts upon private devotion, and when two or three are together, and are agreed as touching the kingdom, their supplications will often be helpful to each other and obtain the thing which they desire.

III. Our last word is

EXPECTANT.

It is not in the text verbally, but it must be there really, because there will be no such thing as instancy or constancy unless there is an expectation, and a belief that God can and will give that which we seek. Let us go back to our dog again; the dog would not run at so great a rate if he did not expect to seize his prey; but see how every limb is stretched with intensity, and he goes over hedge and ditch after his game because he has almost seized it, and though it flies before him with all its might, yet he is close upon it.

There is no praying with any fervor unless there is faith that God will hear you; at least if instancy can be felt for a while, constancy cannot be kept up long without it. Expectancy is the very reason of prayer. Some prefer to pray because it is their duty and their custom, but real prayer usually springs from the expectancy that God will hear.

I was awakened at about four o'clock this morning by a sharp, shrill sound. I thought screaming by the window, and I fell asleep again. But I was soon aroused by the repetition of the same sharp sound. A young bird had found its way into my room, and was crying for liberty. I left my bed and opened the window to let the captive free. It did not seem to know its way, and so I caught it and gently placed it at the window, and in a moment it flew to the oak tree close by and sat itself down. I watched its movement. The moment it had perched itself comfortably it began to utter sharp cries, and it turned its little head round on all sides as if looking for some one. It was crying for its mother, and why? Because it expected to be fed. And why did it expect to be fed? Because it had been fed before. If it had been a full-grown bird, it would not have called for food, but would have helped itself; but this poor little creature had been nourished by its parents, and it was looking round to be supplied again.

This is why we pray. O Lord, thou hast supplied our wants so long and so often in answer to prayer that we are in the way of it; and now we pray, not only because we ought to do so, but because it has become natural to us to pray, and we expect thee to hear us.

Some professors seldom exercise expectancy in prayer, but the soul of prayer is gone when you have no expectation. God will hear the cry of your desire, but the hand into which He will put the mercy is the hand of your expectation. You must believe that you have the blessing, or you will not have it unless it be by some extraordinary mercy beyond what is promised. His usual way is to raise our expectations so that we look out for the favor, and then he sends it.

If some people looked out for answers to prayer they might soon have them, for their prayers would be answered by themselves. I was reminded of that by a little boy whose father prayed in the family that the Lord would visit the poor and relieve their wants. When he had finished, his little boy said, "Father, I wish I had your money." "Why so?" "Because," he said, "I would answer your prayers for you." "Which prayers, John?" "Why, father, you prayed that the poor might be helped, and you could do it very well with your own money."

I like better still that story of the good man at the prayer-meeting, who, reading the list of prayers, found one for a poor widow that her distress might be relieved, so he began to read it, but stopped and added, "We won't trouble the Lord with that: I will attend to that myself." Numbers of prayers are of that kind: we are praying God to do what we ought to do ourselves, and that is sheer impertinence.

If we really prayed in earnest, expecting to be heard, our answer would often come in this very way, by our being stirred up to see that the Lord had heard us. The Lord might well say to us' "Thou sayest Thy kingdom come; arise and help to make My kingdom come! Thou askest that My name may be hallowed; go thyself and hallow My name." Oh, that we had the expectancy which would teach us practical action, so that we should find the answer to our prayer given before we asked according to the promise, "Before they call I will answer them, and while they are yet speaking I will hear."

I had many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now, for the time has passed. I shall close by recommending to all of you one simple but very comprehensive prayer. It was offered by a poor man in Fife, and it was copied out by the Duchess of Gordon, and found among her papers when she died. "O Lord, give me grace to feel my need of Thy grace! Give me grace to ask for Thy grace! Give me grace to receive Thy grace! And when in Thy grace thou hast given me grace, give me grace to use Thy grace!" See ye not what scope there is for prayer! You will never need to leave off pleading for want of subjects. Continue, therefore, to be instant in it.

A DOUBLE TIE.

A Recollection by Major Malan.

The Lieutenant's Songs in the Crimea—His Charger helps him on a Visit to the English Manor-House—The Fair Face Seen Again—Ordered to India—Private Joe M. made a Corporal—Lieutenant's Return after Four Years—Thankful Retrospect with his Bride—He Visits the Cottage of Joe M.'s Intended and Relieves her Godly Parents' Poverty—Joe M. Returns and Marries L. G.

THERE was now a double interest in the army encamped on the heights above the Black Sea, in the manor-house, and the hamlet; for although the visit of the young officer had been considered nothing more than a passing incident, the fact that he had once been there and had now rejoined the army, led to an occasional allusion to his name whenever tidings arrived from Joe Marshall. The officer and soldier who were thus serving together in the field did not know one another, for the officer had only occasionally visited the manor-house. Neither did the two gentle maidens who lived so near each other, and who often met, ever imagine that there were two hearts in that army to whom they were very dear, and to whom their remembrance was an oft-repeated pleasure! Soldiers must cheer one another when an army is encamped in mud and snow. Happily this winter the army was provided with every comfort. Great Britain is generous enough to her warriors when she knows their needs and is able to supply them. Quantities of warm clothing had been sent to the army. Deliciously soft comforters and hoods, worked by loving hands, were freely given to all who needed them.

"Good-night, my man; all right?" said the officer as, at midnight, he left the advanced sentry pacing up and down in snow a foot deep. "I should be all right, sir," said the sentinel, perspiring under the weight of his clothing, "if I was not so uncommon hot!" It was a fault on the right side in that sort of weather.

The next day witnessed the arrival of reinforcements from England, and amongst them came the young lieutenant, who had fully recovered, and now rejoined his regiment in the Crimea. His brother officers were a very happy, united body. They all messed together, and when dinner was over, the song always went round before they bade one another good-night. The most popular songs among soldiers in the field are songs of home. They don't talk much about home to one another, but nothing touches the heart of men in distant lands so much as good songs, which carry their minds far away to the faces and forms they love in the Fatherland. One among many often sung was an especial favorite. Two verses will suffice here:

"What will you do, love, when I am going,
With white sails flowing, the seas beyond?
What will you do, love, when waves divide us,
And friends may chide us for being fond?
Though waves divide us, and friends may chide us,
In faith abiding, I'll still be true;
And I'll pray for thee, o'er the stormy ocean,
In deep devotion, that's what I'll do!

* * * *

What would you do, love, if home returning,
With hopes high burning, and wealth for you?
If my bark, which bounded o'er foreign foam,
Should be lost near home, what would you do?
So thou wert saved, I'd bless the hour,
In want or sorrow, which left me you;
And I'd welcome thee from the stormy billow,
This breast thy pillow, that's what I'd do!"

The quiet applause which always rewarded this song showed how fully its sentiment was approved, and that though far from home the officers did not forget the loved ones they had left behind them. When it came to the lieutenant's turn, he sung the song he had learned before he left England.

Both the officer and Joe returned home when peace was proclaimed. The former was much disappointed in not being able to spend his leave in the neighborhood of the manor-house. But the Indian Mutiny soon followed the Crimean War, and both were at once ordered to India. An unexpected opportunity then occurred for one more visit before leaving England. The officer owned a horse which had been a favorite with his regiment during the late campaign. Not wishing to leave it with any master, he had offered it as a present. The road by which he travelled with his gift led not far from the home where the colonel and his family resided.

As he came to a lane which led thither he reined up in deep thought. "I will see her once more," he said to himself; "I may never see her again." So he turned his horse's head and in a few moments was outside the old gates. It was a sufficient apology for a call on the line of march that his charger had done good service during the late war. After sitting a while in the drawing-room, the family went out to admire the faithful animal. Gentle hands stroked its neck and smoothed its head. Endearing epithets were addressed to the honored beast. Its master was well pleased. He took another long, full look at the fair face he wished to remember in the far East, and then, excusing himself that his faithful companion had made a long journey, and had yet further to go, mounted, bade the happy occupants of the old manor-house farewell, and with a full heart rode up the avenue. "Kate, dear old lady," he said, as he patted his charger, "you have done me another good turn to-day! But for you I should never have paid this visit!" Then, speaking to himself, he said, "Cheer up, old fellow. You may come home again, please God! and who can tell what may happen then?"

After some months' active service in the Indian Mutiny, peace ensued, and the British troops went into quarters. Joe Marshall did not waste the opportunities of education afforded him in the army, and he soon became a good scholar. His steady conduct obtained for him deserved promotion. The mother's heart was now frequently gladdened by autograph despatches from Bombardier and then from Corporal Marshall.

But there was sad news for Joe, when a letter arrived from home announcing that L. G. was very ill, and that both her father and mother were ailing. First of all, it was that she was obliged to keep her bed; then, that she had gone to the county hospital; then, that the doctors thought that she had got paralysis! Joe bore it bravely; he hoped for the best. Soldiers soon come to know that doctors, however clever, sometimes make mistakes, and he had been brought through so much that he had good hope that L. G. would get safely over her illness. So he did his duty cheerfully, and looked forward to the time when he would once again see the fields and lanes, the hills, copses, and dales, the cottages and happy faces in Warwickshire.

The officer remained with his regiment until, having suffered from fever for some time, he was invalided home. Four years had elapsed since he left England. Often and often in India his mind traversed the space which separated him from the old Elizabethan home, and in thought he frequently paid a visit to the family there. On the march his men sang by the hour, and he joined with them. "Ever of thee" was a favorite song, and when he heard the words:

"Thou wert the star that, mildly beaming, Shone o'er my path when all was dark and drear," he would feel that this was true of her of whom he often so fondly thought.

At length once more he landed in Old England. He was not long in finding his way to the neighborhood of the manor-house! He had previously written there, and had expressed to the parents what his hopes and wishes were. No obstacle was offered on their part. The rest was soon settled. The tale of love was told, and met with a tender, loving response.

"When I think of all God's mercies to me during the few past years of my life, I do not know how to thank Him," said the officer, as he sat with his betrothed and her sister in a summer-house commanding one of the loveliest views in the south of England.

"He is very good," replied the lady sitting next him; "His name is 'merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and in truth.'"

"It is indeed," continued the officer. "It is a blessed title, especially as there is added, 'Keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgressions, and sin.' What a Father!"

He soon heard of Corporal Joe Marshall, and went down to the pretty vale in which his parents lived to pay them a visit. They were very glad to see him. Mrs. Marshall showed him the last letter from the corporal, which contained the good news that his battery expected to return home next year.

It was a bright and happy time in all that neighborhood when the marriage of the young officer and the colonel's daughter took place. The families in the adjacent hamlets were not forgotten, and their hearty good wishes added to the gratifying associations of that most happy day.

"I'm going down to see Mr. and Mrs. Golde to-day," said the officer to his father-in-law. " hear that they are very ill, and a visit will chee them."

"You will find their daughter there too," sai one of the ladies. "She has been to the coun ty hospital, but they can do nothing for he She is a good girl; I believe they have offere to take her again, as she is so cheerful, and do the patients so much good." When sprin comes we must try and get her in again.

It was a cold, damp, dreary winter day. Th tap at Mrs. Golder's door was answered by pleasant "Come in." There was a hole in t door almost large enough for a man to crawl i The officer had noticed this, and when he e tered the cottage observed that the roof was o of repair, and there was but a scanty fire sticks, on each side of which Mrs. Golder a her sick husband were seated. He could har muster courage to speak. At length he sa "Well, my dear friends, you certainly ha trials!"

"Yes, sir, we have," said the wife; "but t mercies of the Lord are far greater."

She spoke in a quiet, patient tone, and face brightened as she uttered the last wor The visitor was more astonished than bef There was no assumption of piety in the woma manner; it was quite plain that she spoke fr her heart. The sick daughter was in bed stairs, unable to come down. He remained some time talking to the two invalids, and ing received other lessons from his visit to humble cottage, the officer bade them be of g cheer, and, giving them something as a toke his regard, said "Good-day."

As soon as he got into the road he exclain "I trust I shall never forget the lesson I learnt there to-day. What an awful sin it i murmur or complain! Those two poor g people have preached me the best sermon I listened to for many a month." When he to the manor-house he told the colonel o visit, and what he had seen.

"The landlord ought to have put that cot in repair before winter," he replied; "but I have it done.

Calvinist and Arminian Sailors Agreed. Dr Duncan was in Leghorn, Italy, when two shipmasters came to the port—the one Leith, the other from England—the one a byterian, and the other a Wesleyan. The leyan came and asked him to preach in his "Oh," said he, "I could not do that; fo see I am a Calvinist and you are an Arm and I might say something to injure you ings." "Sir," was the reply, "what we you to do is to come and preach again devil." That is certainly a Catholic pla Calvinist and Arminian should always be to preach against the devil, and in the nan common Master.

THE THREE "COMES."

r. Moody's Sermon on Sunday, July 27th, at Cooper Union, New York.

THE Hall of Cooper Union, in which Mr. wyer has been holding his Gospel Temperance eetings, was crowded to excess on Sunday, July th, and above five thousand persons had been able to secure admittance.

It had been announced that Mr. Sankey, who rived in New York on the previous day from rope, would sing, and that Mr. Moody would each.

Both evangelists were present, and after Mr. nkey had sung "He Will Hide Me," and Watching and Waiting," Mr. Moody rose and d:

"'My text shall be just the one little word ome,' and if I can make of my sermon a hammer drive the nail of righteousness into your souls, shall have accomplished my purpose. You y forget all about my sermon, but my text is ort enough to be remembered, and it is well rth remembering, for it is an invitation to you d to me, coming from God Himself.

"'My words are to every one of you personally, d not to your neighbors. The great trouble th our church-goers is that they listen for hers, and don't apply sermons to themselves. e are too generous with our sermons and their sons; instead of keeping them ourselves we e them away. When God condescends to eak to you, as he does in this blessed word, 'ome,' you can well afford to listen, and to ten for yourselves.

Many men who go to church regularly never ar a word of the sermons. They are attending to their outside business, and planning opera-ns for the coming week. I find it a very hard ng to get any real earnest attention. I was d by a minister once that a parishioner of his d congratulated him upon one of his sermons, ying that it was one of his greatest efforts. o you remember the text?' asked my friend. Vell, no; the fact is, you had begun when I me in.' 'Ah! then you can tell me something out the middle of the sermon. I am anxious know what part of the discourse pleased you much.' The man could remember nothing the middle of the sermon. 'Perhaps,' said e minister, 'you can tell me something about e end?' 'No,' was the answer, 'I went away fore you closed.' Now, don't laugh at yourves. That very man may be in this house."

Mr. Moody then proceeded to point out some the various "comes" of God's Word. The st come that he invited his hearers' attention was the

"COME AND SEE.",

"There is no language that can describe beau-s of Jesus Christ; we must come and learn of m. I was lately," said the speaker, "telling me one in Connecticut what a beautiful sunset ad seen. He asked me to describe it to him, but aid I am not able; I haven't language accurate ough to describe a sunset. But it is infinitely re difficult to make any approach to describ-g the beauties of Christ. If you want to know at Christ is you must come and see Him, you st come and dwell with Him, you must come d enjoy Him."

Mr. Moody illustrated this point by a touching ecdote: "A year ago last winter an affecting ene occurred in the streets of Baltimore. Two tle sisters were looking through a large store ndow at the toys within, and trying to describe at they saw to a little blind sister who was th them. They were exhausting their feeble wers of description to bring home to the mind their blind companion what they saw, although e listened greedily. But, after all, they failed present any thing more than an imperfect re-esentation. The gentleman who saw the cir-mstance said it was extremely touching that ey tried hard to describe the collection in the re, but they could not do it. That is just e our trying to tell you of Christ.

"We may exhaust our powers of description, t the effect will be very moderate. You must come and see His beauties with your own eyes." Mr Moody went on to remind those that say that redemption is a mystery beyond their comprehension, that the great God condescended to reason this point with them. "'Come,' he says, 'and let us reason together;' 'though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as white as snow.' What is wanted in the first place is simply to come.

"There is another addressed to us—"'COME UNTO ME ALL YE THAT LABOR and are heavy laden and I will give you rest.' You want rest, we all want rest, and we are all continually seeking it, but it is not to be found in this world of sin. Christ is the author of rest, and the only place in this wide world where we can find it is in the bosom of Jesus. Don't leave this hall to-day until you have met Christ. I don't care what may be the sin that has brought you down. If you will bring your sorrows to Christ he will bear them for you. I always love to think of Jesus as my burden-bearer. He is a faithful one, but the trouble is we are not willing to lay our burdens at the foot of the cross and leave them there. The trouble is that many bring their burdens to Him and carry them away again. They go to their closets and throw it open at His feet, but when they get up again they swing their burdens over their shoulders once more and go on.

"The next come that we have is

"'COME AND DRINK.'

"All the world is thirsting for something. They rush to go on excursions on Sunday, or to the Sunday theatre; the drunkard goes to the whiskey saloon, but none of these things can satisfy. But if we only come to the waters of the living fountain, we shall be satisfied. The invitation is to every one that thirsteth.

"Come to Christ and drink. The world is thirsty. They don't know exactly for what they are thirsting, but they are thirsting. What fills your theatres and crowds your excursions? The thirst of the world. Even Christ thirsted on the cross, and when God turned His face from Him He cried, 'I thirst!' The world rushes eagerly from one fountain to another, but its thirst is unquenched. But here comes the word of Christ, 'Come and drink!' He is the living fountain—a fountain that never gets dry.

"It flows on, day and night, and its waters are open to you all. It is not because men can't come, but because they won't, that this invitation goes unheeded. Their will stands in the way. Come and drink to-night, and you shall never thirst again. Come and eat. We can't live without food any more than without water. We must feed on Christ. He is the manna that came down from heaven, and the banquet to which He invites you is a free one. All that we have to do is to keep our minds fixed on Christ. That is feeding on Him. We have such a lot of sickly Christians, lame, halt, and blind, because they don't feed on Jesus; they are literally starving to death.

"There are other 'comes,' but I've talked long enough. What I want is that you should all come. Come to the feast, come to the manna, come and inherit all things prepared before the foundations of the world."

The Rescue of a Hymn from the Flames.—Miss Havergal was a very fine musician and singer, but she will be known and remembered longer by her hymns than by her singing or her prose. Mr. Ira Sankey writes: "She was greatly delighted when I told her how much her hymn, 'I gave my life for thee,' had been used and blessed in America, and said, 'How little we know what the Lord may take into His own hand and use! I was but a young girl when I wrote that hymn, and after I had written it, I was so little impressed with it that I threw it on the fire, thinking that it was not worth preserving; but a friend, sitting by, rescued it just in time to save it; and after it had lain away in my friend's portfolio for a year or two, it was brought out and given to the world.'"

DR. MOFFATT'S ANECDOTES OF A BECHUANA DOG AND AN ENEMY OVERCOME.

AT a recent meeting in London, the Rev. Dr. Moffat, the celebrated African Missionary, who is now over eighty years of age, related the following anecdotes: Some time after the Gospel had been preached among the Bechuanas, and converts had been made, I met an elderly man who looked very downcast. He had quite an elongated countenance, such as I had never seen him with before. I said to him, "My friend, what is the matter; who is dead?" "Oh!" said he, "there is no one dead." "Well, what is the matter? You seem to be mourning." The man then scratched his head, and said, "My son tells me that my dog has eaten a leaf of the Bible." "Well, what of that," I said. "Perhaps I can replace it." "Oh," said the man, "the dog will never be any good; he will never bite anybody; he will never catch any jackals; he will be as tame as I see the people become who believe in that book. All our warriors become as gentle as women and my dog is done for."

There was a man in the congregation over which I was pastor, in the country where I labored, and he had conceived A BITTER HATRED of me, which burnt like fire in his breast. The cause was this: he had observed that the people who received my testimony became quite other creatures, and he could not comprehend what kind of medicine I used in order to produce the change. The general testimony borne in answer to his inquiries was, "Oh, Moffat has got his medicine out of the book; that is the medicine that changes men's hearts into women's hearts." The man continued to hate me, and he would have given anything to get me cut off. If I met him by chance in a narrow lane or in any hole or corner, he would get out of the way.

On one occasion when I thus met him in a lane, I saw him a long way off. He could not turn to the right or to the left. I thought to myself, "Have you found me, O my enemy?" There was no alternative for him but to come forward. Of course, I was not going to turn back. When he came a little nearer he shouted in the Bechuana language, "Look away from me." Then he came nearer and nearer, until he came within ten or twelve paces, and he roared out again, "Look away from me." When he came close to me, I said to him, "My good friend, what is all this about?" smiling at him all the time. "Why do you want me to look away? I can look at you and you can look at me." He then dropped his spear and shield, and called out, "Forgive me, my lord, forgive me." I grasped his hands at once. "Forgive you!" I said. "With all my heart I have forgiven you." He again repeated, imploringly, "Forgive me." I said, "What have you done? I have forgiven you whatever you intended to do or whatever you have done."

He said, "If I had had my will, you would have been long since dead. I have waylaid you, with that spear, when you knew it not, but I dared not throw it. When you returned from visiting the sick during the midnight hour, I had my bow and arrow, and I could have shot you, and you would not have known where it came from; but I dared not, I could not.

"But what have I said that has brought all this about? It is sure not my face; you always saw my face, and knew that I was kind. What has brought this about?" The man replied, "You were kind to my wife." About two months before his wife had been ill, and the man had been absent, as the Bechuana men always are when their wives are poorly. The Queen sent her maid to conduct me to the house. I could not have visited her unless I had authority from the Queen. I administered medicine to the lady, and she was very soon restored. Kindness to this man's wife had melted his heart, and he was afterwards a steadfast admirer of every thing that had to do with the work of missions.

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

FAITH AND PATIENCE NEEDED.

EDITH TEMPLE was disappointed that her uncle had decided to keep his discovery of an antidote for serpents' bites a secret, and, at the risk of displeasing, could not forbear making another appeal to her uncle's feelings.

"Such a museum would, I do not doubt, be a benefit to many, and to raise it would afford you much pleasure," she said ; "but oh ! can the benefit be weighed against that of a cure like yours, or the pleasure be compared to the delight of saving the lives of thousands !"

"Don't meddle with matters which you don't understand," said Vernon, rising in some displeasure ; "you have nothing to do but to accept thankfully the phial which I have given you, and use the balsam when it is wanted. You will perhaps find some opportunity of testing its value, if any of the country folk here chance to to be bitten by a viper. But mind," added the philosopher, sternly, "I must have no womanish prattling and prating about my having discovered a secret. You are trusted, and must show yourself worthy of trust. I have myself taken every precaution to keep my knowledge to myself. I have procured my drugs from half-a-dozen different chemists, that not one of them may find a clue to the combination which I have made. I have set down nothing on paper ; I carry the recipe for the Antidote only within my own brain."

"But is it well that so precious a secret should be known but to one, that the knowledge of such a cure should depend on a single life ?" suggested Edith Temple.

"Mine is a very good life, I have never a day's sickness, there is no danger of the secret being lost," replied Vernon, quickly. He refused to harbor the idea of the possibility of the grand object of his life being defeated by his own sudden death. "Never fear, Edith Temple, I shall not die till I have procured my patent, won my fame, gained the prize for which I have toiled day and night, and seen my museum opened."

"And while he is waiting to secure all this," thought Edith with disappointemnt and regret, "more sufferers will die uncured, more wives will be made widows, more children orphans, in order that no one may share the credit of a noble discovery ! Oh ! that my uncle had the heart to give freely as he has freely received, that he would care more for the power of doing good, and less for the praise that doing it may bring !"

Edith saw that it was useless to speak such thoughts aloud. All that she at present could do was gratefully to accept the boon offered to herself—the little phial of precious balsam, which might be the means of saving a life.

With an expression of thanks Edith stretched out her hand to take up the phial of Balsam ; as she did so, Vernon saw the glittering diamond ring on her finger. He started at the sight of the starlike gem, a flush suffused his face, and the veins on his forehead swelled.

"Where did you get that ring ?" exclaimed the philosopher, rising hastily from his seat.

"It was my dear aunt's last gift to me," answered Edith Temple.

"When, where did my wife give it to you ?" The question was so abruptly and harshly asked, that the lady to whom it was addressed, felt hurt as well as surprised.

"You know that I was at Eureka House shortly before my dear aunt's fatal illness," Edith replied. "I was her guest when she was preparing to go to Hastings, and after then I never saw her again. My aunt gave this ring to me then." Edith spoke with emotion, but her agitation was less than that of her uncle.

"I wish your aunt had told me what she was going to do. I never guessed, I could not dream, that she would have given that ring away in her lifetime—an heirloom inherited from her grandmother !" cried Vernon, in a tone of extreme annoyance.

Edith drew the ring from her finger. "Take it then," she began, but her uncle gave her no time to finish the sentence.

"Keep it," he cried angrily, enforcing the command by a gesture of the hand "you cannot suppose that I want a trinket like that ; of what use would a woman's ring be to me ?" Then he muttered to himself, "She died in June—four, five, eight, ten—yes, it is almost, if not quite over now."

"What is over ?—what do you mean ? I hope that you did not suspect any one of having taken the ring ?" asked Edith, a painful suspicion flashing across her mind.

"I did not suppose that the ring had vanished into air, or that my wife had flung it into the sea," was the peevish reply. "But no matter, I never meant to be unjust to any being on earth. No one can accuse Oswald Vernon of being unjust. How was I to suppose that my wife would give away her diamond ring during her lifetime, —and without saying a word to her husband !"

Vernon abruptly quitted the room. Edith remained perplexed and somewhat disturbed. On the next occasion, when she met her uncle, and at other times besides, the lady tried to draw from him some reason for the vexation which he had shown, and the words which he had spoken in regard to the ring.

But Edith's endeavors were utterly fruitless. She was never able to draw more information on the subject from Mr. Vernon.

As the sight of the jewel was evidently a cause of annoyance to the philosopher, his niece locked it up again in her desk.

From the account which has been given of the arrival of Mrs. Cross at the farm-house, it may be guessed that the Hollands did not find the arrangement made with the widow quite as satisfactory as they had expected. Mrs. Cross was not accustomed to take a secondary position, and in her resolute way she let Effie see that she had no intention of taking it now.

Nor did the arrangement by which Mrs. Cross and her boy were boarded and lodged as part payment of rent, prove by any means as economical as the young couple had hoped that it would. One of Mrs. Cross' maxims seemed to be that it is wisdom to get as much out of everybody and every thing as we can : she had a natural taste for making bargains.

When Mrs. Cross had kept house for herself, she had prided herself on her economy, she had lived in a saving manner, she had kept a frugal table, and had seldom invited a friend to share a meal. But the case was quite altered now.

As Mrs. Cross knew that it would be all the same, as regarded expense to herself, whether she fared well or ill, she became dainty in her diet. Aunt and nephew must have every morning fresh-laid eggs for breakfast ; "That is the one thing which I fancy," remarked the lodger, by no means wishing to express, however, that her appetite confined itself to one egg.

Effie calculated what hundreds and hundreds of eggs would be consumed by her lodgers in the course of a year, those eggs from which she had reckoned on many a brood of downy chickens, and laughingly remarked to Robert that she felt as if a fox had stolen into her hen-roost.

The matter was beyond a jest when the young housekeeper found that pork was "the one meat" which her boarder refused to touch, and that twice-cooked food was "the one thing" which did not suit her constitution. When mutton and beef were to be constantly provided, a very considerable addition was made to household expenses.

It was, moreover, no unusual thing for some "old friend" to drop in to see Mrs. Cross, "happy to catch her just at dinner-time." The widow had never in her life appeared so hospitable as she did now, when it was all the same to her, though not to the Hollands, how many sat down to a meal.

Quietly, and as a matter of course, Mrs. Cross took possession of Effie's pretty little parlor. Not that the mistress of Salem was shut out of her only sitting-room, but Effie always found her boarder in it, comfortably settled on the one chair that was furnished with arms and a cushion. Mrs. Cross' work encumbered the table, Master Fred's playthings littered the floor.

Fred was rather an amusement to Robert, but a torment to Robert's wife. Mrs. Cross did not keep the child in good order, and would suffer no one else to do so.

It was Fred who left the print of his dirty shoes everywhere, even in Effie's own room. It was Fred who broke the china, upset the kettle worried the chickens, found his way to the store closet, and emptied the pots of jam. Effie had been very much mistaken when she had said that a child of four years' old would eat next t nothing. Fred had a famous appetite, and wasted as much as he ate.

But these were comparatively trifling worries and might well have been borne with good-humor, had Holland's success in farming equalle his expectations, but this was by no means th case. The young man had been so impatient t marry, that he had let his hopes bias his jud ment when he had made arrangements to take small farm.

Robert had thought that by hard labor might make up for want of capital, and that he once made a clear start, his spirit and streng would bear him successfully on to the goal success. But Robert soon found that he h been wrong in his calculations. Cross' farm h been managed on wasteful principles ; the la had been impoverished by attempts to get of it more than it fairly could yield,—a Robert reaped the results of the mismanagm of his predecessor.

The stock on the place was also inferior quality, as well as insufficient in quantity. of the horses was too old to be fit for any the lightest work, one of the cows died second month after she became the propert the Hollands. The ploughshare had to be s to the blacksmith, the harrow was falling pieces, the cattle-shed and the fences were te bly out of repair.

Poor Robert found each week that there fresh pulls on his light purse, and less likeli of its ever becoming a heavy one. He, who been so cheerful and so free from care w working for another, and receiving reg wages, now felt a burden of anxiety which o oppressed his spirits, and sometimes told o temper. Robert was like a strong man to single-handed in a heavy boat, to overtake l ly built boats provided with numerous ro He was losing ground, and he knew it ; h making desperate efforts to get on, but al against him.

Effie whom he had loved so dearly, Eff for whose sake alone Robert had brought on self all these cares, was no great help to her husband. She brought to him too many own petty troubles and complaints ; she wa like a restless passenger in the heavy boat, fidgety movements add to the difficulties the weary rower.

"Why need I be perpetually bothered by ing of Mrs. Cross' wants, or Fred's wor I've trouble enough to drive my team, w having to flip off every fly," thought the a young farmer.

What a support it would have been the weary spirit of Holland had he been able his cares on a Heavenly Friend ! It woul have been as if the tired oarsman had put up and found himself helped onwards by breezes from Heaven.

But Robert, though by no means ill-di nor wanting in respect for religion, kne very little of spiritual matters. He had had the advantages enjoyed by his wife, w had been brought up in a pious home, and tau by enlightened teachers. Effie just after h riage, had had almost unbounded influen over her husband, and had her own affectio been set upon things above, she might, h manly speaking, have drawn Robert to tread the narrow path that leadeth unto life.

But Effie, as we have seen, had put off taking lecided course of piety to a more convenient ason, and now she had not the inclination, she emed scarcely to have the right to remind her xious husband that all things work together good to them that love the Lord.

Neither Robert nor Effie had obeyed the com- nd, Love not the world, neither the things that in the world, and they who regard not the ecepts contained in the Bible, have no right to eer themselves with the promises which are to d's children so sweet.

One morning in June, as the Crosses and the llands were sitting at breakfast in the kitch- , the postman appeared at the little gate, at ich he so rarely stopped, that for the letter- rier to lift the latch was quite a little event. ie ran to the door, and brought in a letter, h a look of curiosity on her pleasant young e.

"Only fancy, Robert, the letter is for you!" exclaimed; "it is the first, I think, that you ve had by post since the days of your court- . I do not know this handwriting," she add- examining the envelope; "and the post-mark Guildford.'"

"Give it to me!" cried the farmer, hastily ing, and almost snatching the letter out of the nd of his wife.

"La! it must be something very particular," served Mrs. Cross, as she buttered her hot st, watching the face of Robert all the while.

"I did not know, dear, that you had any end or relation at Guildford," said Effie. bert continued to read to himself without ap- ring to listen to his wife's observation.

"Is it from your sister?" inquired Effie, slight- raising her tone.

"What does it matter to you who writes to ?" said Robert impatiently, crushing up the te and its envelope, and then thrusting them o his pocket.

"What does it matter!" repeated Effie, a lit- offended. "Every thing that concerns you ist concern me also."

Robert made no reply, but quitting the kitch- strode up the stairs that led to the upper oms, forgetting to finish his breakfast.

"There's a mystery there, certainly some stery," observed Mrs. Cross, very gravely, but the same time doing full justice to her hot ttered toast. "Fred, you little rogue, what you about? You must not drink out of the lk-jug!"

Effie and her lodger lingered long at the table, pecting that Robert would come down and ish his meal. Mrs. Cross, after breakfast was er, usually went to the parlor; but on the pres- occasion she chose rather to stay near Effie, arly that she might be on the watch for the mer, who could not leave the house without ssing across the kitchen. Her presence was some to the young wife.

"What can Farmer Holland be about? what earth can he be doing upstairs?" exclaimed s. Cross every two or three minutes, sharpen- the curiosity which was already but too keen the mind of her companion.

"Robert must be writing an answer to that ter," thought Effie. But she knew well that bert specially disliked writing, and that it s no easy work to the farmer, who could ugh a straight furrow, but could hardly pen a aight line. Effie herself had never received one letter from Robert, that dearly-prized e in which he had asked her to come back to hley and be his wife, and even that letter had tained several blunders in spelling. When- r a note had to be written, Robert had hith- o always made over that business to Effie.

It was natural, therefore, that Effie should sently follow her husband upstairs, and offer r services to Robert. She found him, as she had pected, engaged in writing, stooping his broad k over the table, where he was using the pen, , and paper which Effie always kept in her n room, now that Mrs. Cross so constantly cupied the parlor.

THE CHRISTIAN ARMOR.

S. S. Lesson for August 17th.—Eph. 6 : 10-24.

Golden Text, verse 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE Apostle Paul is summing up an epistle addressed "to the saints which are at Ephesus, and to the faithful in Christ Jesus" (chap. 1 : 1). He has taught them their position as chosen in Christ, "accepted in the Beloved," sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, quickened and raised up together with Christ, to "sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus," builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit (chap. 1 : 4. 6, 13; 2 : 8, 6, 22). He has prayed his wondrous prayer in chap. 3, the climax of which is "That ye might be filled with all the fulness of God." The whole of the fourth and fifth chapters and the first nine verses of the sixth are an exhortation, minute and detailed, to walk worthy of such a position, and such a vocation as God has given them.

And now he comes to the subject of Christian conflict, and his first words are a command,—"Be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might." "Ah!" says a timid, doubting believer, "that is just what I should like to feel." Perhaps when Peter saw the winds and the waves it was just what he wanted, to feel safe on the water. But faith relies on the Word of the living God when there is no feeling to sustain it. All that we are as Christians we are by faith; forgiveness, adoption, sanctification, power, all are obtained and all are held by faith in the pledged word of our faithful God.

Is God for you, anxious believer? Are you sure of it? Then let go anxiety and trust Him. Have those household concerns become His, because you have trusted them to Him? Then take the great relief of being entirely free of the burden, for He has become responsible; do all as for another who is chargeable. But I find the temptation to irritation so strong, you say. "Then," continues the Apostle, "put on the whole armor of God, that you may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil." He is not an open foe, but transforms himself into an angel of light, and we need to be filled with God within, and girt with God without, in order to meet his attacks. "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood," our equals in power and wisdom, "but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, and against spiritual wickedness (wicked spirits) in high (heavenly) places."

Now, every successful general must know his position and how the land lies, and must understand his own resources and those of the enemy. Blessed be God, our position is that of being "dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ" (Rom. 6 : 11); and while we hold this position by faith, we have nothing to do with the combat against sin. The warfare is against the person of the enemy. It is never said our blessed Lord fought against sin; but He did fight and vanquish the devil. Our position is in Him and not in ourselves. God saw us in Him on the cross, and He sees us in Him on His right hand. This oneness with a risen Christ, held by faith, is an impregnable fortress against the enemy; it is being "strong in the Lord." In this position we are to "stand," neither advancing nor retreating, but clad in all the armor of God.

"Having your loins girt about with truth." "Having." God girds us; we cannot gird ourselves. It was prophesied of Christ (Isa. 45 : 5), "and righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins." God girded His Son for the combat, and He girds us. Unless the flesh is bound and kept under by such a girdle, we cannot say with our beloved Lord, "The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in Me" (John 14 : 30). Truth with respect to God, to man, and to ourselves, and truth founded on the Word of God—this is our first and inmost defence. The breastplate which covers all that is within, and hinders its communications with all that is without—this is righteousness, His righteousness, who of God is made unto us wisdom and righteousness, etc.

The covering for the feet must be the received vocation as messengers of the Gospel of peace. "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace, etc." (Isa. 52 . 7 Rom. 10 : 15). A justification which produces no love to souls, no yearning of heart for the lost and perishing, is as dangerous to ourselves as it is heartless and selfish to others; it opens a way to the attacks of the enemy, who may easily suggest, How can you be sure that you believe that which you take no pains to announce to others? But as it is God who girds with truth and covers with His righteousness, so it is He who shoes the feet for their work of blessing. We are only responsible not to hinder Him.

But now we are called to appropriate ourselves the shield of faith, and to make good use of it against the fiery darts of the wicked one. Doubt, exaltation of ourselves, discouragement, indeed all by which Satan attracts our attention to ourselves instead of to the Lord, must be met with the shield of faith, i.e., what God has said against what we are feeling. While our position and our walk are to be by faith, we shall never feel right except in looking away from our feelings. You don't feel like a child of God, says the enemy. But God says, I am His child, is the answer of faith (John 1 : 12). I feel so afraid of sin, says the child of God. "How can we which are dead to sin live any longer therein?" says faith (Rom. 6 : 2). It is thus that our Master met the enemy, and it is only thus that we can overcome him.

There are two more pieces of the armor which we are to take: "The helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God:" one a covering for the head, that our thoughts may be girt about with God's thoughts, which are higher than ours; and the other the sword of the Spirit, the only offensive weapon, by which we may break into the camp of the enemy and recover the possessions lost to the Church, lost to ourselves, lost to others. "The Word of God is quick (living) and powerful." Let us believe it, and we shall expect more from it than we do. "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of Man, and they that hear shall live" (John 5 : 25), for his Word is "living."

But why is the sword wielded so often in vain? Why does the living Word fall powerless and lifeless, and leave the dead to their death-sleep? Is it not because the "praying always" is neglected. This is the very breath of life in the Christian soldier. If communication is not maintained with head-quarters nothing can go right. But it is praying always, with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, as in Jude 20, "praying in the Holy Ghost." This is not the unfinished prayer of mere desires and wishes. To pray in the Spirit is to claim from God in right of His pledged Word; it is a real transaction with Him, and when not in the act of petition, "yet watching thereto," the soul is open to any communication from Him; and "with all perseverance and supplication."

The apostle shows clearly this cannot be a selfish preoccupation. It is to be "for all saints." Here is the mighty privilege of love, to bear upon our hearts by a Christlike instinct all the children of God we meet, all we hear of; to live such a life of prayer that to meet a child of God is to pray for him, whether there is in him any thing that attracts us or not. With such a spirit and in such an atmosphere, harsh judgments, discussions, vainglory, etc., must die; the air of heaven is too pure for the existence of such rank weeds. "And for me," adds the Apostle, "that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly to make known the mystery of the Gospel, for which I am an ambassador in bonds, that therein I may speak boldly as I ought to speak." Thus would the old Apostle unite the intercession of his spiritual children in oneness with his work, and we see how really he leant upon the power of intercessory prayer.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

In England the Liberals are Preparing Actively for a general election, although there is great uncertainty as to whether it will take place this year or next. The current of popular feeling is rapidly undergoing a change adverse to Lord Beaconsfield's government. It is the opinion of many persons generally well informed on political subjects that at the next election a majority of Liberals will be elected, and Lord Beaconsfield's tenure of power be brought to a close. The change of feeling has been the result of financial pressure.

A belief was widely spread before the last election that England, under Mr. Gladstone's government, was averse to war, and would submit to any insult rather than draw the sword. That she would suffer ancient allies, and newer friends to be attacked and overcome without rendering them any assistance. In short, that she would give herself over to the pursuit of money-making, and minding her own business. Englishmen deplored the loss of prestige incidental to a policy of this character, and at the election placed in power a party who promised "a spirited foreign policy." Now that it has become difficult for business men to live, and every class of trade is suffering, the people are said to be desirous of trying the effect of a change of ministry.

It rests with Lord Beaconsfield, within a certain limit, to fix the day of appeal to the country, and it is thought that he will make it as late as possible.

At the Funeral of the Prince Imperial Queen Victoria put a wreath of gold laurel leaves on the Prince Imperial's coffin with a card attached on which she wrote: "Souvenir of lively affection, esteem, and deep regret on the part of Queen Victoria." The Princess of Wales wrote on the card accompanying her wreath of violets: "A token of affection and regard for him who lived the most spotless of lives and died a soldier's death, fighting for our cause in Zululand. From Albert Edward and Alexandra, July 12th, 1879."

The Sympathy of the Royal Family of England with the Empress Eugenie has caused some little resentment among the friends of the Republic in France. And M. Gambetta, by holding a fête on the day of the young Prince's funeral, somewhat ostentatiously displayed the Republican sentiment in regard to the Bonapartist pretensions. But Queen Victoria, as a gentle and kindly lady, sympathized with another lady in her trouble, and her position as a Queen was sunk in that of a woman who had herself known the bitterness of bereavement.

The monument to the memory of the young Prince Imperial will be placed in Westminster Abbey, near the spot where Cromwell's bones lay until they were disinterred and removed by his cowardly enemies.

The Bourbon Pretender to the French Throne has again emerged from his obscurity to air his pretensions. He magnanimously represents himself as willing to occupy the throne and "save France." The French people will probably feel that France needs no political saviours at present, and that if she should, she would prefer to select one of a different line from that whose misgovernment and oppressions led to the appalling massacres of the first revolution. The Count de Chambord, with his childish devotion to his white flag, and his antiquated notions of "the right divine of Kings to govern wrong," will probably be allowed to end his days peacefully at Frohsdorf, where his principles will do less harm than in Paris.

The Revolution in Hayti has Culminated in the abdication and flight of President Canal. Disorder commenced with a conflict between the Liberal and National parties which became so violent that during a sitting of the Chambers pistol shots were exchanged. During June 30 and July 1 rioting prevailed in the steets of Port-au-Prince. Barricades were erected and houses fortified. The Liberals killed the Minister of War, who was trying to disperse the mob.

On July 1, President Canal requested the British Consul to assemble his foreign colleagues, in order to confer with the rebels. The United States Minister and the French Chargé d'Affaires only complied with the request, the others pleading the risk to life from the bullets which were raining around. Therefore the representatives of England, France and the United States alone entered into conference with the rebels. President Canal offered the rebels full pardon and leave to embark unmolested for any port they desired. The rebels stoutly refused the conditions, and the fighting continued.

On July 2 the President again resorted to the services of the diplomatic body. This time the United States Minister refused to interfere. President Canal thereupon sent to the rebels a letter, which was torn to pieces. The fighting was kept up all day. On July 3 the patience of the President became exhausted, and he determined to act. Cannon were placed a quarter of a mile from the front of the houses occupied by the rebels. The first shell set fire to one of the houses, and immediately all were ablaze. The rebels scattered in every direction. The fire spread fearfully, sweeping away four blocks of buildings. The Finance Department, with all its documents, was destroyed.

On July 4 the Liberals had disappeared, and their principal leaders had taken refuge in the foreign Consulates. About 130 houses were in ashes, and 300 men were killed or wounded.

A brief telegram dated July 22d, to the Haytian minister at Washington, gives, as the final issue of the struggle President Canal has abdicated and fled to Jamaica.

European Potentates are Usually Considered enviable mortals, but lately the dangers by which they have been assailed show that their position has its drawbacks. Some excitement has been caused at Madrid by an old woman, supposed to be insane, flinging a heavy stone at the carriage containing the King of Spain, who was making his usual trip to the Chapel of the Atocha on Saturday evening, July 27th.

American Missionaries in Turkey.—The Correspondent of an English journal thus describes the work of our countrymen in Turkey: These missionaries, Protestants and Evangelists to a man, have labored in Turkey, without let or hindrance, for above forty years. They have stations, colleges, and schools all over Asia Minor, as well as European Turkey. They have been peaceful, industrious, and loyal; no friends to political intrigue against the Sultan, and therefore no tools of Russia, not patronized by the Czar, and therefore not suspected by the Porte. They have, however, done a large amount of good, in an unobtrusive way, as centres of civilizing and refining agencies which worked for the material as well as moral benefit of the people. Their labors throw light on the prospects of success for those reforms in Asia which English influence is bent upon accomplishing.

The Gospel in Southern France.—An Evangelical work is conducted at Marseilles, France, with success. A former café concert hall was recently opened for religious services in the presence of 750 attentive listeners. The work is liable to interruption by the feeble health of M. Saillens, the evangelist.

A Lady's Watch Given for a Church.—A new and beautiful Presbyterian church was lately opened at a cost of about $48,500 in Armagh, the primatial city of Ireland. The Rev. Dr. Donald Fraser, of London, preached on the occasion, and mentioned the following anecdote. After a sermon preached by him at the opening of a church elsewhere, a lady of fashionable position in society came to him. "Why should I have two watches while the house of God remains unpaid for?" He replied, "Really, I cannot tell why?" She then said, "Well, I will give the better watch of the two toward the cost of the church." She did so, and a jeweller paid 25*l.* ($122) for it, which was a sensible addition to the fund. Dr. Fraser added that at another collection, on the previous Sunday, a lady who had not a piece of gold, and who did not care to g silver, took the chain off her neck and put it the plate. She would loose nothing by th

REV. JAMES A. SPURGEON.

A Family of Ministers—A Gathering at the Orphanage — College Career — Settlements at Southampton and Bayswater—Becomes Assistant Pastor at the Tabernacle—Tribute from Mr. C. H. Spurgeon—Lord Shaftesbury's Estimate of the College--Extract from one of Mr. Spurgeon's Sermons.

IT is with no ordinary feelings of pleasure that the religious public of America read the announcement in the daily journals that "at last a Spurgeon is about to visit this country." Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's sermons have been widely read here, and the pleasure and profit derived from them have quickened the desire generally felt to listen to the voice of the great preacher. Though frequently invited to visit this country, Mr. Spurgeon has never been able to spare the time necessary for the excursion. Now, however, a relative worthily representing him in the person of his brother and assistant pastor is expected. There is no doubt he will receive a welcome which will in some measure express the high esteem in which the great preacher is held on this side the Atlantic. Under the circumstances some account of Rev. James Spurgeon's life will be read with interest.

James Archer Spurgeon is the younger brother of the celebrated pastor of the London Metropolitan Tabernacle, whose sermons are published from week to week in this journal. He has the honor of belonging to a family of preachers, and he, like his brother Charles, esteems this a higher honor than having been born a member of one of England's oldest and noblest families. His father was a preacher when both he and his brother, the present pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, were children, and now in his honored age, that father has the joy of seeing not only his children, but his grandchildren, preachers of the Gospel.

At a meeting of the collectors of the Stockwell Orphanage, in the spring of 1876, there was to have been a reunion of the Spurgeon family. Mr. James, unfortunately, was prevented by illness from attending; had he been present there would have been no less than four members of the same family there, all ministers.

From the brief report given of the gathering in the Sword and Trowel, it appears to have been "a very lively, loving, and enthusiastic meeting. Friends came up in good numbers, and brought in £200. ($970); the orphans sang like cherubs, and looked bright and cheerful as the morn. The Rev. John Spurgeon, C. H. Spurgeon, and Thomas Spurgeon—grandfather, father, and son—addressed the meeting, and the deepest possible interest was manifested. The grandsire spoke of twenty years ago, when, on the occasion of his jubilee, his son, C. H. Spurgeon, preached, and three generations were present; and he blessed God that as the older generation had gone a new one had arisen. We all joined in his gratitude, and the more so when the grandson proved by his cool, clear delivery, and lively, warm-hearted manner, that he would worthily sustain the family name."

AT COLLEGE,

Mr. James Archer Spurgeon was prepared for the work of the ministry by a course of study at Regent's Park College, London, under the principalship of the Rev. Dr. Angus, the well-known author of the Bible Hand-book.

He entered this college from Colchester in 1855, and he had the reputation of being a good student and an acceptable preacher. At, college his preaching engagements were so numerous that he had no time to devote to the course of study necessary to the taking a degree. This is a difficulty which all who have passed through a course of college training for the ministry, will be able to understand. A young man in an English college who has the gift of preaching is sought after by the churches, and he receives frequent applications to supply their pulpits. The time thus given to the preparation of sermons curtails that he devotes to classical and mathematical studies, so that his progress in those departments is retarded. He soon finds that if he desires to win distinction at the college examinations he must refuse many invitations to preach. Or accepting those invitations he must resign the literary distinctions he might win by a course of hard study. Mr. James Spurgeon choose the latter course.

He first settled at Southampton in 1861, and after a comparatively brief pastorate there came to London. A new chapel had been built by Sir Morton Peto in Cromwell Road, Bayswater, a fashionable suburb of London, and there Mr. James Spurgeon ministered until he was chosen to be

ASSISTANT PASTOR AT THE TABERNACLE,

"in consequence," to use the senior pastor's words, "of the vast work of the church and our own frequent infirmities." His union with his brother has been a very happy and successful one for both, and, to quote Mr. C. H. Spurgeon once more, "his invaluable aid has lightened my burdens, and conduced much to my peace of mind." In the course of time, having as co-pastor only half work at the Tabernacle, although that really meant more than the whole work of many laborious pastors, he devoted himself to the establishment of a Baptist congregation at Croydon, where he has now a large and handsome chapel and a church numbering about three hundred members, and he preaches there generally every Sunday.

At the Tabernacle the work of Mr. James A. Spurgeon has been that of preacher, College tutor, and pastor. In a paper, which appeared some time ago in his brother's well-known magazine, it is stated that once a month, or oftener when required, the junior pastor appoints a day to see all persons anxious to join the church who have been approved of by the elders. It falls to his lot also, to preach, to have a general oversight of the various societies, and to do his part in bearing the burden of work connected with the congregation, numbering not less than between 5000 and 6000 persons.

IN THE COLLEGE

his work has been most valuable, his educational qualifications having tended to raise the tone of the instruction given. A few years ago, in an account of the College given by Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, after stating that some of the most flourishing Baptist churches were at that hour presided over by pastors trained in the College, he added—

"I adore the goodness of God which sent me so dear and efficient a fellow helper as my brother in the flesh and in the Lord—James A. Spurgeon. His work has greatly relieved me of anxiety. As to the quality of the preachers whom we have been able to send forth, we need no more impartial witness than the good who expressed his opinion of the good results of the Pastor's College publicly, in Finsbury Chapel, in the following terms:

"'It is an utter fallacy to suppose that the people of England will ever be brought to a sense of order and discipline by the repetition of miserable services, by bits of wax candle, by rags of popery, and by gymnastics in the chancel. Nothing is adapted to meet the wants of the people but the Gospel message brought home to their hearts, and I know of none who have done better service in this evangelistic work than the pupils trained in Mr. Spurgeon's College. They have a singular faculty for addressing the population, and going to the very heart of the people.'"

The importance of the work done by means of the Pastors' College will in part appear if the fact is borne in mind that, during the last five years statistics show that the churches under the care of the young pastors who have been trained here have received a clear increase of

TEN THOUSAND MEMBERS.

The senior pastor has never ceased to offer thanksgiving for the blessing which has attended his work since its commencement in 1856.

"When it was commenced," Mr. Spurgeon says, "I had not even a remote idea of whereunto it would grow. There were springing up around me, as my own spiritual children, many earnest young men, who felt an irresistible impulse to preach the Gospel, and yet with half an eye it could be seen that their want of education would be a sad hindrance to them." This hindrance, however, has been effectually removed of late years, not only through the devoted labors of Mr. Rogers, but through those also of Mr. James Spurgeon.

AS A PREACHER,

although he has not attained the wide popularity of his elder brother, Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, yet his sermons are distinguished by great vigor and force, and are remarkable for the elegance of their diction. The following is an extract from a sermon on the text: "For by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified," and the sermon was entitled, "The Eternal Perfection of the Elect in Christ." The subjoined forms part of the introduction:

"It must be evident to the shallowest mind and to the least intelligent thinker, when he turns his eye on the world, and begins to survey the actions of his fellow men around him, and t weigh the circumstances that are presented t his view, that order has fled and anarchy is reign ing. He must begin at once to discover tha something is wrong. All things appear to b like Pharaoh's chariots in the Red Sea; the have lost their wheels, and drag heavily. Ever thing seems out of joint and disarranged. Surel some wire must be loose, some note must be s lent, for the choir of earth plays out of tun and, instead of sending forth exquisite tones music, its notes grate harshly upon the dulle ear. So much must be evident to any one wh looks abroad upon the earth.

BUT WHY IS THIS? HOW IS IT TO BE REMEDIE

Is it by something that the wisdom or the pow of man can supply? No. Philosophers hav searched in vain, and have died without acco plishing their task. Prophets of false religion teachers of erroneous doctrines, have started and said, 'I have found out the secret! I w undertake to supply that missing wheel whic when inserted, shall cause all the machinery life to proceed once more with regularity a precision.'

Men have listened to their words, and ha been deceived for a time by the bait; but af all they have found out that it was false, a would not do. Unto the present hour of t day the worldly wise, rejecting the doctri of the Cross, are striving to discover in scattered fragments of man's lost intell that missing screw that shall bind them and make the straggling and disjointed m assume somewhat of a compact form, and p sent a little of the appearance of order to vi They have sought, and they will seek in va until they turn to the Bible. It is there al that the mystery is solved. Man has fall and in tottering from his lofty throne he h broken the limbs of the universe, and disjoin every member of the world. The only rem is found in the salvation provided by Je Christ."

It remains to be added, that Mr. James Spurgeon married a daughter of General John Burgoyne, the celebrated officer in English Engineers.

That his labors in the Gospel may continu be greatly blessed will, we trust, be the praye all our readers.

Having come inside the ry, I found that they were making pins, and beautiful pins they were, quite a variety of . Well, I have sometimes thought that many of our churches there is written, "No ttance." There is a practical exclusiveness reat masses of the people, and they come the second door, and they see over that "No admittance." ay, let the doors of our churches be thrown , and all the people be invited in, and let us them the old Gospel of Jesus Christ—par- for sin, hope of eternal life, baptism of the Ghost: the old Gospel ring—every man un- ands it. Now, I imagine you are disposed k me what I have been asked a thousand s, I might say, in England, and what I will be asked about when I go home—"What is your impression of England?"

England and Scotland have already treated me so magnificently that I am in a mood to be pleased with everything. Shaking hands every day with thousands of people in halls and churches and at railway stations, till my right hand is disabled and fit only for a sling because of the stout grips, accompanied by the emphatic "God bless you!" I am swamped for the work of harsh criticism.

I tell you at the start, I like England, her landscapes, her cities, her government, her common people and her aristocracy. I here part for ever with all the cynical and saturnine of the earth. I don't want to live in the same street with them in heaven. They'll be always singing out of tune, searching for fractures in the amethyst and finding fault with the country. Give them a world to themselves, where they can have an eternity of pouting, a sky full of drizzle-drozzle, an owl in each tree to hoot away the hours, and a kennel of snarling rat terriers to nibble the robe of every angelic enthusiasm.

After eight days in the Gallia, that queen of Cunarders, we swung into the harbor at Queenstown. It is night, and rockets shot up from the stern of the ship invite the pilot boat and steam-tug to come out to meet us. The sea has its "back up," and the pilot boat makes a dash for our steamer and misses it, another dash and misses it again. Then we see the blue-and-red light tugboat coming out, as much as to say, "I will show you how to catch a steamer"; aims at it, but crosses in front of our prow; aims at it again, but falls behind the stern. We stand on the deck in the sopping rain to watch this aquatic game, until wearied we retire to our room for slumber.

As we fall asleep there is a sudden charge of stout men into our private apartment. What is the matter now? Have the old times of the pirates revived? Have they resuscitated their business, and are we to be seized and made to walk the plank? By the dim light from the hall I see three men by mistake putting out their hands towards the berth in which sleeps the better half of us. As I look down from the upper berth I hear loud voices saying, "Welcome to England!" By delegation, Leeds, London, and Dublin have looked in upon us. I respond in my shirt sleeves; but I am so surprised at the sudden incursion that the response is not worthy of the occasion, and amounts only to a sudden ejaculation, "Where did you come from?"

That scene was only a forerunner of

of this people of Great Britain towards strangers. Like Americans, they have been much misrepresented. They are warm-hearted and genial to the last degree. Their homes, their carriages, their hearts, are all wide open. We have not found what Americans sometimes call the "grouty" Englishman. His digestion is better than that of Americans, and hence he can afford to be better natured. If a man has to wrestle with a lamb chop three hours after swallowing it, his good humor is exhausted thereby. The contest in his body leaves him no strength to battle with the world. Foreign wars are not so destructive as internal rebellions. When things sour on a man's stomach they make him sour with all the world. Some of us need not a new heart according to the Gospel more than a new liver according to physiology.

I think this summer weather in England has been a sure test of the Englishman's disposition. We have been in England six weeks, and it has rained sometime every day; but this makes us appreciate the sun better when it does come out. The clouds, like a veil to a beautiful face, add to the attractiveness by only occasionally being withdrawn. When the sun in summer shines from morning till night with intense glare, we always feel that that is rather overdoing the business. There is nothing more exquisite than a cloud when it is richly edged and irradiated. A cloudless sky is a bare wall. A sky hung with clouds in all stages of illumination is a Louvre and a Luxembourg. Clouds are pictures drawn in water colors, but who knows but that Raphael and Rubens, gone up higher, may not sometimes come out and help in the coloring of the morning, with brush of sunbeam putting within sight of our eyes the castellated glories belonging to the other side of the border?

Now, if in the shadowed weather of this summer Englishmen can be so genial, I would like to know how they are in the usual summer. It is a delusion that Englishmen delight to grumble. As near as I can judge, each community appoints some one to do the grumbling for it, and he becomes the champion grumbler. One pulpit will do the grumbling for all the pulpits; one newspaper the grumbling for all the journalists; one prominent citizen the grumbling for all the citizens. Such a one becomes the pet grumbler of the community. All the scandalmongers carry him forage. They feed him with all the disagreeable things of the community. His capacity for offal is awful. They rub him down with the ragged edge of a slander. Job describes this wild ass of the wilderness as snuffing up the east wind. Like others of his kind, he eats thistles.

These limb crawlers of English communities do all that kind of work, leaving others nothing to do but to be agreeable. Delightful arrangement! Let it be transported to America, and have the fault-finding of the Church done by committee. Take the most powerful bear out of Wall Street, and let him do all the croaking for the brokers.

Take some ecclesiastic, who has swallowed his religion crosswise and got it stranglingly fast in his windpipe, to hunt down all the heresy, real or fancied. Get some one newspaper to do all the work of mauling reputations, exposing domestic infelicities, and reporting divorce cases. Let one female gadabout, gather in all the gossip, put it up in bottles properly labelled, and retail it from house to house—small phials for such as can stand only a little, or in larger bottles as it may be required. Let her be known as the championess of tittle-tattle.

Men and women might delegate to one or more the disagreeables of the world, and as at different times America and England have disputed with each other for supremacy with the bat and rifle, let the champion English growler go forth to dispute with the champion American growler for the belt of the world. Let the day chosen for the contest be a commingling of Scotch mist and English cloudiness and American drizzle. Let them go at each other with words of intense recrimination. Let all the fault-finders the world over watch the result. The Englishman might draw first blood, but the American will prove a full match for him at the last.

The struggle may be long and fearful, and the excitement surpass that of Creedmoor shooting and Ascot and Derby races; but I think neither will gain the victory. Indeed, I would like to see them both go down together, and both slain. Then would perish from the earth the bickerings, the suspicions, the snarlings, and the backbitings of the world. Bury the two champions in the same grave—their clubs with them, covering them up with a bag of nettles; read for funeral service the report of the stock market just after some great failure. Plant at the head of the grave a little night-shade, and at the foot a little nux vomica. For epitaph:—"Here lies Complaint and Hypercriticism; born in the year one; died in the year 1879. May the resurrection trumpet, that blows others up into the light, blow these troublers deeper into oblivion."

Speaking of the championship reminds me of the victory of our American Hanlan in the boat race at Newcastle. I respect mnscle. As the world improves, the world's arm will grow stronger. In the millennium what oars we will paddle, what crickets we will play, what wrestlers we will throw.

We are told that "in that day there will be bells on the horses," and that means music, innocent gayety, and sleigh rides, and swift teams, and liveliness, and good cheer, and tintinnabulations, when "righteousness shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea."

We want more Samsons, not to carry off gates, but to hang new ones; not to set foxes' tails on fire, but to put the torch to the world's shams; not to pull down pillars, but to build temples of righteousness; not to slay Philistines with the jawbone of an ass, but to kill the ass of the world's stupidity and inanition.

While the schools go on to build the head of the coming man, and the Church goes on to build his heart, let outdoor recreations go on to build his body. If that be the coming man, the sooner he comes the better.

My dear Christian friends, it pains me to say good-by, but that word always comes sooner or later in this world. But when Christian men and women part, it is with the feeling that they shall meet again in the better place and at a grander banquet, Christ the King presiding at it and all we kings and priests for ever and for ever. Oh, brethren, let us look forward with glad anticipation to our reunion in the better world!

What difference does it make in this world whether we walk or ride, live in palaces or in hovels, are applauded or hissed at, if, through the rich grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, we can come up at that glorious place, which this morning seems to beckon us to.

I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ, and in the communion of saints, one and all—one faith, one baptism, one God and Father, one Lord Jesus Christ, one cross, one doxology, one heaven.

In this dark world of sin and pain
We only meet to part again,
But when we reach the heavenly shore
We there shall meet to part no more;
And the hope that we shall see that day
Should chase our present griefs away.

THE BRIGHT SIDE OF THINGS.

From a Lecture Delivered by Dr. Talmage, at Nottingham, England, on June 18th, in the Audience of 3000 Persons.

Likeness of Englishmen and Americans—God's Creation Perfect—A Splendid World—A Happy Age—The Bright Side—Good Natured People—Disagreeable People—The Minister who never Laughed for Fifteen Years—Peroration.

If I followed the inclination of my own heart, instead of standing here I would just go all round and shake hands; but before I left you I would ask for the blessing of God to rest upon you and your children for ever. I am amazed, all the time, to find how much Englishmen and Americans are alike. We are all looking for a good time on either side of the water, and we wish you well, and you wish us well. And when, on the Sabbath day, in my own pulpit, in America, I pray for the President of the United States, I am very apt to add, "God save the Queen." Indeed, this is a very pleasant world to live in. I have always been glad that I got aboard this planet. The best color I can think of for the sky is blue, for the foliage is green, for the water is crystalline and flashing. The mountains are just high enough, the flowers sufficiently aromatic, the earth is just right for solidity and growth, the human face is admirably adapted for its work—sunshine in its smile, tempest in its frown. Two eyes, one more than is absolutely necessary, so that if one is put out we can still look on the sunrise to the faces of our friends. One nose, which is quite sufficient for those who walk among so many nuisances, being an organ of two stops, and adding dignity to the human face, whether it has the graceful arch of the Roman, or is turned up to the heavens with celestial aspirations in the shape of a pug—whether wavering up and down now as if it would aspire higher, and now descending, until it terminates in an unexpected direction, illustrating the proverb that "it is a long lane which has no turning."

Now, when standing before any specimens of sculpture, painting, or architecture, a dozen different men will have a dozen different sentiments and opinions. That is all right. We cannot all think alike. But where is the blasphemer of his God who would criticise the arch of the sky, or the crest of a wave, or the flock of snow-white fleecy clouds driven by the shepherd of the wind across the hilly pastures of the heavens, or the burning cities of the sunset, or the fern-like fancifulness of the frost on a window pane?

Why, my friends, for one single discord there are

A THOUSAND HARMONIES,

—whole acres of rolling meadow land to one place cleft by a grave-digger's spade—to one mile of rapids, where the river riots among the rocks, there are hundreds of miles of gentle flow, with the water lilies anchored there, the hills coming down to bathe their feet, with the stars laid to sleep in their reflection in its bosom, with the boatman's oar dropping upon it a rich necklace of diamonds. Oh, it is a splendid world! I think I hear many people denounce it, and not only the world itself, but also the age in which we live.

Now, I think it a good world to live in, and also a good time to live in it; and instead of denouncing the world and the age, you had better get down on your knees and thank God that you live in these times when truth is advancing and when error is failing. I had rather live ten years in these times than five hundred in the time of Methuselah. Is it not strange that in such a beautiful world there should be any disagreeable people? I am sure that none are here now—I cannot see one. Before I get through, I am going to show you the faces of people who make things disagreeable in the way of always seeing the dark side of things, and then we will come to those who adopt the most admirable of all the fine arts—the art of looking on the bright side of things.

When I say that there are no disagreeable people here, I feel certain that there are none. These husbands are all they should be, good-natured as a May morning. And when the good wife asks for a little spending money, the good man says, "All right, my dear; here's my pocket; take as much as you want, and come again soon." And these wives always greet their husbands with a smile, and say, "My dear, your slippers are ready; the muffins are warm; put your feet on this cushion. Bless the dear man!" And these brothers all prefer the companionship of their own sisters to that of any one else's sisters; they take them out almost every night to concerts. And I suppose that in no public building in England to-night is there a more affable and congenial collection of people than is now present here.

But lest we lose our present amiability, it will be well to look on the faces of those who always make themselves disagreeable, seeing but the dark side of things. In all this album of photographs I am going to show to you, there are those who make themselves disagreeable, chiefly, in seeing the dark side of things. There is no face more repulsive than that of the fault-finder. In the world there are a great many delightful people who are easily pleased, and I am surprised to find so many clever people who have a habit of finding out what is attractive.

They are like a bee, which, as soon as it leaves the hive, goes to a clover-top. They never go to a picture gallery but they find something to appreciate; they never go to a concert but there is one voice at least which they admire and marvel at. To them the spring is full of birds and bloom, and, like a priestess, stands swinging her censer of perfume before God's altar. And the summer is just as beautiful—they like to hear the mowing machines, and the thunder awakening the echoes of the mountains. And the autumn is their exultation, golden with fruit, and with the autumnal tints of the forest.

And they praise God for winter, that brings with it the shouting children, playing "blind man's buff" with a handkerchief that they can see through—winter, that frosts and sparkles turning the wood-shed into a royal powe covered with crown jewels—winter that sends the sleigh driving, with horse impatient of th twisted bit, with the reins round the hands o the driver until coming up to other parties, whe we crack the whip and say, "Go on, Charley," passing everything with the jingle-jingle of th sleigh bells, until at last the hostler grabs the bridle whilst you go in to warm and to take a glas of very weak lemonade.

Now, there are some people whom, if the were merchants, you would like for customers or, if you were a physician, you would like fo patients, though you would not often get then for they can generally cure themselves by a bo tle of laughter to be partaken of three or fo times a day, and well shaken up. In respect the contrast, I have no faith in the man wh never laughs. The best medicine a man ca take is healthful laughter—I mean laughter the right time. I had once a minister who cam to me, no doubt desirous to impress me wi his earnestness and devotion—he never laughe and he said that he had not laughed for ten fifteen years. He was the most solemn-looki man I ever saw. He borrowed of me twent five dollars, and out of pure delicacy of feeli he never referred to the subject again.

A man who comes to me with a long face do not impress me at all. If he comes into t house I tell the wife to lock up the spoons. respect of the contrast to the man whom I ha just now been describing, how repelling is t fault-finder. His wife never prepares a din that he likes. One day she prepares a dish th she thinks will be particularly pleasing. comes in at the front door and says, "Now wh have you got in the house? You know I ne did like codfish." Some evening, trying to especially gracious, he starts out for a place amusement. He scolds most of the way, c not afford the money, and does not believe t there will be much anyhow.

PERORATION.

The day speeds on when the most elabor e and stupendous achievements of man will e consumed. Down will come galleries of art d the thrones of royalty, and the hurricanes God's power will scatter the ashes of the wo l. Not one town left, not one city unconsumed, one scene of grandeur to relieve the scene of aster. Seas will be licked up, continents su hemispheres annihilated in the thunder d crash of that last conflagration; but from at ruin of the blazing earth we shall look up to the temple of liberty and justice rising from e ashes white and pure and grand, unscorched d unshaken, founded on eternal rock and asc ing into domes of infinitude. No flame of man origin shall darken its walls, no thunde internal wrath shall rock its foundations; d though earth shall pass away, truth and lib ty and justice shall never pass away.

An Old Apple Woman's Discomfort powerfully affected the compassion of the nent English Judge Talfourd. At one corn Russell Square, near his house, an old wo had for several years kept an apple-stall w he frequently made a small purchase. S ing at his parlor window one very wet day, fourd observed the poor old creature in usual place, and crouching down wet thr with the pelting rain. The sight aroused a his kind and pitying nature. He tried in va to pursue his literary or legal labors; agai and again he went to the window to see the distressing sight. At last he threw on coa and hat, rushed off into the rain, purchased an mous big umbrella, and brought it back t phantly and placed it over the old wo "Wasn't it a glorious thought?" he was to ask. "The thing actually covered he and her apple-stall too.'"

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

Thrilling Story by Henry Martin, the Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

nmy Mehaffy Explains his Foraging Expedi- ion—Micky Haley deals in "Duffers'—He re- oices to see tears flowing from Alick Gogharty's Eyes—Percival Confused by Jemmy's Confes- sions—Jemmy ordered to Leave the Room— Haley Watches the Lovers by the "Dodder"— He Meditates "Sweet" Revenge upon Percival.

JEMMY, having ensconced his goose in some nvenient hiding-place until he could find time carry out upon it his death-sentence, and hav- ig refreshed a little his outer and inner man. lstened to give attendance "on Mr. Percival d the gintlemin." Percival perceived two or ree times from Jemmy's manner that he had his mind some further communications to ake, and which were as burning for disclosure had been his explanations about the goose, d he asked him to deliver himself.

"Why, thin," said Jemmy, in a burst, "shure have seen Micky Haley, not a word o' lie in it. I was a-goin' on me business about the goose, d not far from where I parted from ye, Mr. rcival, yersel, I felt all on a suddint a smart p on the showldher. Turnin' round sharp, I es standin' near me, with a big paper o' books dher his arm, a dacent lookin' man with a iny hat on his head, and a black swalla-tailed at, no less, and long breeches—"

"Not all on his head, surely?" interrupted rcival.

"To be sure not," answered Jemmy. "Who id they war? Masther, dear, can't ye be quiet, d let me get on wid me story. 'What did ye hrike me fur?' siz I to him, lookin' fierce. Don't you know me?' siz he. 'No,' siz I; nor do I want to, nayther; assaultin' quiet peo- e, as you have done me,' siz I, 'on the open hreet.' 'Purshuin' to me,' siz he; 'but ye ave the same owld cross-grained timper as whin know'd ye in Portarlington. Shure, man ive,' siz he, 'I'm Micky Haley the piper. How Janie Quinn?' siz he. 'I make bowld to ask, r I'm towld for sartin',' siz he—which, as you now, Mr. Percival, wasn't far from the thruth,' lded Jemmy, with a smile—"'it's all settled at yer to be married on her some time after isther,' siz he. 'She's well, thank God,' siz I, when I last hard from her. But if yer Micky aley,' siz I, lookin' at him sharp to be sure, where's yer pipes?' 'Och,' siz he, 'at home fe and sound. I only fettle thim now,' siz he, as an ammytoor. I've guv up the purfession,' z he, 'and have becum bookseller and a lither- y charactur.' 'You don't say it?' siz I. 'I ,' siz he, 'and here's me stock-in-thrade,' intin' to the parcil undher his arm. 'All rst-rate, regular "Duffers,"' siz he, 'and I sell power o' thim, all over the counthry.'"

What Haley really called his books was first- te Duffys. "Duffy's Library of Ireland" was monthly issue of shilling volumes, published Gavin Duffy, at that time editor of the Nation ewspaper, and who afterward, in political dis- ust, left Ireland, and became Sir Charles Gavin uffy of Melbourne, Prime Minister of Victoria. he "Library" connected with his name, and hich Haley was busied in selling, was chiefly evoted to Irish history, and its intention was to lucate the people for a new political future. Educate that you may be free" was, indeed, e motto of the Young Ireland enthusiasts.

"'Will ye buy "a Duffer"?' siz Haley to me. No, thank ye,' siz I; 'I'm bent on purchasin' etter nourishment.' 'What's that?' siz he So I ups, sur, and towld him about the goose. I'll go with ye,' siz he, and, welcome or not, he ot out and walked beside me. "I didn't want is company at all at all," said Jemmy, "and oked sour at him, for he isn't anny manner o' anes wan o' me sort, and I never cud come to ike him, especially from what you'll know, Ir. Percival, of his owld dalin's in Portarling- on. But, me dear, it war no use to giv' him the cowld showldher—not a bit. He wuz detirmined to eschort me, whether I liked it or not; and now, whin I cum to think uv it, I've a noshun he had a saycrit purpose of his own fur it, for he begun talkin' about you, Mr. Percival, like mad, and began a-pickin' and a-pickin' o' me all to pieces."

"What did he say about me?" asked Percival. "Why, he asked me wasn't it thrue that you and Mr. Alick there—fornint me—war goin' to turn Catholic, for he seen you some time ago in —— Chapel hearin' Father Cahill pratche—God bless him. He said he was standin' quite nigh hand yees, and it sit his heart all in a flutther o' delight to see more nor wanst the big tears o' penitince—glory be to God!—cumin' loike rain into Mr. Alick's eyes at the remimbrance of his bein' a heretic, while Father Cahill—God save us!—was a-spakin'." (We know it was quite true that tears on that occasion glistened in Alick's eyes, but from a cause far different from that of Haley's surmise.) "And he towld me, moreover, Mr. Percival, that he has seen you, sur, often and often at the club meetin's in Capel Street whin Catholic pathriots war pladin' for their rights—more power to thim!—and talkin' up grand for the owld counthry, and that you cheered thim to the echo."

Percival's face flushed crimson at this intelligence about him before his friends through Haley. He had not been, as Haley said, "often and often" at the assemblies spoken of; he had been but twice, and on the latter occasion, sick of the violent language he heard, he left in disgust. These visits he had flattered himself were completely unknown, at least to his immediate associates, and he wished his casual attendance to be a profound secret; but there before Alick, and before these Portarlington friends especially, who were in spirit and fact red-hot Orangemen, the awkward fact, under the circumstances, was blabbed out by his own man Jemmy as reporter of Haley's conversation. Manifesting a good deal of confusion, which did not pass unnoticed by those at the table, he resolved to put a stop to further disclosures; so, to turn Jemmy on another tack, he asked him what things about him Haley had tried to pick from him.

This proved to be a rather imprudent piece of generalship, for it led Jemmy to trespass on somewhat delicate ground, since it came out that Haley had got from him the story of his love affair and courtship with Miss Lemaire. Percival's cheeks burned, while his friends mischievously smiled, as Jemmy, perfectly unconscious of the distasteful and unseasonable nature of his communications, gave, through repeating Haley's questions and his own answers, a full account of Percival's daily visits to Miss Lemaire, and of that lady's personal appearance and connections.

Several times Percival tried to stop the garrulous narrator; but Jemmy, in full swing, avoided every interruption. He would, since he had begun, have his tale brought to a fitting close, and this the more as he noticed the tremendous interest he was exciting. "He asked me, Mr. Percival," at last said Jemmy, "what day the weddin' was goin' to come off; but, as you know, sur, that I couldn't tell him." And then, dropping his voice to a coaxing key, he added, "I wished to me heart, Mr. Percival, you'd tell me, and at wanst, sur; and thin, you know, whin I next meet the piper, which may be sooner than I think, or, for the matther of that, care for, I can tell him." "Be off with you, you provoking fool," cried Percival, half in joke and half in annoyance, while his friends roared; "leave the room this instant." But repenting as he saw Jemmy's vexed and sorrowful face, he added, "I forgive you for your warm heart and love to me, Jemmy; but never again talk to that fellow Haley while you live; he is too deep a rogue for you, and something tells me he is a man that is dangerous."

If Percival could have known what took place some days after it would have confirmed him in his estimate of this man. There is a stream to the south of the City of Dublin, a tributary of the Liffey, which goes by the unpoetical name of the Dodder; but though this stream, having its source in the Wicklow Hills, has a name not attractive, its banks, covered in spring with wild flowers, and its graceful windings, rapids, and glens are in many places extremely beautiful. One portion of the river which has in special this character is that which lies east of Rathfarnham Bridge, itself a picturesque structure. On one hand are wooded heights and very precipitous banks, and on the other a level grassy plain, bordered on one side by noble trees and by the wall of what in the days before the Union was the splendid demesne of the Marquis of Ely.

This wall is pierced midway by a lofty and noble gateway, now partly covered with ivy. The road, which here runs along the south side of the river, being far from the general thoroughfare and untraversed by vehicles is a favorite walk with the residents of the district, especially of a moonlight night, and on such a night upon this road Percival and Lucy Lemaire were taking a lover's stroll on the occasion which now comes before us.

What their conversation was about we do not know—likely upon matters indifferent, as lovers' talk generally is—so, at least some persons say; but whether upon subjects shallow or deep, grave or gay, one thing is certain, that for these two persons it was fraught with the deepest interest. There was exquisite music in it for the ear of each from voices very sweet the one to the other; and we should hope too, and indeed believe, that words about Christ and His truth were not wanting from their secret communications; for it is a notable excellence of real Christianity, showing its origin from the great Father of mankind, that while false and superstitious systems of religion seek either to repress or degrade the natural affections, the religion of the Bible smiles its approval upon them, and sanctions and sanctifies all the relationships of human society.

The book of Genesis tells us of the love of Jacob and Rachel as well as of the creation, and the New Testament of the marriage in Cana as well as of the Crucifixion; and Percival and Lucy Lemaire, both of them Christians, were sure to feel there was nothing in their position as betrothed lovers to make heart or conscience shrink from introducing thought and speech about the Divine Master. Our reason, however, for mentioning this lover's walk is to call attention to a human figure leaning against the trunk of an over-hanging tree growing on the verge of the lofty river height opposite the massive arched gateway which has been just described. It is the figure of Micky Haley; his arms are clasped around the boll of the tree, holding on by it, his head is sloped one side to obtain a clear view, and his body is hidden, while he is earnestly gazing at the lady and gentleman—Lucy Lemaire and Percival—who, on the other side of the river, are at some distance from their watcher, yet are plainly visible to him in the clear, full moonlight.

"Aye, shure enough, there yees are, me two darlints," he soliloquized. "Jemmy Mehaffy spoke the truth when he said, 'Ye do be hereabouts'; and indade it isn't a bad place for coortin' nayther. Again," he added, with a grin, "it's a'moost as good, me fine gintleman, as the garden-gate o' yer mother's house in Portarlington, that not an age ago ye wanst had the bad luck to drive me from like a dog—and a bad-luck job it's Micky Haley's intintion to make that same to ye; for as shure as I'm a livin' man, wan o' these days, me fine fellow, I'll have fur it me sweet revinge. Ha, ha! ye wouldn't let me—purshuin' to ye—have five minnits soft talk wid Janie Quinn, a farmer's daughter, yet here ye're at it, me bouchal, be the hour, with the daughter no less of a Dublin Castle official, and you all the time a rebel. Have ye no shame or dacency in ye, to be coortin' a man's daughter that you and yer friend John Mitchell'll be the manes of cuttin' the throat of wan o' these days, and that, as I think, not very long distant nayther? I declare I've a mind o' puttin' at wanst a spoke in yer wheel, me man, and o' makin' Dublin too hot for ye, as ye did wanst upon a time, bad luck to ye, in Portarlington for Micky Haley, and, tit for tat, in the same way, too, by puttin' the peelers on yer thrack. But no; I'll not do it just yet. I'll see yer nose, me man, farther within the thrap afore I spring it. Too much haste, me gintleman, they say, is worse speed, and there's no use by too much presint bother o' makin' a toil of a pleasure."

HORNETS AND ANGELS.

A New Sermon by the Rev. Joseph Parker, D.D., of the City Temple, London.

"And I will send hornets before thee."—Exodus 23: 38.

"And I will send an angel before thee."—Exodus 33: 2.

God's Resources—God's Ministers, Visible and Invisible—The Hornet—Its Ministry of Punishment—Not to be Baffled—The Angels—Their Ministry of Kindness—A Flying Insect and a Flying Angel—No Barren Spaces in God's Universe—Lessons from the Hornet—Lessons from the Angel—"I Will Send"—Jonah's Gourd.

God brake the ships of Tarshish with an east wind, a puff of breath. He told the east wind to seize their masts and torment them to their destruction. Dagon was thrown down upon his face, though he was locked up with the ark, and no hand was near him; yea, he was utterly broken to pieces so that he was not a god at all. How was this? The chariots of God are twenty thousand. Can you remember twenty thousand names? Can you venture to say, "This is, and this is not, one of the twenty thousand?" It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

A great wind battered the Armada of Spain in a critical moment in English history. Thus God has more resources than those which are merely human. We gather ourselves together as if we were all His belongings, as if He depended upon us alone, and we talk and resolve and organize and go forth, as if the Lord had nothing else to depend upon. Mayhap that is partly right. A man may do more if he thinks that everything depends upon himself; but he should cheer himself, and bring great heartening into his soul, by remembering the number of God's chariots; they are twenty thousand. The stars in their courses fought against Sisera, and the stones of the field were covenanted to help those that feared the Lord. Nature helps, nature hinders, nature is God's other self, and His chariots are twenty thousand strong.

The Lord God is a sun and shield, He is a spear and buckler, He is a pavilion and a sanctuary. The lightnings gather themselves round Him, and say, "Here we are;" His ministers are the frog and the fly, the hornet and the locust, the fiery flying serpent and the hidden viper, the child, the angel; poverty and plenty are His servants; yea, all things praise the Lord by their sympathy and help, so much so that if we were to hold our tongues, the universe would not be silent. "I tell you that if these were to hold their peace, the very stones would cry out, for God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham." He shall never want a minister to stand before his face. If so be thou art a minister, boast not thyself of thy ministry, for a hornet may take thy place, a frog may dispossess thee, and there may be none to find out thy footsteps. Be thankful, hopeful, energetic, glad; but boast not, for boasting hastens death.

The one thought that is to inspire us is that God has many ways of helping His people, likely and unlikely, but they are ways of His own choosing, and therefore they will end in success. Hornets and angels,—Are not the ministers of God both visible and invisible? The flying hornet you can see, but who can trace the angel in the air?

CAN YOU SEE THE ANGEL?

He is there, notwithstanding your inability to descry him. You see the hornet. Ah! we are all quicker in seeing the hornet than in seeing the angel. Fie on us, shame on shame, till we be burnt with blushes. Can you see the angel? You cannot always tell what forces and ministries are fighting either for you or against you. We do not know the meaning of nature. She is a parable we have not fully read or understood, an eternal lesson, God's perpetual illustration of Himself. Oh that we had eyes to see and hearts to understand; for the library is always open, and the writing is always done by an angel's hand.

A man says, "A curse on this hornet, this winged, stinging insect, only a large bee, only an exaggerated wasp—a curse on the thing. I dare not open my window or it may fly in; I dare not go out, for it hovers near my door, and may smite me with its cruel sting. It never sleeps, it seems ever to fill the sultry air." He does not know what he is talking about: he thinks it is an insect; he says: "Why did God make such a creature"—ah, why? He calls it insect; when he has been longer at school he may call it minister of God and servant of the Most High. He is fretted by its unceasing and energetic buzz; by and by he will hear music in it, a sad and terrible music.

That hornet is sent of God to drive you out: it will not die; you have been doing wrong and it has come to punish you. That hornet is death, or loss, or pain, or bitterness of soul. That hornet is not a mere insect; it means judgment, penalty, retribution, death. I wish people would see the great meaning of things and not the little trifling suggestions.

I will tell you what to do with the hornet. Hear me—bad man, hear me: I have a gospel for thee. Outrun it: thou hast two legs, two leaden feet—outrun the hornet. "I cannot." Then that will not do. Close your hand upon it. "I dare not." No, you dare not. Then that will not do. Bribe it: coat your window-sill with sugar, inches thick, and it will glut itself to death. "Aye, I will try that."

Ah, it grows by what it feeds on. It is a stronger hornet for the sugar. It took your bribes and strengthened itself against you. I will tell you what to do: compromise with it, propose terms, negotiate, send a third party. "Oh bitter irony, Oh mocking man," say you?—yes, I mean to mock, for who can outrun the chariots of God? No, sir, no: stop, turn round, fall down, confess, pray, cry mightily to God to take the hornet back. That is the true Gospel: hear it and thou shalt live.

Then on the other hand there is a kind angel that can be nearly seen, and that can be almost heard, and that can be all but felt. Thank God for the things that are nearly, that are all but, that are just about to begin to be. Thank Heaven this verb of life is not all shut up in the indicative mood. Wondrous conjugation—indicative, potential, subjunctive, infinitive—how the verb grows; how the little "I am," a child's first mouthful, grows into the immeasurable eternity. Think of this kind angel, who is all but seen, who is so near as to be almost felt. You catch an aroma which he must have shaken from his wings. Bless God for these and touches and blessings as we go on. The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him. Are they not all ministering spirits sent forth to minister to them that shall be the heirs of salvation?

Then remember the hornet will fight for you as well as against you. If you are in the right way, the hornet is your friend. It will pursue your enemies, it will bring them to reflection, it will drive them to repentance, it will force them to prayer. That hornet never dies. My God, my Father, follow not my enemies with the hornet, if gentler means will bring them to their senses; but bring them to their senses, even if it take the hornet to do it.

Hornets and angels—are not the agencies of God both humble and illustrious? See the contrast, the flying insect and the flying angel, yet they are both the messengers of Heaven. Suppose them to meet one another in the summer air—what a talk they might have! Saith the hornet, "Why does He send me when He has servants like you who can do His work so much better than I, poor winged insect, charged indeed with a sting, can do?" Saith the angel, "Why am I not employed in studying the deeper problems of the universe, when little mean insects like this could go about the work of visitation and penalty and judgment?"

Then they catch the divinity of the purpose, they realize their election in God, and they say, "He doeth as it pleaseth Him in the armies of Heaven and among the children of men. There is no meanness in doing His work. His household is infinite and His servants are many—away, sting the enemy, bless the friend, let the decree of punishment be confirmed and let the gospel of benediction be proclaimed." So away they go, hornet and angel, to carry out the wil of just but clement Heaven. Beware: the angel of God and the hornets are both His servants.

Hornets and angels—are not God's agencie material and immaterial? Of matter and c spirit doth He not make His ministers? Th hornet is of the earth, the angel is of the skies the hornet is from below, the angel is fro above. There are no barren spaces in God's un verse. All that great sky, on which you hav never driven your small vehicles, beginning i your little baby's cart, and ending in your la hearse-ride to the gaping tomb—all that bl ground, what is it but an armory in which F stores His resources? All things are His: a things are mine if I be in Him: if I am in Chri all things are mine—death, life, angels, prin palities, powers, past, present, future—all, fo am Christ's and Christ is God's.

Oh hide thee in the broken Christ, shelt thee in His wounded side: don't be living thy little mean propositions and small theor and miserable dogmas and noisy controvers —hide thee in the ripped, bleeding, gory side the wounded Lamb of God.

For ever here my rest shall be,
Close to Thy bleeding side,
This all my hope and all my plea;
For me the Saviour died.

Then all things that fought for Him will fi for me, and if I do not fight, but stand still suffer, draw no sword for me: thinkest t not that I could pray to my Father, and would give me more than twelve legions angels to defend me wherein I am right, and hidden in His Son Jesus Christ?

Has there been

lately? I wonder what it meant. Why can't kill that hornet? It comes by every post. dare not open that letter—there is a horn it. It comes by many a telegram. You dare open the third telegram you get to-morr there is a hornet in it. When life is sharp into a pain, when loss swiftly succeeds loss, the rich showers fall everywhere except on garden, when every flower withers, when first-born sickens and the eyes are filled mist, when the strong hands temble— should bethink themselves: the hornet of Lord is then piercing the very air with its s puncturing our life and giving it great agor

Don't call it insect, call it God—don't c misfortune—let the atheist use up that inheritance; it is not misfortune, it is— idence. "Oh, the hornet stings me, frets plagues me, will not let me have a ho knows when I am going out, flies faster the lightning express, waits for me at th shore, goes with me over the sea"—Beast? God, law, righteousness, mercy, didst tho know it. It is sent to pain thee into pray thou hast sinned away thy visitation da now it is God's turn. Lord, teach us the ing of these hornets; they are hard to We dare hardly turn over any leaf for hornet should spring up and sting us: o is now one daily fear—teach us the mean this, and by prayer may we find the remec

Has there been an angel in your estate lately? ay it with shame that we are much quicker in ing the hornet than in seeing the angel : our is readier than our hymn, our fear is more phatic than our love. Is the angel in your ate? Do you say you do not know? Then ill find him for you. Be still awhile. Are children all well? "Yes." Flowers bud- ng, singing-birds returning, the rain over and ne? "Yes, but the garden is much less than sed to be."

A few flowers in the window? "Just a little x full, about eighteen inches long." Still, you ve them? "Yes." Bread enough? "Plenty." few friends? "Few, but good." The angel n your lot. Give these things their highest anings. There are plenty of people outside o would drag down life and make it smaller d smaller in its meanings. I would be sent of d to widen speech till it takes in all that it n of God's purpose and God's life. Poetry ll have faith : faith itself is the poetry of rea- n : carry it up to its highest uses, and make ur life as large and luminous as you can.

There are some people who are afraid of giv- too great meanings to the events of life. ere they get miserably wrong. When the ddy morning comes, do not be afraid to call the awakening angel. There be people near u who will call it fantasy ; those people are n, bony, shrivelled, desiccated, mean ; and en they tell you that this is fancy, and that poetry, they speak out of themselves : they ve no gospel to deliver. If thou dost meet a n on the high road who takes up a flower and ys, "Sir, this flower is a child of the sun," ke a friend of him rather than of the man who kes it up and says, "Ah, poor thing," and rows it over the fence.

When spring spreads her green carpet and kes the warm air live with wordless songs, do t be afraid to call it God's angel. There be tle, narrow, pence-table men who say, "It is ring, and there is rent day in spring, and there hope of good trade in spring, and spring is e of four seasons of the year, and spring be- ns on the sixth and ends on the twentieth, d spring . . . is nothing more."

"A primrose on the river's brim,
A yellow primrose is to him,
And it is nothing more," oth William Wordsworth in one of his poems. happily did he hit the fool who does not see e angel in the flower.

Get you books ; teachers, preachers who eaten things, who raise up children unto God t of the stones. The world needs such apos- s and interpreters, or we should get very low deed. The great expectation will bring the eat reality ; the great name will be as a bush th the great fact glowing in it like a revela- on. Look you for the angels, for the angels epare with all the generous hospitality of your ve, and the angels will come and make your use their sanctuary, and show you the eternal esence.

So God rules His world. "I will send hor- ts before thee, and they will drive out the ivite and all the nations that set themselves ainst thee. I will not send angels to fight the ivites : let the hornets do it. And I will send angel before thee, and he will find thee a rest- g-place, space for the sanctuary, and he will ve thee peace." Great God! rule us still ; are the hornets, we cannot bear them, but send e hornets if nothing else will bring us home.

"I will send," saith the first text ; "I will nd," saith the second. Then don't you be nding anything : sit still : I am afraid of your nding things. "I will send hornets,"—then on't you be sending your nasty, bitter, can- nkerous letters; keep your hands off post-cards; on't write anonymous slanders on sheets of aper you borrow from other people. "I will nd,"—then don't interfere with God's move- ents. He knows when to send, how to send, ow many to send, where to send—let Him do . "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but ather give place unto wrath, for it is written, 'Vengeance is mine, I will repay,' saith the Lord." No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper.

"I have seen the wicked in great power, spreading himself like a green bay-tree ; yet he passed away, and lo, he was not ; yea, I sought him, but he could not be found." I have seen the great gourd of the wicked arching over his blasphemous head—lo, in the morning it was not. Why? For and the worm cankered the root of the gourd and it withered away. Send angels if you can—live as if you would send ten thousand angels, sweet blessings, tender gospels, messages of the heart. You live in that direction, and some day God will pick you up in one of his chariots and drive you to the very camp of your enemies and show you unto them as their true friend. I will stand in God ; I will rest in God.

Let the hornet do its work ; let the angel fulfil his ministry. God's people cannot be permanently injured ; and as for God's Church, it shall be set up on foundations broad and immovable, and all its glowing pinnacles shall pierce the clouds, and God's will shall be done on earth as it is done in heaven.

EVANGELISTS.

The Need of the Church.

AT a meeting of the Union of Baptist Churches in London, the Rev. E. G. Gange of Bristol gave an earnest address on the value and need of evangelistic laborers in the present day. The following extract from his speech will be read with interest.

"IMITATE THE ST. BERNARD MONKS.

The traveller who crosses the Alps by the St. Bernard, Simplon, or Splugen Pass, finds situated near the summit a friendly hospice ; knocking timidly at the door, it is promptly opened by a good-natured monk, who bids him welcome ; warming his half-frozen limbs before the blazing fire, and chatting merrily with half-a-dozen priests, he thinks what easy lives these men lead. Suddenly the clouds gather, the wind howls, the blinding snow-flakes fall ; and starting up, calling their faithful dogs around them, these brave monks go forth in the teeth of the tempest. Why and where are they going? To seek and succor belated travellers who may be out in the storm. Why not wait till they come and knock at the door, as I did? Wait, man! Why, they would have to wait till doomsday. God help any poor creatures out on such a night! They must have lost their way. Half buried beneath the snow, they are beginning to sleep the sleep that knows no waking.

"So if the masses are to be aroused, the perishing rescued, we must do more than merely sit week by week in our comfortably-cushioned, brilliantly-lit, and cosily-warmed sanctuaries. We must do more than merely stand at the church doors, waiting to welcome those who, with timid faith and dawning love, desire to be admitted to our fellowship. There are many who will never knock at the door ; they are too far gone for that. They are sleeping, dying ; they need to be shaken and roused. And men are wanted who will trudge forth over snow and ice ; who, like the Master, will go out 'to seek and to save that which was lost.' With the hope of saving some of these we occasionally organize a series of 'special services,' or again send earnest and gifted brethren to conduct evangelistic services in towns and villages.

HARD-WORKED PASTORS.

"Our stated pastors cannot be expected to do this work thoroughly and efficiently. Their hands are already more than full of work. A pastor has to spend many hours every week reading, thinking, and preparing his sermons. Then he has many committees to attend and public meetings at which to deliver addresses, and each address involves anxious preparation. Then we often journey many miles from home to take part in recognition or anniversary services, and are back at our posts in the morning. Then there are inquirers to be directed, backsliders to be followed up and if possible reclaimed, the sick to be visited, the sorrowing to be comforted, the dying to be cheered, the dead to be buried, and ever and anon as a pleasant episode, but still as an awful destroyer of time, comes the marriage ceremony, with its concomitant, the wedding breakfast. For mercy's sake do not put an additional burden on the backs of men who are already staggering under their too heavy load! To many a hard-working pastor might be addressed the words of Paul to the jailer, 'Do thyself no harm.' Many beloved brethren have passed away who might, humanly speaking, have been with us now, their faces vanished, their voices hushed, all too soon, because they allowed a tender conscience and a loving heart to impel them on to tasks and toils altogether beyond their strength.

"I plead for the setting apart of brethren for special evangelistic work. They should be true-hearted men, whose hearts glow with the love of the Redeemer, and melt with compassion for dying men—brethren who in very deed 'travail in birth for souls'; whose constant prayer is, 'Give us children or we die'; who, having a tender heart, a fluent tongue, and unquestionable ability, shall be able to 'commend themselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God,' and to utter Divine truths so sweetly, simply, and earnestly, that 'the common people shall hear them gladly.' Men who are physically strong. If any man will have to 'endure hardness as a good soldier,' that man is your EVANGELIST.

"He will need a head as clear as a bell, a heart as sound as a rock, lungs like leather, nerves like wire, and a throat like a brass trumpet. He must be able to preach to a crowded assembly until he is wringing wet with perspiration, and then spring into a farmer's cart, and ride seven or eight miles through snow and frost to his destination without taking cold. He must be able to sleep soundly in a different bed every night, and will sometimes find his room dismal and his bed damp. He must be able to make himself perfectly at home in the cottages of the poor, and to subsist for a week at a stretch upon the homeliest and hardest fare.

"The evangelist's visit should be accompanied by operations such as those of Mr. Moody, who got Christian men and women of different denominations to meet together for prayer, map out the town into districts, arrange for house-to-house visitation, and thus prepare the way for his coming, and secure crowded assemblies from the first, and to go forth hand in hand, with tracts, bills of invitation, to pay visits to the dwellings of the poor and the godless. Curiosity is excited (and curiosity in the case of Zaccheus led to his salvation). Men will leave their places of business, tear themselves from the bosom of their families for an evening, to listen to the newly-arrived evangelists. And once the people are brought under the sound of the Word —once the impotent are brought in close proximity to the healing pool—'who can tell' but that 'Jesus of Nazareth will pass by,' and, passing, say to many a one, in words of melting mercy and matchless power, 'Rise, take up thy bed and walk.'"

Liquor Stores and Juvenile Depravity.—Michael Enright, a boy of eleven years, was arrested in Brooklyn on August 4th, for drunkenness. He was so intoxicated that he could not stand. An officer of the Thirteenth Precinct learned that young Enright bought three pints of beer at a saloon on Flushing Avenue. The boy's parents threaten to proceed against the saloon keeper.

The Value of Little Savings is Shown in the following statement: "A young gentleman of Brixton, England two years ago started a Sunday afternoon service for children, which is now attended by from 500 to 600 children. Within the last year he formed a "Waste Not Society" among them, the members of which collect waste paper, from the sale of which they have supported a little girl in the Orphanage.

CURRENT EVENTS

Mormon Immigration has Assumed Proportions so serious that Secretary Evarts has thought it his duty to address a letter to foreign governments calling their attention to the movement. Mr. Evarts thinks the governments should interfere to prevent their deluded subjects being conveyed to this country to violate our laws, and perpetuate a system of immorality. It is not easy to see how any system of checking the emigrants on their departure can be adopted, nor how a religious test could be applied. That the evil calls for strong measures of repression cannot be doubted, but these measures to be efficacious should be directed to an enlightenment of the people on the subject of Utah and its customs rather than an attempt to prevent the ignorant dupes emigrating after they have been convinced of prospective advantages.

I. M. Coyner, Principal of the Salt Lake Collegiate Institute, whose residence of some years in Utah has given him insight into this political and religious monstrosity says, "Mormonism as a system is utterly bad without a redeeming feature, and half of its villainies cannot be told. Only the day of judgment will reveal all its iniquity. The Mormon Church is one of the most complete organizations in the world, and cunning and sophistry are so blended with truth as easily to delude the ignorant. At each annual conference members are selected to go on a mission to the nations, and there are generally about three hundred of these men in the field, who collect converts in all parts and send them to Utah." That a system so vile and infamous should go on unchecked is a serious danger to the community.

The Marriage and Divorce Laws Have for a long time been felt to be a serious anomaly, and an effort is being made in the leading journals of the country to call public attention to the fact, and to make it a prominent question in the ensuing elections. At present the laws both of marriage and divorce differ in all the States, so that a ceremony which constitutes a legal marriage in one State is insufficient in another, although it is generally admitted that a marriage which is legal in the State wherein it was solemnized shall be held valid wherever the parties may subsequently reside. Even this admission does not hold good in cases of miscegenation, as the union of a colored with a white person is recognized in some States, while if they go to another State their marriage is regarded as a criminal act, and the parties are liable to a long term of imprisonment. The law of divorce is similarly variable, being in some States of a stringent character, while in others it is dangerously lax. It is proposed to introduce a law which shall be binding over the whole of the United States, and which shall not be passed unless it receives the assent of two thirds of the States.

The Yellow Fever has Been Officially De-clared epidemic by the sanitary authorities of Memphis. This was a matter of form, as all the cities on the river and rail lines have been maintaining a strict quarantine against the afflicted city for some time. There has been no decrease in the number of new cases reported daily, and it is thought that until the frost sets in the epidemic will continue. On Thursday August 14th, forty new cases and sixteen deaths were announced, that being the heaviest list as yet returned this year.

There appears to have been considerable neglect on the part of the sanitary authorities, who, after the terrible visitation of last year, might have been expected to give the city a thorough examination and purification. A terrible scene described by an eye-witness shows how little has been done in this direction. President A. D. Langstaff, of the Howard Association, stated that during all of his experience he had never witnessed such a fearful scene as one which he saw on August 15th, at the cottage of Charles S. Forbes, on the Hernando road. Mrs. Forbes and six children, whose ages range between seven and sixteen years, are sick—all in one room. Until mattresses were taken out to them they had nothing but a scanty bed of straw on which to rest their aching limbs. There is a small cellar, three feet deep, underneath the house, from which the stench was so great that the five nurses sent by the Howards could not remain inside the dwelling until it had been deluged with powerful disinfectants. Charles S. Forbes and his son William died of the fever on the 1st inst., and the remaining seven members of his family were stricken yesterday.

A Breakfast to Dr. Talmage.—The Young Men's Christian Association of Leeds, England, desiring to make some expression of the high esteem in which Dr. Talmage is held by them, and to show their gratitude to him for the pecuniary benefits derived from his visit, entertained him at a public breakfast on July 21st. The Association desire to move into a more commodious building, and the profit which has accrued from Dr. Talmage's lectures in England (about 6000 dollars) will be a material help to them in their effort.

Mr. Thorne, the Secretary of the Association, thanked Dr. Talmage on behalf of the members, and expressed their hearty good wishes for his health and prosperity.

The Rev. Mr. Walters said that Dr. Talmage occupied a most responsible position, and he should have a prominent place in their prayers. He spoke to hundreds and thousands by the reports of his sermons which appeared in the papers. Great gifts and powers had been entrusted to him, and he (the speaker) hoped that his life might long be spared. Some might hope to see him again, but others, like himself, who were far down the hill of life, were in the conditions of the elders at Ephesus, who, when bidding Paul farewell, "sorrowed most of all that they should see his face no more."

Dr. Talmage's address was specially reported for the CHRISTIAN HERALD, and will be found on another page.

Spurgeon Birthday Book.—Messrs. Passmore & Alabaster, who have published the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's works in London for the last twenty-five years, have just brought out a Birthday Book such as young ladies delight to get filled with the names of their friends. Its special feature is that, instead of mottoes from various sources, there is for every day of the year a well selected passage out of Mr. Spurgeon's writings. The book is magnificently bound in cloth, and will make as handsome a little gift as could be presented to a young friend. Many people prize the autographs of distinguished persons, which are usually difficult to get; so we are glad to see that every copy of this birthday book contains fac similes of the signatures of Mr. and Mrs. Spurgeon, just where they ought to appear, under their respective birthdays. In accordance with their wish to popularize Mr. Spurgeon's works in this country, the publishers have arranged to offer the book to the public at a price which makes it the cheapest gift-book we have seen. Particulars will be found in an advertisement on the back of this journal.

Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., whose Illness for many weeks caused serious anxiety to his congregation and his many friends of all denominations of Christians in New York, is now convalescent. His medical advisers, while speaking hopefully of his complete recovery, consider his condition one calling for great care. They have recommended entire change of scene and a sea voyage as means of giving needed tone to his system. Dr. Tyng has in consequence decided on visiting Europe. He sailed August 12th.

Helping the Poor to Help Themselves is the best form in which charity can be exercised. A scheme on this principle has just been organized in New York. It has been found that those families whose means are so straitened that they cannot purchase a whole ton of coal at one time pay for the small quantities they buy nearly treble the rate they could purchase it at in the larger quantities. To remedy this imposition, a gentleman of high commercial standing in the city purchased, in June last, a large quantity of coal at its lowest price, and proposes retailing it to the poor in the winter at cost price. In order also to encourage saving habits, he has printed notes of the value of five, ten, and twenty-five cents, which may be had at any time, and which can be exchanged as cash for their valu in coal when the time of need comes. He i thus conferring a double benefit on poor familie whose means have hitherto been heavily taxed.

The Tremont Temple Burned.—A Fire Broke out on Thursday, August 14th, in the rear portion of the roof of the Tremont Temple, Boston Mass. The flames had secured a firm hold of the building before the arrival of the Fire De partment, and before the engines had got fairl to work the roof was destroyed and a portion of the walls on the side and rear had fallen in almost completely destroying the building. The fine organ, near which the fire broke out, is destroyed, and the building is very thoroughly gutted. The loss on the Temple, which is owned by the American Baptist Society, is estimated at from $100,000 to $120,000. Several firemen were injured by falling walls, but none are thought to be dangerously hurt. The fire is believed to have originated from the combustion of gas. The building was insured to the amount of $100,000.

Death at a Camp Meeting.—A Report from inwood Md., where a camp meeting is in pro-ress, says a startling scene was enacted at the tar on July 31st. The members were holding e regular morning prayer and praise meeting, d Hanson Penn, of Winfield, Carroll County, ed seventy-one years, among others, gave in a ry warm and feeling Christian experience, and d just taken his seat when Elder Sigler arose d asked him if he did not now regret his not ving engaged sooner in the cause of the Lord, having been converted only six years ago, to ich he replied, with great emphasis and feel-g, "I do;" and as he uttered this last word he l over, but was caught by the brethren and rried to a tent close at hand, where he imme-ately expired.

A Mormon Missionary in Georgia has been urdered. A man known as Elder Standing, of e Mormon community, while on a mission at rnell's Station, Ga., was set upon by a mob o had a strong aversion to the propagation of ormon doctrines and practices in their midst. anding was informed that the men meant to e him a beating, when he attempted to defend nself with a pistol. The sight of the pistol oused the anger of the mob, and the man fell erally riddled with bullets. Governor Colquitt, ough holding the Mormon doctrines in abhor-ice, is resolved that this outrage on the law ll not go unpunished.

he Education of the Indian has been De-onstrated as possible repeatedly, and another oof has just been recorded. A young Creek lian, who is being educated at the University Wooster, Ohio, took the first Latin prize, a d medal, for best scholarship during senior paratory year, and for best examination for rance to Freshman class at the late com-ncement. There were nearly sixty students the class.

Bad Eminence.—Some Men are Famous one thing, some for another. It is peculiarly to have the reputation of being distinguish- for pre-eminence in the art of wasting time. is said that the laziest man in the United tes is a ship carpenter in Belfast, Me., who determined to spend the rest of his days in omfortable chair. When wages were reduced, declined to work any longer, and seated him- in a rocking-chair near his sitting-room win-v. There he remains all day long, only ris- to go to his meals ort o bed. His chair-kers have worn grooves in the floor, and on window-sill, where he drums idly as he rocks nd fro, are the imprints of his fingers. He a wife, and the couple are supposed to have e savings on which they live.

Reproof by George Washington.—Of Gen-ral Washington's dislike for profanity a pic-esque story is related. In the summer of 1781 an who was ploughing in a field near a Fish- road became very impatient with some diffi-y in his work, and began to pour forth violent hs. Just then three horsemen in military un-ss, who were riding by, paused, and one of n asking for information concerning the road, nked the ploughman for his answer, and ed: "My friend, I am older than you, have y times been placed in positions of difficulty danger, and have had many things to per- and annoy me, but I have always found it did no good to get angry; and that neither ken ploughs nor anything else can be mended made better by the use of profane language." with a bow he rode on. It was General shington.

Bishop and the English Navvies.—The op of Peterborough has been presented by a ber of navvies employed on the Kettering Merton Railway with a Bible, in recognition he interest he has taken in mission work ng the navvies. In thanking them for the his Lordship expresses his sense of the claims have on the sympathy of those to whose enience they so minister; and in concluding etter he says: "I shall never hear or read ission work amongst navvies without its re-ng to me the pleasant hours that you and I have shared together, or without its prompting me to pray for God's blessing and guidance on those engaged in that work, and on the souls whom they may bring to the love of our Lord and Saviour.'

Important Jewish Movement.—For Months past the colony of Jews settled at Hamadan, in Persia, has been agitated by the question, "Is not Jesus the Messiah?" Four of the chief men, the heads of one thousand houses (about five thousand people), have, after long trial, been publicly baptized, and many others are asking to confess Christ. As in the days of the apostles, all the city is moved, and one Nestorian helper is day and night beset with Jews seeking instruction in the New Testament. This is one of the oldest colonies of the Jews in the world, where their ancestors were carried captive by the Assyrian King 2500 years ago.

The Uprightness of the Christian was Strikingly exemplified in an incident recently brought to light in the career of Lord Lawrence, whose portrait and life appeared in the CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 10th. During the conduct of a cause by Lord Lawrence for a young Indian Rajah, the latter endeavored to place in his hands under the table a bag of rupees. He answered at once, "Young man, you have offered to an Englishman the greatest insult he could possibly receive. This time, in consideration of your youth, I excuse it. Let me warn you, however, never again to commit so gross an offence against an English gentleman."

A Sunday-School Teacher Drowned.—A Sunday-school excursion from Westfield, N. J., to Ocean Grove, met with a sad termination to its holiday pleasure July 31. Rollin B. Pearsall, aged eighteen, one of the brightest and most active young men in the party, was drowned. About 11 o'clock he and several of his companions joined the crowd of bathers in the surf. He was a bold swimmer, and although the surf was heavy, struck out for the deep water, and went forty feet beyond the ropes. A cry was heard by those nearest him, and he was observed to sink. Assistance was promptly rendered, but before he could be brought ashore life was extinct.

The Gospel in France Appears, from Recent reports, to be making extraordinary progress. Five of the nine Secretaries of State are Protestant, among them the President of the Council and the Minister of Justice. Not only is there entire religious freedom in every one of the 36,000 municipalities of the country, but crowds are drawn together in many places to hear the preaching of the Gospel, and those who have been familiar with the country for many years say they do not remember a time when France has been freeing herself more resolutely from the bonds of Popery.

The Negro Exodus Seems Likely to Continue. It is said in one district of Alabama not less than 15,000 are preparing to leave. The same rate from other districts would take 100,000 from Alabama alone. A colored member of Congress from that State says: "his people are infatuated with the idea of going North this fall, and no earthly power can prevent them. No matter if they have to walk and beg bread, they are going. It is as useless to argue with them about it as to debate with the east wind." Committees are now in Kansas looking for a location for one or two thousand families, and other committees will probably go to southern Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio for the same purpose.

The Grace Darling of the Shetland Isles, off the coast of Scotland, died recently. She held the medal of the Royal Institution for her daring rescue of two drowning fishermen in 1856. During a great gale a homeward-bound fishing smack was capsized in sight of shore, and two of the crew were drowned; the other two, clinging to the overturned boat, were drifting out with the tide, when she and her sister-in-law, with her father (a one-armed man of seventy years) steering, put off in a small punt and effected the rescue which none on shore would venture to attempt.

THE SHAME AND SPITTING.

A New Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair: I hid not my face from shame and spitting."—ISAIAH 50: 6.

Of whom the Prophet Spoke—The Scourging and the Shame—Behold your King—I. As the Representative of God—He had all Divine Power—How Exhibited—In Beneficence not in Judgment—His ear ever near the Mouth of God—His Errand all Gentleness—How He is Rejected—II. As the Substitute for His People—Sin the most Shameful Thing—III. As the Servant of God—A Servant Personally Prepared—He had no Reserve—Even His Reputation given up—No Flinching in Him—The Confidence and Quiet of His Spirit—IV. As the Comforter of His People—Well Qualified forthe Office—His Lowliness and His Sympathy—His Example—His Triumph a Stimulus and Encouragement.

OF whom speaketh the prophet this? Of himself or of some other? We cannot doubt but what Isaiah here wrote concerning the Lord Jesus Christ. Is not this one of the prophecies to which our Lord Himself referred in the incident recorded in the eighteenth chapter of Luke's gospel, at the thirty-first verse? "Then he took unto him the twelve, and said unto them, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man shall be accomplished. For he shall be delivered unto the Gentiles, and shall be mocked, and spitefully entreated, and spitted on: and they shall scourge him, and put him to death." Such a remarkable prophecy of scourging and spitting as this which is now before us must surely refer to the Lord Jesus; its highest fulfilment is assuredly found in Him alone.

I have already laid before you in the reading of the Scriptures some of the passages of the New Testament wherein and the shame of our Lord Jesus are described. We saw Him first at the tribunal of His own countrymen in Matthew 26, and we read, "Then did they spit in his face, and buffeted him; and others smote him with the palms of their hands." It was in the hall of the high priest, among His own countrymen, that first of all the shameful deeds of scorn were wrought upon Him. "He came unto his own, and his own received him not." His worst foes were they of His own household; they despised and abhorred Him, and would have none of Him. His own Father's husbandmen said among themselves: "This is the heir; let us kill him, and let us seize on his inheritance." This was His treatment at the hand of the house of Israel.

The same treatment, or the like thereto, was accorded Him in Herod's palace, where the lingering shade of a Jewish royalty still existed. There what I might venture to call a pattern mixture of Jew and Gentile power held court, but our Lord fared no better in the united company. By the two combined the Lord was treated with equal derision (Luke 23: 11). "Herod with his men of war set him at nought, and mocked him, and arrayed him in a gorgeous robe."

Speedily came His third trial, and He was delivered altogether to the Gentiles. Then Pilate, the governor, gave Him up to the cruel process of scourging. I have heard that the Roman scourge was made of the inews of oxen, and that in it were twisted the hucklebones of sheep, with slivers of bone, in order that every stroke might more effectually tear its way into the poor quivering flesh, which was mangled by its awful strokes. Scourging was such a punishment that it was generally regarded as worse than death itself, and indeed, many perished while enduring it, or soon afterward. Our blessed Redeemer gave His back to the smiters, and the ploughers made deep furrows there. Oh, spectacle of misery How can we bear to look thereon?

Nor was that all, for Pilate's soldiers, calling all the band together, as if there were not enough for mockery unless all were mustered, put Him to derision by a mock enthronement and a mimic coronation; and when they had thus done they again buffeted and smote him, and spat in His face. There was no kind of cruelty which their heartlessness could just then invent which they did not exercise upon His blessed person: their brutal sport had full indulgence, for their innocent victim offered neither resistance nor remonstrance. This is His own record of His patient endurance, "I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair: I hid not my face from shame and spitting."

Behold your King! I bring Him forth to you this morning in spirit and cry, "Behold the Man!"

May the Holy Spirit help you to see Jesus in four lights at this time. In each view He is worthy of devout attention. Let us view Him first as the representative of God; secondly, as the substitute of His people; thirdly, as the servant of Jehovah; and fourthly, as the Comforter of His redeemed.

I. First, I invite you to gaze upon your despised and rejected Lord as

THE REPRESENTATIVE OF GOD.

In the person of Christ Jesus, God Himself came into the world, making a special visitation to Jerusalem and the Jewish people, but at the same time coming very near to all mankind. The Lord called to the people whom He had favored so long and whom He was intent to favor still. He says, in the second verse, "I came," and "I called." God did in very deed come down into the midst of mankind.

Be it noted, that when our Lord came into this world as the representative of God, He came with all His divine power about Him. The chapter before us says, "Is my hand shortened at all, that it cannot redeem? or have I no power to deliver? behold, at my rebuke I dry up the sea, I make the rivers a wilderness." The Son of God, when He was here, did not perform those exact miracles, because He was bent upon marvels of beneficence rather than of judgment.

He did not repeat the plagues of Egypt, for He did not come to smite, but to save; but He did greater wonders and wrought miracles which ought far more powerfully to have won men's confidence in Him because they were full of goodness and mercy. He fed the hungry, He healed the sick, He raised the dead, and He cast out devils. He did equal marvels to those which were wrought in Egypt when the arm of the Lord was made bare in the eyes of all the people. It is true He did not change water into blood, but He turned water into wine. It is true He did not make their fish to stink, but by His word He caused the net to be filled, even to bursting, with great fishes. He did not break the whole staff of bread as He did in Egypt, but He multiplied loaves and fishes, so that thousands of men and women and children were fed from His bounteous hand. He did not slay their first-born, but He restored the dead.

I grant you that the glory of the Godhead was somewhat hidden in the person of Jesus of Nazareth, but it was still there, even as the glory was upon the face of Moses when he covered it with a veil. No essential attribute of God was absent in Christ, and every one might have been seen in Him if the people had not been wilfully blind. He did the works of His Father, and those works bare witness of Him that He was come in His Father's name. Yes, God was personally in the world when Jesus walked the blessed fields of the Holy Land, now, alas, laid under the curse for rejecting Him.

But when God thus came among men He was unacknowledged. What saith the prophet? "Wherefore when I came was there no man? when I called there was none to answer?" A few, taught by the Spirit of God, discerned Him and rejoiced; but they were so very few that we may say of the whole generation that they knew Him not. Those who had some dim idea of His excellence and majesty yet rejected Him. Herod, because he feared that He was a king, sought to slay Him. The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers took counsel together, against the Lord, and against His anointed. He was emphatically, and beyond all others, "despised and rejected of men."

Yet our Lord, when He came into the world, was admirably adapted to be the representative of God, not only because he was God himself, but because as man His whole human nature was consecrated to the work, and in Him was neither flaw nor spot. He was untouched by any motive other than the one desire of manifesting the Father and blessing the sons of men. Oh, beloved, there was never one who had His ear so near the mouth of God as Jesus had. His Father had no need to speak to Him in dreams and visions of the night, for when all His faculties were wide awake there was nothing in them to hinder His understanding the mind of God; and therefore every morning when His Father wakened Him He spake into His ear.

Jesus sat as a scholar at the Father's feet that He might learn first, and then teach. The things which He heard of the Father He made known unto men. He says that He spake not His own words but the words of Him that sent Him, and He did not His own deeds, but "my Father," saith He, "that dwelleth in me, he doeth the work." Now, a man thus entirely agreeable to the mind and will of the great God was fitted to be the representative of God.

too, was all gentleness and love, for He came to speak words in season to the weary, and to comfort those that were cast down: surely such an errand should have secured Him a welcome. His course and conduct were most conciliatory, for He went among the people, and ate with publicans and sinners; so gentle was He that He took little children into His arms, and blessed them; for this, if for nothing else, they ought to have welcomed Him right heartily and rejoiced at the sight of Him.

Our text tells us how contrary was their conduct toward Him to that which He deserved: instead of being welcomed He was scourged, and instead of being honored He was scorned. Cruelty smote His back and plucked off the hair from His face, while derision jeered at Him and cast its spittle upon Him. Shame and contempt were poured upon Him, though He was God Himself. The spectacle of Christ spat upon, and scourged, represents what man virtually does to His God, what he would do to the Most High if he could. When a man will have his pleasure, even though it displeases God, he as good as declares that he despises God, prefers himself, and defies the wrath of the Most High.

When a man acts contrary to the command of God he does as good as say to God, "This is better for me to do than what Thou bidst me do. Either Thou art mistaken, in Thy prohibitions, or else Thou dost wilfully deny me the highest pleasure, and I, being a better judge of my own interests than Thou art, snatch at the pleasure which Thou dost refuse me. I judge Thee either to be unwise or unkind." Every act of sin does despite to the sovereignty of God: it denies Him to be supreme, and refuses Him obedience. Every act of sin does dishonor to the love and wisdom of God, for it seems to say that it would have been greater love to have permitted us to do evil, than to have commanded us to abstain from it. All sin is in many ways an insult to the majesty of the thrice Holy God, and He regards it as such.

Dear friends, this is especially the sin of those who have heard the gospel and yet reject the Saviour, for in their case the Lord has come to them in the most gracious form, and yet they have refused Him. The Lord might well say, "I have come to you to save you, and you will not regard Me. I have come saying to you, 'Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth,' and you close your eyes in unbelief. I have come saying, 'Let us reason together: though your sins be as crimson they shall be as wool,' but you will not be cleansed from your iniquity. I have come with the promise, 'All manner of sin and iniquity shall be forgiven unto men.' What is your reply?" In the case of many the answer is, "We prefer our own righteousness to the righteousness of God." If that is not casting spittle into the face of God I know not what is, for our righteousnesses are well described as "filthy rags," and we have the impudence to say that these are better than the righteousness of God in Christ Jesus.

Woe's me that it should ever be so. My God my God! To what a sinful race do I belong Alas, that it should treat Thine infinite goodnes so despitefully! That Thou shouldst be rejecte at all, but especially that Thou shouldst b rejected when dressed in robes of love and a rayed in gentleness and pity is horrible to thin upon. Do you mean it, O men! Can you rea ly mean it? Can you deride the Lord Jesus wh died for men? For which of His works do y stone Him, when He lived only to do good For which of His griefs do you refuse Hir when He died only that He might save?" "H saved others—Himself He cannot save," for H had so much love that He could not spare Hir self.

I can understand your resisting the thund of Jehovah's power, for I know your insanit but can you resist the tenderness of Jehoval love? If you do I must charge you with brut ity, but therein I wrong the brutes, to wh such crimes are impossible. I may not even c this cruel scorning diabolical, for it is a which devils never did commit, perhaps wo not have committed had it been possible them. They have never trifled with a Redee er, nor rejected the blood of atonement, for Lord took not up the fallen angels, but He t up the seed of Abraham. Shall the favo race spit upon its friend? God grant that may be brought to a better mind. But ther the picture before you. God Himself set t nought, despised, rejected, put to shame, petually dishonored in the person of His Son. The sight should breed repentance in We should look to Him whom we have scour and mourn for Him. O Holy Spirit! work tender grace in all our hearts.

II. And now, secondly, I want to set Lord Jesus before you in another light, or ra beseech Him to shine in His own light b your eyes—as

THE SUBSTITUTE FOR HIS PEOPLE.

Recollect that when our Lord Jesus C suffered thus it was not on His own acc nor purely for the sake of His Father, bu "was wounded for our transgressions, H bruised for our iniquities: the chastiseme our peace was upon him; and with his st we are healed."

There has risen up a modern idea which not too much reprobate, that Christ ma atonement for our sin except upon the whereas in this passage of Isaiah we are t as plainly as possible that by His bruisin His stripes, as well as by His death, w healed. Never divide between the life and of Christ. How could He have died if H not lived? How could He suffer except wh lived? Death is not suffering, but the enc

Guard also against the evil notion th have nothing to do with the righteous Christ, for He could not have made an ment by His blood if He had not been in His life. He could not have been acc if He had not first been proven to be harmless, and undefiled. The victim m spotless, or it cannot be presented for sa Draw no nice lines and raise no quibblin tions, but look at your Lord as He is a before Him.

Understand, my dear brothers and siste Jesus took upon Himself our sin, and found bearing that sin He had to be tre sin should be treated. Now, of all the that ever existed, sin is the most shamefu that can be. It deserves to be scourge serves to be spit upon, it deserves to b fied; and because our Lord had take Himself our sin, therefore must He be shame, therefore must He be scourged.

If you want to see what God thinks of sin, see is only Son spat upon by the soldiers when e was made sin for us. In God's sight sin is shameful, horrible, loathsome, abominable ning, and when Jesus takes it He must be for- aken and given up to scorn. This sight will be he more wonderful to you when you recollect ho it was that was spat upon, for if you and I, eing sinners, were scourged, and smitten, and espised, there would be no wonder in it; but e who took our sin was God, before whom ngels bow with reverent awe, and yet, seeing he sin was upon Him, He was made subject to he most intense degree of shame.

III. But time fails us, and therefore we will ention, next, the third light in which it is our esire to see the Saviour. Beloved, we desire o see the Lord Jesus Christ as

THE SERVANT OF GOD.

He took upon Himself the form of a servant hen He was made in the likeness of man. Ob- erve how He performed this service right horoughly, and remember we are to look upon his third picture as our copy, which is to be the uide of our life. I know that many of you are lad to call yourselves the servants of God; ke not the name in vain. As Jesus was, so re you also in this world, and you are to seek be like Him.

First, as a servant, Christ was personally pre- ired for service. He was thirty years and ore here below, learning obedience in His ather's house, and the after years were spent in arning obedience by the things which He iffered. What a servant He was! for He never ent about His own errands nor went by His wn will, but He waited always upon His Father.

Such service did Jesus render, and you must nder the same. You cannot do your Lord's ill except you live near to Him. It is of no use ying to preach with power unless we get our essage from our heavenly Father's own self. am sure you as hearers know the difference etween a dead word which comes from a man's wn brain and lip, and a living word which the reacher delivers fresh as the manna which fell om heaven. The word should come from the inister like bread hot from the oven, or better ill, like a seed with life in it; not as a parched rain with the germ dead and killed, but as a ving seed which roots itself in your souls, and prings up to a harvest. This made our Lord ich a good servant that He listened to His ather's voice and yielded Himself to the Fa- ier's will to perfection.

Our text assures us that this service knew no serve in its consecration. We generally draw ick somewhere. I am ashamed to say it, but I ourn that I have done so. Many of us could ve to Christ all our health and strength, and l the money we have, very heartily and cheer- illy; but when it comes to a point of reputation, e feel the pinch. To be slandered, to have me filthy thing said of you; this is too much r flesh and blood. You seem to say, "I can- ot be made a fool of, I cannot bear to be re- irded as a mere impostor;" but a true servant Christ must make himself of no reputation hen he takes upon himself the work of His ord.

Our blessed Master was willing to be scoffed by the lewdest and the lowest of men. The ojects jeered at Him; the reproach of them that proached God fell upon Him. He became the ng of the drunkard, and when the rough sol- ery detained Him in the guard-room they eaped up their ridicule, as though He were ot worthy of the name of man.

> They bow their knees to me, and cry, 'Hail, King':
> Whatever scoffs or scornfulness can bring,
> I am the floor, the sink, where they it fling:
> Was ever grief like mine!
>
> The soldiers also spit upon that face
> Which angels did desire to have the grace
> And prophets once to see, but found no place;
> Was ever grief like mine?"

erod and Pilate were the very dross of men; id yet He permitted them to judge Him. Their servants were vile fellows, and yet He resigned Himself to them. If He had breathed upon them with angry breath, He might have flashed devouring fire upon them, and burned them up as stubble; but His omnipotent patience restrained His indignation, and He remained as a sheep before her shearers. He allowed His own creatures to pluck His hair and spit in His face. Such patience should be yours as servants of God. We are to be willing to be made nothing of, and even to be counted as the offscouring of all things.

It is pitiful for the Christian to refuse to suffer, and to become a fighting man, crying, "We must stand up for our rights." Did you ever see Jesus in that posture? There is a propensity in us to say, "I will have it out." Yes, but you cannot picture Jesus in that attitude. I defy a painter to depict Him so: it is somebody else, and not Christ. No! He said, "I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair: I hid not my face from shame and spitting."

All this while—now follow me in this next point—there was

NO FLINCHING IN HIM.

They spat in His face, but what says He in the seventh verse. "I have set my face like a flint." If they are about to defile His face, He is resolved to bear it; He girds up His loins, and makes Himself more determined. Oh, the bravery of our Master's silence! Cruelty and shame could not make Him speak. Have not your lips sometimes longed to speak out a denial and a defence? Have you not felt it wise to be quiet, but then the charge has been so excessively cruel, and it has stung you so terribly that you hungered to resent it. Base falsehoods aroused your indignation, and you felt you must speak and probably you did speak, though you tried to keep your lips as with a bridle while the wicked were before you.

But our own beloved Lord in the omnipotence of His patience and love would not utter a word, but like a lamb at the slaughter He opened not His mouth. He witnessed a good confession by His matchless silence. Oh, how mighty—how gloriously mighty was His patience! We must copy it, if we are to be His disciples.

And do you notice all the while the confidence and quiet of His spirit? He almost seems to say, "You may spit upon Me, but you cannot find fault with Me. You may pluck My hair, but you cannot impugn my integrity; you may lash My shoulders, but you cannot impute a fault to Me. Your false witnesses dare not look Me in the face: let Me know who is Mine adversary, let him come near to Me. Behold, Adonai Jehovah will keep Me, who is he that shall condemn Me! Lo, they all shall wax old as a garment, the moth shall eat them up."

Be calm, then, O true servant of God! In patience possess your soul. Serve God steadily and steadfastly though all men shall belie you. Go to the bottom of the service, dive even to the very depth, and be content even to lie in Christ's grave, for you shall share in Christ's resurrection. Do not dream that the path to heaven is up the hill of honor, it winds down into the valley of humiliation. Imagine not that you can grow great eternally by being great here. You must become less, and less, and less, even though you should be despised and rejected of men, for this is the path to everlasting glory.

IV. Lastly, I am to set Him forth in His fourth character, as

but I must ask you to do this, while I just, as it were, make a charcoal sketch of the picture I would have painted.

Remember, first, our blessed Lord is well qualified to speak a word in season to him that is weary, because He Himself is lowly, and meek, and so accessible to us. When men are in low spirits they feel as as if they could not take comfort from persons who are harsh and proud. The comforter must come as a sufferer; he must come in a lowly, broken spirit, if he would cheer the afflicted. You must not put on your best dress to go and visit the daughter of poverty, or go with your jewels about you to show how much better off you are than she. Sit down by the side of the downcast man and let him know that you are meek and lowly of heart.

Remark not only His lowliness, but His sympathy. Are you full of aches and pains this morning? Jesus knows all about them, for He "gave his back to the smiters." Do you suffer from what is worse than pain, from scandal and slander? "He hid not his face from shame and spitting." Have you been ridiculed of late? Have the graceless made fun of your godliness? Jesus can sympathize with you, for you know what unholy mirth they made out of Him. In every pang that rends your heart your Lord has borne His share. Go and tell Him. Many will not understand you. You are a speckled bird, differing from all the rest, and they will all peck at you; but Jesus Christ knows this, for He was a speckled bird too. He was "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners," but not separate from such as you. Get you to Him and He will sympathize with you.

In addition to His gentle spirit and His power to sympathize, there is this to help to comfort us—namely, His example, for He can argue thus with you, "I gave My back to the smiters. Cannot you do the like? Shall the disciple be above his Master?" If I can but get on the doorstep of heaven and sit down in the meanest place there I shall feel I have an infinitely better position than I deserve—and shall I think of my dear, blessed Lord and Master giving His face to be spit upon, and then give myself airs, and say, "I cannot bear this scorn, I cannot bear this pain!"

What, does the King pass over the brook Kedron, and must there be no brook Kedron for you? Does the Master bear the cross, and must your shoulders never be galled? Did they call the Master of the house "Beelzebub," and must they call you "Reverend Sir?" Did they laugh at Him, and scoff at Him, and must you be honored? Are you to be "gentleman" and lady" where Christ was "that fellow?" For His birth they loaned Him a stable, and for His burial He borrowed a grave. O friends, let pride disappear, and let us count it our highest honor to be permitted to stoop as low as ever we can.

Last of all, our Saviour's triumph is meant to be a stimulus and encouragement to us. He stands before us this morning as the comforter of His people. Consider Him that endured such contradiction of sinners against Himself, lest ye be weary and faint in your minds; for though He was once abased and despised, yet now He sitteth at the right hand of God, and reigns over all things; and the day is coming when every knee shall bend before Him, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. They that spat upon Him will rue the day.

Come hither, ye that derided Him! He has raised you from the dead, come hither and spit upon Him now! Ye that scourged Him, bring your rods, see what ye can do in this day of His glory! See, they fly before Him, they invoke the hills to shelter them, they ask the rocks to open and conceal them. Yet it is nothing but His face, that selfsame face they spat upon, which is making earth and heaven to flee away. Yea, all things flee before the majesty of His frown who once gave His back to the smiters, and His cheeks to them that plucked off the hair. Be like Him, then, ye who bear His name; trust Him, and live for Him, and you shall reign with Him in glory for ever and ever. Amen.

PERILS OF THE DEEP.

Leaving Home—Sea-Sickness—A Leak Sprung—Bailing Water out of the Hold—Beneficial Results of Fear—Crossing the Equator—Strange Customs of Sailors—Rough Joking—An Adventure with Zulus.

It was not without difficulty I obtained my father's consent to go to sea. He had been a sea-captain and he knew the hardships and dangers of the life that to me seemed bright with the halo of romance. We were living on a farm then, and I had a comfortable home and a pleasant life, even though it did seem to my excited imagination a very dull one. The monotonous round of farm duties became at last almost unbearable to me, and then my father, seeing nothing else would content me, gave a reluctant consent to my adopting a seafaring life, and I set out on my first voyage.

I soon found what good reason my father and my friends had for advising me to be content on the farm. In almost all walks of life the apprentice or novice is a subject for the practical jokes and the bullying of his new companions, but in no position is a boy fresh from home so uncomfortable as he is on board a ship. I was ordered to do impossible things, and to go on foolish errands. I remember on one occasion walking up to the quarter deck and coolly asking the captain himself for a marline spike. I had been told to do it and thought that it was all right, but it might have brought some heavy trouble on me. Fortunately for me the captain was a good humored man, and evidently understood how the poor lad before him was being fooled, and so he only laughed and sent me back again to the forecastle. Then the SEA-SICKNESS.

I shall never forget the first horrible sensations of that most wretched of ailments. I lay on the deck and writhed. I wished death would come and end my miseries. I wished I had never come on board. I could find no word strong enough to describe my folly in adopting a sailor's profession.

Oh! if the ship would but be still for one minute; it seemed cruel to torture me so when I was suffering. The rolling and tossing seemed interminable; in my agony I thought I would be glad if some one would throw me overboard; if I was drowned I should at least be still, instead of being rolled and lifted and dropped again; up and down, up and down, without a moment's steadiness.

Of course these feelings soon passed away as I became accustomed to the motion of the vessel, and I began to give my attention to the duties of my position. It was but a crazy craft I had engaged upon, and the rough weather we encountered strained her seams, so that one day I was horrified to hear that the hold was full of water. The pumps were choked with sand with which the vessel had been ballasted, and it seemed to me impossible we could ever reach land again. However we were all set to work with half-barrels to bale out the water, and we labored for dear life.

Then I think was the first time I ever prayed. I had said my prayers before, and I had been taught the meaning of prayer, but I had never prayed before as I prayed then. It was no formal prayer, but an intense pleading with God for life, for help in the sore extremity. With that half-barrel in my hands, my legs in the water above my knees, I realized what I had never realized in the pew at church, that my only hope was in God; and although I could not leave off baling to bend the knee in the approved fashion, I knew that my thoughts were prayers, and I hoped they would be heard. They were heard, and in the goodness of God we came safely to port, where the vessel was thoroughly overhauled and well caulked. But I have never forgotten that night, nor the resolutions I made as I worked for my life down in that dark ship's hold.

CROSSING THE LINE

is an experience I shall never forget. The rough horse play to which the sailor is subjected by his messmates the first time he crosses the equator has given rise to evils so serious, that public opinion has loudly demanded that the practices should be discontinued But in my time and on such ships as I was sailing on, the old customs in all their barbarity were still kept up. The young sailor was hauled under the ship's keel by a rope attached to him; he was then once more flung over the side and again dragged up half-drowned to the deck. There he found an amateur barber awaiting him.

He was then thrust into a sitting posture, and his face lathered with some horrid mixture of tar and nameless abominations scraped from the dirtiest parts of the vessel. During the lathering process numberless questions were asked him, which when he essayed to answer, the brush covered with the filthy mixture was thrust into his mouth. Then followed the shaving, for which an iron hoop sharpened at its edge, represented the razor, and the novice was fortunate if he escaped some ugly gashes in his cheeks and chin.

His hair was then brushed with an instrument constructed for the purpose; it was made by driving some nails into a flat piece of wood, beyond which the points of the nails projected like a lot of unbending bristles. This, handled in the light of a hair brush by some rough sailor, produced effects which no one who has once experienced, desires to have repeated. He was then rubbed over with a piece of salt pork and anointed with turpentine; a tub of filthy water was flung over him and his toilet pronounced complete. Add to all this the orgies and wild silly pranks of the sailors in all stages of intoxication, and you have a fair idea of what crossing the equator in the olden time meant for a young sailor.

ADVENTURE WITH ZULUS.

Our vessel having once more given signs of leakage our captain put into a bay on the shores of the Island of Madagascar to get some repairs done. We found the work could not be done here however in a substantial manner, and the captain determined to have it done by the ship's carpenter assisted by the crew. We therefore sailed up the African coast looking for a convenient place for an anchorage. At length a spot was found which the captain considered suitable for his purpose, and a boat was sent to reconnoiter. I was in the boat and looked with some curiosity at the beautiful retired spot.

As we neared the beach we noticed a canoe lying under cover of some bushes. It was a rude affair; merely the trunk of a tree hollowed out in the centre after the fashion in vogue among the lowest type of savages.

As we looked at the canoe and wondered at its clumsy construction, the long grass on the shore was apparently disturbed, and two tall forms, black as ebony, emerged, armed with bow and arrows. We made demonstrations of good will according to our ability, but we saw they were either misunderstood or disregarded, for suddenly the bows were bent and two arrows shot past us with a "swish," a sound I shall never forget. Being unarmed and uncertain what number of savages were concealed in the bush, we made all haste back to the ship.

We picked up one of the arrows as it floated on the water by the boat, and carried it with us on board. It was about two feet long, made of hard wood, and the end was sharpened and covered with some bright red substance, which on being tested by a chemist was pronounced deadly poison. The following day two boats' crews well armed were sent to the same spot and directed to search for the Zulus. We came upon them not far from the place of yesterday's encounter; they were crouching in the grass, but a volley of buck shot from our muskets brought them to their feet, with wild shouts and cries of pain.

For some time we were in doubt as to the course they would adopt. The order was given by our leader to fix bayonets and charge. The Zulus had stood apparently undecided h to act, but seeing the white party form, come towards them at the double quick, t turned and fled. It was not deemed prudent follow them lest we should be led into an buscade or entrapped in some place where should fall an easy prey to the tribe. We cordingly returned to the ship, and the capta thinking there were too many dangers conn ed with the locality, decided on steering for Cape of Good Hope, where we were sure to the repairs well and cheaply done.

A DYING IRISH BOY.

By the Rev. J. Leifchild.

In a street in Dublin I saw one mornin youth about ten years old lying on the grou pale and exhausted, surrounded by a group people. He had been sent in the night in s rough vehicle from the town of Drogheda, the purpose of being removed to the hous his mother, which the driver was unable to fi and had therefore turned him out in the r and there left him. I gave him a little milk nourishment, which I had procured from a ki hearted neighbor, and then applied for his mission to an adjacent hospital for the recept of sufferers from accidents, where he was im diately received and attended to.

The resident physician, in the most grac manner, acknowledged my intervention, but which, he said, the poor lad had certainly die the street. His kinsman, it appeared, for s trifling misdemeanor had thrown him o truckle bed, and stamped upon him till he broken nearly all his ribs, when fear led him plan for his removal.

Day after day I visited him, and as he ha opposing prejudices in his mind to be overco but only a few loose notions and expressi caught up from those around him, I found willing to receive my teaching of "the trut in Jesus." Never shall I forget the expres of earnest intelligence with which he looke to me from his pillow, and caught the t placed before him, and felt its relevance an cheering efficacy. As a new-born babe di "desire the sincere milk of the word, and g thereby" in knowledge, faith, and patie When about to terminate my visit to Irela called to see him for the last time, and wa formed by the physician that he had been pressing an earnest wish for my arrival, a seemed to be breathing his last.

"Ah, your honor," he exclaimed as I proached him, "I am dying; but I am ha because I am going to Jesus, the only Savi And if I had but two things I would be happy indeed."

"And what are they, my boy? They sha accomplished if I have it in my power."

He shook his head and replied, "Let no kinsman be hurt. He did not mean to in me; but if he had not used me as he d should never have met with you nor have kn the Lord."

"And what is the other?"

"Oh," said he, with extreme emotion, mother! my mother!—could I but see her to her not to worship the Virgin, but to wor Jesus, I would then gladly close my eyes die."

That day he breathed the last. A judic friend, whom I had taken with me the day fore to visit him, was moved to tears of j the expression of the young sufferer's v and feelings.

THE GOLDEN AGE TO COME.

By Rev. Frank White, of London.

The Age to come, Heb. 2: 5—It will be, 1. A Wise Age—2 A Godly Age—Millennial Glory—3. A Peaceful Age—4. A Glad and Joyful Age—A Fruitful Age—It will Commence with the Second Coming of Christ.

THE poet Virgil sang of a "golden age," when a "God-like child" should be born, and " golden race" arise in all the world. He calls it "an age of glory," and declares "when the mighty months shall begin to roll their course every trace of his nation's guilt shall be effaced, and the earth released from everlasting dread." "This God-like child," he adds, "shall rule a reconciled world. All nature is to do homage to him; serpents and poisonous herbs are to disappear, and the greatest plenty prevail—corn, grapes, and honey in abundance."

Here is his description literally translated: "Slowly the plain shall grow yellow with gently waving corn, and on wild brambles shall hang the ruddy grape, and hard oak-trunks exude the honey dew." Then addressing this wonderful child, he adds: "Begin to assume, I pray, your sovereign honors, majestic child. See the world nodding with its ponderous vaults and lands and plains of sea—see how all things exult in the age to come."

This was written by a heathen forty years before Christ, and you would almost think he had before him a copy of the Old Testament Scriptures, so exactly does his language accord with the descriptions of the Millennium found in the pages of the Hebrew prophets, especially the prophet Isaiah.

THERE IS AN AGE TO COME.

If we turn to Hebrews 2 : 5-10, we find a reference to "a world (or age) to come"—a world that is to be in subjection, not to angels, but to man. At first, man in general is spoken of; but before the apostle closes he directs our sole attention to one Man—that Blessed One, who is preeminently the Son of man—Jesus. As the first man Adam was set over all created things in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 2 : 19, 20), so another Man—called in the 15th of the first of Corinthians the Second Man, or "Second Adam"—"the Lord from Heaven"—is declared the Ruler of all in the next age, or world to come.

We have called it

"A GOLDEN AGE,"

as Virgil called the age of which he wrote in such glowing terms. We will now see how far we are justified in giving it such a distinction; and first let us see what this coming age is called in Scripture. In Matt. 19 : 28 it is called "the Regeneration;" in Acts 3 : 21, "the Times of Restitution;" in Ephesians 4 : 30, "the Day of Redemption;" in Psalm 110 : 3, "the Day of His Power."

The next age may be called "a Golden Age," because it will be a Wise Age. Can this be said of the age in which we are living?

Look at a missionary map and see in how small a portion of the globe the light of Gospel truth is shining. Take the most favored city in Christendom, walk up and down its streets, get into conversation with its inhabitants, ask them about the truth of the Gospel, the way of salvation. How many could tell you "how a man may be justified before a Holy God?" Observe the practical ungodliness—the absence of the fear of God, the very beginning of wisdom.

Mark with what scorn the Bible and its teachings are spoken of by the wise men of our day. Think of the blinding effects of ritualism and rationalism, so fostered and nourished everywhere around us, to say nothing of Spiritualism, Swedenborgianism, atheism, and other unclean spirits which are going forth through the length and breadth of the land, and can you come to another conclusion than that the present age is one of increasing darkness?

And if this be so in a country like ours, if the very light of God with which we have been so long blessed is being turned into darkness, how great must that darkness be, and what hope is there for the heathen who are taught to look to us as possessing the truth!

Now read Isaiah 11 : 9, and Hab. 2 : 4, and there you will see that a day is spoken of "When the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea." As the waters find their way into every cavern of its depths, so the knowledge of the Lord shall pervade every recess of God's earth. Turn also to other passages: Isaiah 54 : 13—"All thy children shall be taught of the Lord;" Jer. 31 : 34—"They shall teach no more every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for they shall all know Me, from the least of them to the greatest;" Isaiah 33 : 6—"Wisdom and knowledge shall be the stability of thy times." Must we not confess that these Scriptures witness to the advent of an age very different from this present one, which may be well termed a wise age?

2. The age to come will be

A GODLY AGE.

This age is not godly (Gal. 1 : 4). But will it not become so? you ask. No! for the Scriptures tell us over and over again that at the end thereof it shall have increased in all manner of *un*godliness, that along with "the form of godliness" there shall be a state of things which can only be regarded as "virtual heathendom." Instead of the breach between truth and error, light and darkness, holiness and unholiness, being lessened, it shall be, toward the end, awfully widened—"Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived" (2 Tim. 3 : 13).

Read the whole chapter; also Matt. 24. How different in the age to come! Then the Lord, being known, He will be loved; and being loved, He will be trusted; and being trusted, He will be served and honored. True, it will not be a perfect age; nevertheless it will be an age in which will be witnessed a world-wide manifestation of the Spirit's power, a fulness of Gospel blessing among the nations hitherto unknown (Is. 2 : 3; 40 : 4, 5; 55 : 10-13; 56 : 7, 8).

There will be also a visible display of heavenly glory—a reigning Christ, an opened heaven, with angels and glorified saints ascending and descending upon the Son of Man (Ps. 68 : 7; Isaiah 4 : 4-6; 24 : 23; Jer. 3 : 17; John 1 : 51). Satan, too, will be bound, and no longer permitted to go forth like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour. These will make the age to come to be as marked for godliness as the present is for *un*godliness.

I need hardly say the full blaze of Divine light and knowledge will be at Jerusalem. "Out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem;" but that the healing, hallowing effects of Israel's conversion will be felt throughout the wide, wide world, is clear from many passages in the Word of God (Is. 2 : 3; 60 : 21; Ezekiel 37 : 24-28; Mich. 5 : 7). "Not only Judæa, but the whole earth shall be the seed-plot wherein Gentile nations shall be the spiritual growth of the Jewish seed sown everywhere."

3. The age to come will be

A PEACEFUL AGE.

"Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn the art of war any more" (Isaiah 2 : 4; Micah 4 : 3). Even the very beasts of prey shall then lose their ferocity and cease to devour one another, their very habits and instincts being changed. "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain" (Isaiah 11 : 6-9).

But will this truly "golden" state of things be brought about by the gradual diffusion of Gospel principles in the present age? If Scripture is to guide us in our reply to this question, we say emphatically, No! We are taught to expect that the last days of this dispensation are to be more fruitful in strife and bloodshed than any which have preceded (Matt. 24; Zech. 12).

4. The age to come will be

an age of gladness. Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. Then shall "the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing; for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert. And the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs—and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." Creation itself shall rejoice, because the Lord reigneth.

All nature shall be in sympathy with the joy of God's people. "The mountains and hills shall break forth into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands." The full redemption of Israel shall be the release of creation from its present bondage. When God promises the former, He anticipates the latter also, and says, "Sing, O ye heavens; for the LORD hath done it; shout, ye lower parts of the earth: break forth into singing, ye mountains, O forest, and every tree therein: for the Lord hath redeemed Jacob, and glorified Himself in Israel" (Isaiah 44 : 23).

5. The age to come will be

an age of plenty. This will be especially true of Palestine. What Virgil dreamt of his country will then be a blessed reality of Emmanuel's land. The curse being removed from creation, the earth will present a scene of abounding fruitfulness. "And it shall come to pass in that day, I will hear, saith the Lord, I will hear the heavens, and they shall hear the earth; and the earth shall hear the corn, and the wine, and the oil; and they shall hear Jezreel" (Hosea 2 : 21, 22. See also Ezekiel 36 : 33).

Then will Psalm 65 have its true fulfilment. Such language as the following can only be used with limitation now. "Thou makest the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice. Thou visitest the earth and waterest it: Thou greatly enrichest it with the river of God." Read also Isaiah 55 : 13; Jeremiah 33 : 9.

Oh! if this be really so, and the age to come will be indeed a wise, a godly, a peaceful, a fruitful, and a joyful age, am I not right in speaking of it as a Golden Age?

THE PRESENT AGE WILL CLOSE

with the Rapture of the Saints, the destruction of Antichrist and his followers, and vengeance on them who have heard but not obeyed the Gospel. All these events are to follow upon the second coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. At His glorious appearing (not before) He will raise from the dead all His believing people from the days of Abel to the last believer who shall die before the voice of the archangel and the trump of God are heard. These, together with the living saints (those who are alive and remain at His coming), He will both transform and translate (2 Thess. 4 : 14-18).

Then, taking them with Him, He will hasten to Jerusalem, to deliver His people Israel from their fierce enemies, whom He will utterly destroy (Zech. 12 : 7, 8; 14 : 3; 2 Thess. 2 : 8). Turning away ungodliness from Jacob, He will finally build up Zion (Psalm 102 : 16.), "reigning before His ancients gloriously" (Isaiah 24 : 13). Then will great voices be heard in heaven, saying, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and His Christ" (Rev. 11 : 15); and the true "Golden Age" will have commenced.

Meanwhile let us live and labor for Christ and His Gospel. While we clearly distinguish between the present evil age and that which we have seen is to come when the Lord returns, let us cultivate the spirit of the age to come, and avoid all conformity with that of the age in which we live. Let us make sure we are numbered amongst those who obtain that age, true children of the resurrection (Luke 20 : 35). Let our characters be golden. Let us not talk of golden hopes while we are earthly minded. In a word, let our conversation be in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour the Lord Jesus Christ.

COMPARISONS.

Effie knows a deal more of religion than I do, but to my mind it's an odd thing that women can't go to church without decking themselves out like May queens, and then fall down on their knees and call themselves miserable sinners.

I think there's something in the Bible about a different kind of adorning ? I daresay that Effie could find out the passage, for she's ready with chapter and verse, and, now that I think of it, that very passage came in the wedding service. How much easier it is to read and know than to mark and learn ! It's my notion that the love of dress is one of the worst temptations that come to women. They think of their finery instead of their duties !" and down came the farmer's stick on a brilliant hornet that was sunning itself at ease on a wild rose spray.

While the farmer was thus cogitating as he walked a scene was passing at that very moment in his home which would have formed a good comment on the subject of his thoughts.

As Effie was out of spirits, Mrs. Cross considered that to divert and amuse her mind would be an act of simple good-nature.

" I am going to shake out some of my clothes, and see that the moth has not got into them," said the widow to Effie ; " maybe you would like a sight of the pretty bits of dress," she glanced at her black gown, and added, " which can be of no use to me now."

Pretty bits of dress were always attractive to Effie ; she willingly accompanied Mrs. Cross into the pink room, and looked on with interest and curiosity while sundry gay-colored articles were taken out of box or drawer, unfolded, shaken, and carefully folded again. Mrs. Cross made comments on them as they passed through her hands, somewhat in the fashion of an auctioneer or a showman.

" Pretty bit of lace, real Maltese ; lace always is useful ; it sets off every thing else. There's an apron my niece Mary gave me ; don't you admire the pattern ? Now, here's a silk dress, not faded a bit ; if I were to smooth out these crumples, 'twould look almost as good as new, and stripes like these are now all the fashion, you know."

Effie took pleasure in helping her lodger to fold and arrange the various things, secretly thinking that it was a great pity that some of the articles should be laid by till they should become old-fashioned and faded.

" How nice that would look upon me !" was the idea which now and then passed through the mind of Effie. But Holland's wife knew that in her present position covetousness was folly, though she was not sufficiently on her guard against the lust of the eye as an actual sin.

Effie was exposing herself to temptation, but she resisted it pretty bravely, taking no apparent notice of divers hints thrown out by her crafty companion, who had had her own private reasons for inviting Effie to look at her clothes. At last, from the whity-brown paper in which it was wrapped, Mrs. Cross drew out a flowered silk shawl.

" Oh ! that's just the thing that I set my heart on !" exclaimed the incautious young wife.

" Well, to my taste—and it's reckoned a good one—this is the sweetest thing that I have," said Mrs. Cross, spreading out the gay article as a spider spreads out its web. " It was poor Mr. Cross's present to me on our last wedding-day—so provoking I never had time to wear it. See what a lovely pattern of roses. It was bought at such a fashionable shop !"

" I suppose that it cost a good deal," said Effie, looking with a covetous eye on the shawl. The fly was fluttering too near to the web.

" I don't say that it didn't cost a good bit ; but if it takes your fancy, dear Effie, I'll part with the shawl just to please you, and you shall have it at a bargain," said the benevolent spider.

" Now, I don't mean to buy it, you know, but I ask, just for curiosity's sake, what would you part with it for ?" asked Effie, as she stroked the soft surface of the shawl, and looked admiringly on the pattern.

" Well, it's just as good as new : has never but twice been put on," said Mrs. Cross, in a tone of reflection ; " well, let's say, you shall have the shawl for two pounds" ($10).

Effie shook her head to express that two pounds were what she could not afford to give ; and rising, to put herself out of the way of temptation, she murmured something about going to see what Mary was doing in the dairy. Mrs. Cross was afraid that the fly would escape. If Effie coveted finery, her lodger yet more greedily coveted money, and it never occurred to Mrs. Cross that to do so was any sin.

" Just let me see how the shawl would look over your shoulders," cried the widow, suiting the action to the words. " La ! if ever I saw any thing so becoming ! you never looked so well in your life ! Just glance at yourself in the glass."

Effie did glance at her own reflection, and the poor spoilt child was pleased with what she saw in the mirror.

" I've so set my mind on your wearing this shawl, it suits you so well, dear Effie, that you shall have it for thirty shillings" ($7.50), cried Mrs. Cross, with an air of great generosity. She knew that she would find it difficult in Ashley to get another purchaser for the shawl.

" I really don't need a shawl ; I have plenty of clothes," said Effie, slowly, and still looking at herself in the glass.

" You've nothing stylish, my dear, like this. I think that you are the most prudent of women ; you've not spent a half-crown (sixty cents) on your dress since I came to be your lodger. No one can grudge you a pretty little shawl—and it is such a bargain, you know."

Effie reluctantly took the shawl off her shoulders, but she kept it still in her hands. She had a clear idea that it was to her as forbidden fruit, but it was so goodly to look on !

" I'm sure that my husband would not like me to buy the shawl," said Effie gravely. " Robert is not very fond of gay patterns, and then—he has so many expenses just now ; I should not like to vex Robert."

" He does not care much about vexing you, my dear," said Mrs. Cross, with a smile. " I must say, Effie, that you are really spoiling your husband. It does not do to let men have every thing their own way ; it makes them unreasonable and selfish.

But it is needless to repeat all the arguments of the tempter. If my reader be a woman she can readily imagine what was said, and will not be surprised to find that the end of the matter was that Effie carried off the shawl to her own yellow room, after promising to get money to pay for it from Robert as soon as he should come in from his walk.

Effie said to herself, " I have done nothing wrong ;" and yet she avoided looking at the text-card which hung in her room : and when Robert returned home, tired and heated after his walk and his work in the fields, Effie put off till the evening telling him what she had done. Had the young wife had money enough in her own hands to pay her debt, it is but too likely that she would not have spoken to Robert at all on the subject.

Effie took more pains than usual in preparing her husband's supper, and, as she hoped, with more than usual success. Robert watched Effie's neat fingers as she spread a fresh white cloth over the deal table, herself looking to his eyes fresh and sweet as a flower of spring.

" I was harsh to my poor pet this morning," thought the penitent husband ; " Effie don't know what troubles may press on a fellow's mind, and make him savage even to his dear little wife."

Effie chancing to look up at Robert, caught sight of the softening look in the eyes of her husband, as he stood with his back to the kitchen fire, on which his favorite sausages were grilling. " Now is my time to speak," thought Effie.

She could not, however, help feeling afraid to make her little confession. There was no one but the Hollands in the kitchen ; Mrs. Cross and her nephew were enjoying the cool of the evening amongst the strawberry beds. Effie approached her husband in a caressing but somewhat timid manner.

" Robert, dear," she began, with a little hesitation, " will you please give me thirty shillings ($7.50), as I have something to pay for."

" What ! has the grocer sent in his bill already ?" asked Robert, looking a little disturbed

" No, not the grocer, dear ; this is—this is little debt which I owe to Mrs. Cross."

" To Mrs. Cross !" repeated Robert in surprise ; " have you been borrowing from her ?"

" Not exactly borrowing," said Effie, castin down her eyes, and fidgeting with the strings o her apron ; " I have bought from her—a prett silk shawl."

" You have not done such a silly thing !" exclaimed Robert, both his tone and his face expressing displeasure. " I'll not have that woman coaxing you into buying her trumpery, whe you've more than enough of your own. Yo may just take back the shawl to its owner, an tell her that I bid you return it.'

All the pride that lurked in Effie's heart wa up in arms in a moment. " I could not do suc a mean thing ; I could not lower myself so ! she cried, pouting like a spoilt child.

" I'll not pay for the finery," said Rober turning round toward the 'fire, to avoid seein the tears in the eyes of his wife. He added in lower tone, " I've not thirty shillings in th house at this moment."

" How can you say so !" said Effie, " when saw you yesterday with two five-pound not ($50) in your purse ?"

" I've not got one of them now," said Rober sternly staring at the fire.

" What have you done with them, then ? hope that you have not sent them away in th letter," cried Effie, vexation and curiosity ge ting the better of prudence.

Robert turned round toward her so sudden that he made his wife start. " I tell you that I' not the money, that's enough for you, Effie, a if you want to know more, I've sent this ve day a notice to withdraw all that s left of my sa ings in the post-office bank ; when that's don I've nothing else to fall back on. Unless ra fall soon, the hay will scarcely be worth t trouble of carrying, and I hardly know how make up the rent for the quarter. So take ba at once the shawl which you were foolish enou to buy without asking the leave of your hu band."

Effie was not accustomed yet to Rober bursts of temper, and her conversations wi Mrs. Cross had not made her better able to be them. " You are very unkind," she murmure " you promised to make me happy, and y don't mind making me wretched."

" Make you wretched, do I !" exclaimed Ro ert passionately, striding up to the place whe his cap hung on a nail, and taking it dow " I'll spare you my company, then, this eve ing ; I'll take my supper with the Coles at t 'Crown,' " and almost before the words we out of his mouth, the irritated young husba had quitted the house.

" Run after him, bring him back, submit his will, obey him who has a right to co mand," so conscience and affection alike wh pered to the heart of Effie Holland, but the pr of life kept her back. The wife was deeply m tified, greatly offended ; she doubted, she he tated, and while she did so the opportunity recalling her husband was lost.

Angry with Robert, more angry with hers and most of all with her lodger, Effie ran stairs to the yellow room, opened the draw and pulled out of it the shawl which had b the cause of her first actual quarrel with husband. Effie then hurried downstairs, almost thrust the shawl into the hands of M Cross, who had just re-entered the farm-hou

" Take it—my husband won't let me keep i laimed Effie, speaking as if the words half-oked her.

La, how mean——" began Mrs. Cross.

You shall not speak so of my husband!" d Effie, who was still too loving and loyal a e to let such a word be applied to her Robert.

Pray go to supper, Mrs. Cross," she added re quietly, "I shall stay up-stairs this even- and Robert—he has gone out."

ffie then returned to her room with a full rt, shut and bolted the door behind her. At moment she could hardly have endured the sence of Mrs. Cross.

So there has been a flare-up between the Hol-ls," said the widow composedly to herself. " should like to have heard"—but here Mrs. ss's reflections were interrupted by the sight red trying to snatch one of the hot sausages n the gridiron on which Effie had left them. aunt was barely in time to save the child n burning his fingers.

rs. Cross put the savory viands on a dish, then carried them smoking to the table. portly widow comforted herself for her dis-ointment by doing full justice to the good per prepared for Holland.

ffie shut up in her loneliness, felt very miser- indeed on that sweet summer evening. m was to her then any thing but an abode of e and delight. Not even when she had t by her mother's death-bed had Effie felt so y unhappy. Then she had had no self-re-ch; then she had been able to pray, now she no inclination for prayer.

nger, pride, regret, and suspicion had taken ession of a spirit usually so serene and so rful. Effie understood but too well that culties about money were oppressing her band. The shadow of coming poverty, the d that Robert might have to give up the and return to day labor, lay heavily upon mind of his wife.

t the want of money did not embitter the t of Effie so much as the unanswered ques-s which she asked herself a hundred times on that miserable evening. What had be- of the five-pound notes!

hy did not Robert tell her plainly what he done with the money? Why did her hus- not trust her? Why was he evidently y if she tried to get at his secret, and why ld there be any secret at all? If Robert had ed a relative or a friend in distress, paid a bill, nade a purchase, why should he hide the er from her who was, as he often had told all the world to him?

fie paced up and down the yellow room; she d not to light her candle when twilight deep- into comparative darkness; she had no t to take up her work; she could not have ded to reading. God was not in Effie's ghts; the recollection of His presence d have brought not consolation, but fear.

ne o'clock struck. There was a noise on taircase, but it was not the sound of a hus-'s tread. Fred was stumbling up to bed, wed by his aunt. The child had stayed up er than usual, was sleepy and tired at last, the noise that he made was soon over.

fie heard Mrs. Cross moving about her room ome time longer; how her heavy step made boards creak, and how it fidgeted Effie to her opening and shutting her drawers! those sounds also were stilled.

n o'clock struck. "Robert should be at e by this time," murmured Effie, as she v her casement open, and looked forth into ight. The objects which were an eyesore r by day were almost invisible now under aint light of the stars; the breeze scarcely d the curtain, all seemed calm and peace- ll but the heart of poor Effie.

ish! that was the nightingale's note from a boring copse. How sweet the silvery le! how musical the soft trill! Effie did are to listen to the nightingale now; her vas strained to catch another sound, and ird's note rather disturbed her.

PRACTICAL RELIGION.

S. S. Lesson for August 31st. (Col. 3 : 12-25.)
Golden Text, Verse 23. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Perhaps we may be allowed to substitute Practical Christianity for Practical Religion in the line we take to-day for our Sunday's lesson. Religion may be Pagan or Christian, but Christianity is Christ-lived. Thus a practical Christian is a Christ-man; in German, a Christ. Paul reminds the Colossians that they have put off the old man with his deeds and have put on the new man (i.e. Christ), "which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him, where, or in which image, there is neither Greek nor Jew," etc. In the old man all those distinctions between man and man are clearly to be discerned, but in the new man "Christ is all and in all." To know neither ourselves nor others after the flesh, to have before us neither the nationality, worldly position, and circumstances, talents, or deficiencies of others, but only Christ in them or the want of Christ; and in the same manner to be neither humbled by our own natural deficiencies or exalted by our powers or by our circumstances, but only grieved by our want of Christlikeness—this is the spirit of practical Christianity.

Paul addresses the disciples at Colossæ as "holy and beloved." Holy—that is, pure. Of what church could it be now said that it is holy or pure? The Romish? the Greek? the national Churches of England, Scotland, Germany, Switzerland, the various Churches in America? The Wesleyans, Baptists, Independents, Friends, Plymouth Brethren? Which, as a Church, could be called holy? Oh, it is true that "God at the first did visit the Gentiles to take out of them a people for His name" (Acts 15 : 14), and it would seem as though He visited the Churches, to take out of them a people for His name.

To such a people comes the exhortation, "Put on, therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies," the very outflow of the life of Christ in us, no duty from without. Kindness, the being open to do good at all times under all circumstances, turning a sunny side to everybody, never thinking what others do to us, but grasping the privilege of doing good to them. Then "unkindness of minds." This is perhaps the most important of all, for we can only read one another as we meet at Jesus' feet. In the consciousness of our mutual need, and in the confession of our shortcomings, all which repulses others is done away, and the channels of mutual love and service stand open. Humble, we cannot but be meek, receiving rebuke with gratitude, not entertaining the idea of justifying ourselves.

And this leads to a mutual and habitual "forbearing one another and forgiving one another if any man have a quarrel against any, even as Christ forgave you so also do ye." In measure as Christ becomes our life, it is impossible to have anything against another. We see God's hand in the permission of all which happens, and our deep feeling with regard to one who has wronged us is deep compassion for that which it must have cost him, as well as pain that the Lord Jesus Christ has been grieved. The measure of a Christian's forgiveness is the same as Christ's, "even as Christ forgave." "And above all these things put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness." Love, divine love, which loves out of its own unfailing spring, and which never runs dry—this is the bond, the girdle, to bind together these other graces.

Then "Let the peace of God rule in your hearts, and let the word of Christ dwell in you." Just as our Lord says (Matt. 5 : 16) "Let your light so shine before men," etc. It is God who worketh in us by His Spirit; we cannot make these things to be, but when God makes our light shine, His peace rule, His word dwell, we are responsible not to hinder Him. But is it true that God's rule of peace has the full unlimited government of our hearts? Are we not sometimes inclined to make there a limited monarchy in which God may rule, but we must have a voice? And is not this as though we feared God was not fully to be trusted? as though our interests were not safe with him? It is "in one body" that we are called to this rule of peace. The exercise in daily renouncement can only exist where there are wills to cross our own, and thus the peace of God exists where we sink all personal considerations in the one great care for Christ, boldly merging all that is individual for the common welfare.

And the word of Christ. Let us give it room by bowing to its authority, against prejudice, experience, will. For it is only as the Word of Christ abides in us that we are strong to overcome the wicked one, and that from little children we become young men in Christ (1 John 2 : 14). If Christ's words abide in us, we shall ask what we will and it shall be done unto us (John 15 : 7); thus ver. 11 says, "richly in all wisdom." And surely this includes wisdom for our earthly occupations quite as much as our distinctly spiritual ones. Oh, if Christians would only believe how every detail of the life which God has created, and which he sustains, is provided for in the wisdom of His own word, that word would have more place in the office of the business man or the professional man, in the regulations of a household, in the government of a nation.

"But whatsoever ye do in word or deed"—if you buy or sell, or make up the ledger or send out the accounts, or attend the markets, whether you study or learn, work or waste, or mend or clean, receive visits or make them, read or write—do all in the name of the Lord Jesus.

Oh, that we understood aright the power and safety of the name of Jesus. The three last verses we have noticed all speak of gratitude. "Be ye thankful, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord, giving thanks to God and the Father by Him." Where the song of the heart dies out, or waxes feeble, something is wrong with the health of the soul. Thanksgiving and faith go hand in hand, and the one is but the expression of the other. In praising God for what He is, for what He does, for what He promises, we are grasping it all for ourselves in loving gratitude.

Paul now in his own practical way applies what he has said to the different relations of life, showing how what he has taught concerns them all in the most intimate manner. "Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as it is fit in the Lord." Oh, how many questions of difficulty are decided by these words. For God's sake, and Christ's sake, and the Gospel's sake, obey your husband. But then he desires me to do such and such a thing. If it is anything distinctly against the commandments of God, such as Sunday selling, untruths, etc., then you can tell him you will do anything "in the Lord," but nothing against His expressed will. "Husbands, love your wives, but be not bitter against them." But then my wife is so unjust, and she acts in every way to injure me. Love her until you have conquered her by love as Christ has conquered you; this is God's command.

"Children, obey your parents in all things." God writes this on the hearts of really Christian children. But if my father commands me to go to a ball, what must I do? Obey your father, but trust God to deliver you, and you will find that the very constraint exercised upon you will increase the distaste you have, and God will make your way, because you trust Him. "Fathers, provoke not your children to anger, lest they be discouraged." (Read Matt. 18 : 6, 10, 14). Then "servants obey in all things your masters according to the flesh; not with eye-service as men-pleasers," i.e. not just when your master and mistress are in sight, to relax immediately their back is turned, "but in singleness of heart. fearing God; and whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men." This is the root of the principle from which every Christian should act. Wives, obey your husbands unto the Lord. Husbands, love your wives. Children, obey your parents, i.e., unto the Lord.

The English Parliament was Prorogued August 15th. The Queen's speech delivered by commission alluded to the Berlin Treaty, and stated that England would insist on Turkey carrying out her arrangements. The Queen, while expressing pleasure at the recent important successes of the British arms in South Africa, confesses her sorrow at the sacrifice of precious lives occasioned by the war. An early peace on an enduring basis is predicted in the speech as the result of the late events.

A Fire Broke out at Serajevo, on Friday, August 8th, but was extinguished on Saturday after tremendous exertions by the men of the garrison. The fire destroyed 288 houses, 358 shops and 48 warehouses. It was caused by an accident, which occurred while the excise officers were sealing casks in a spirit warehouse. It is supposed that the damage will exceed $50,000,000.

The homeless people, who number over 10,000, are camped in the squares and gardens. A relief committee has been organized. The Emperor of Austria has forwarded $5000 in aid of the sufferers. It is said that 2000 of the inhabitants perished in the flames.

No Sabbath in Austria.—A Traveller writes: "Whatever else Vienna may have, she certainly has no Sabbath. Traffic, work, amusements, and worldly occupations, have gone on just the same on the seventh as on the sixth day. Continental Europe has virtually set aside the fourth commandment."

The Effect of Temperance Legislation in Ireland.—An act passed the British Houses of Parliament in August, 1878, dealing with the Sunday traffic of intoxicating liquors in Ireland. It was enacted that in five large cities houses licensed for the sale of drink should be closed during the greater portion of the day; and that in the rural districts, and in all towns and cities except the five before mentioned, the public houses should be closed all day on Sunday. It was predicted by the opponents of the bill that "the measure would be ineffectual, and that the aggregate amount of drinking would be increased."

The returns for the six months during which the act has been in operation have been published, from which it appears that in the five cities and towns exempted, but in which the hours have been shortened, there were during the six months previous to the spassing of the act 1976 arrests for Sunday drunkenness, and during the six months following 1268, being a reduction of thirty-five per cent. The returns for the rest of the country give 2364 and 707, respectively, for the same periods, being a reduction of seventy per cent.

More than Two Hundred Opium Smokers have been cured of their deadly habit within in six months, at Dr. Osgood's Hospital, in connection with the Foochow Mission of the American Board. This greatly tends to give the missionaries a good name for benevolence among all classes of the people.

The Pope has Bestowed his Blessing on M. de Lessep's Panama Canal scheme. He would have shown more prudence if he had withheld his blessing till he saw how it would go. The natural obstacles to the scheme are thought by American engineers who know most about it to be almost insurmountable, and there are financial difficulties in the way. In both of these departments God alone has the power to bless, and He does not grant His blessings through Popes, several of whom have been notoriously and infamously immoral.

Drunkenness in England.—Mr. J. B. Gough, in a letter to an English newspaper, thus describes the extent to which English society suffers from the curse of drink: "Since my arrival in this country last summer I have received many letters from gentlewomen—persons of education and refinement, ladies who belong to the aristocratic circles—confiding to me the story of ruined homes, broken hearts, tarnished careers, the writhings of unnecessary sickness, the horror of the maniac's death—revealing to me scenes perfectly appalling, all brought about by drink.

A gentleman, by his drunkenness, had dragged his wife, a lady of birth and refinement, from a high social position to one room in a low locality, a heap of rags for a bed, a box with a cup of weak tea and a piece of dry bread on it—six children, the youngest a babe fourteen days old. The very day they were visited, through a letter I received, he had taken the last blanket, and got a shilling for it. The poor children were without shoes—he had pawned them off their feet!

What shall I say of ravages among the lower classes—the rank-and-file? The subject is appalling. With my voice I can speak, but on paper words fail me. By day I walk this brilliant metropolis, and the keynote struck in every street is drink. At night alone, or in the vile quarters accompanied by a detective, I peep into the slums, and there behold sights or orgies which compel me to believe that drunkenness in England, among the lower classes, is far more prevalent now than it was twenty-five years ago. Mighty, mysterious, and midnight London is a vast and seething caldron, where the devil and his earthly agents brew the curse of England—drunkenness."

A Wife Lost at a Gambling Table.—A Jewish lady married a Jew in a town of Southern France in 1852. Shortly afterward her husband staked her at the gaming table, and lost. He absolutely wished to transfer her to his brother gambler, when she brought a criminal action against him, and he was condemned. The French law, in accordance with Roman Catholic views, decrees the separation of married couples, but will not divorce them, so as to permit either to marry again. However, the lady went to Rome, became a Papist, and was baptized, and thus finally obtained an annulment of her marriage under one of the special cases of the Roman Catholic code. She was then enabled to contract a legitimate marriage in the Pontifical States, while her husband was not able to marry again in France.

Mr. Cory, of Cardiff (the wealthy coal owner said at a public meeting recently in reference the "Salvation Army:" "Not only is it a salv tion army in name, but it is, thank God, a re salvation army. In my neighborhood there is valley with a large colliery district of some 40,0 inhabitants, and that 'Salvation Army' has com there. MR. JAMES BAIRD.

The Scotch Philanthropist.

Scattering and Increasing—His Father's Success—From the Pit to the University—Iron Working—Becomes Acting Manager of the Business—10,000 Employes—Enters Parliament—His Death—His Magnificent Gift—Public Opinion of Mr. Baird.

THE life of Mr. James Baird, the Scotch millionaire and philanthropist, was a practical illustration of the Scripture truth that "there is that scattereth and yet increaseth (Proverbs 11 : 24). He succeeded in attaining opulence in spite of his open-handed benevolence, and when at the height of his prosperity he gave away at one time a large fortune, it seemed to have no appreciable effect on his resources, for his ordinary and every-day benevolence flowed on as evenly as ever. Thus God rewarded this cheerful giver and gave him the means to continue the office and work of an almoner for Him.

Mr. James Baird's start in life was not of a superior character.

HIS FATHER,

Alexander Baird, was a respectable, well-to-do yeoman in the parish of Old Monkland in Scotland. In the year 1809 he took an old coal mine in the neighborhood, which he managed so successfully as to make it cover all working expenses and to leave a considerable overplus. Step by step he advanced in trade, success attending him in every enterprise he engaged in, till in the year 1816 he took the lease of the coal-field of Rochsolloch, which he put under the management of his son William, who had just attained his twentieth year. As the sons (eight in number) grew up, they were told off, one by one, to give assistance in this industrial undertaking.

James, the subject of this notice, was the fifth of the eight brothers—seven of whom, by the able guidance of their father and second brother, entered upon the coal and iron trade when it was, as far as the North was concerned, only in its very infancy. It is said that James, when a youth, as ever afterwards, was slightly lame, and on this account, perhaps, was often blamed as a sluggard. It must be borne in mind, however, that he was taken away from school at the age of twelve; so that the inclination to play, rather than to attend to the windlass, naturally lingered in him.

Sir Walter Scott's saying, that "as soon as a man gets his head above water he makes for the land" is strikingly verified in the rise of Alexander, the father of James Baird. For, from the position of holding a farm, the family has now risen to be one of the wealthiest in Scotland. Alexander Baird was a shrewd, clever man, and though his means were limited, he resolved to give his children the best education he could.

James, therefore, after being at the pit's mouth for some short time, was sent to and though possessing no special aptitude for study, he there had the benefits of the higher branches of education. The characteristics which formerly exhibited themselves in the sturdy little school-boy when under the care of Mr. Cowan, the parochial school-master of Old Monkland, did not leave him when he donned the cap and gown. His merry, rollicking disposition made him the general favorite with his fellow-students, and though his progress in book learning was not considerable, he nevertheless possessed an abundant store of good sound common sense and natural wit, which helped to compensate for the lack of book lore.

After a brief stay at the University, he was taken into partnership with his father and elder brothers. Clear-headed, persevering, and with rigid economy, the brothers worked with a will, and at this time they began dealing in coals. By dint of frugality, and a good output of coal, the firm made rapid advancement, and in a dozen years found themselves possessed of a considerable capital. About this time, William, one of the brothers, started a day-level pit at Rochsolloch, which, though carried on in a most unpretending manner, soon began to yield considerable profits. This may be regarded as a commencing epoch in the successful mining operations of the Bairds. A partnership was now formed between the father and sons to work the mines at Maryston and Gartsherrie.

IRON WORKING.

James entered with indomitable energy upon the work, and paid the strictest attention to the practical management of the concern, displaying those qualities which go to make a man of mark in the commercial world. In 1829, two blast furnaces of a humble character were erected for smelting purposes at Gartsherrie, and from that small beginning sprang this famous firm whose name is so well known in many mining districts. As these proved very profitable, additional blasts were erected, and then they established iron works in various districts of Ayrshire. At that period there were only seven blast furnaces in the whole of Scotland. Mr. Neilson was at this time bringing out his method of hot blast, but there were difficulties about it, which, however, James Baird skilfully succeeded in overcoming. Mr. Neilson could only succeed in raising its temperature to 300 degrees, but Mr. Baird improved it so as to reach a temperature of 1000 degrees.

In the year 1835 or 1836, Mr. Alexander Baird, the father of this enterprising family, died, and the concern, which had expanded from its narrow limits into gigantic proportions, was left in the hands of his sons. James, who had shown himself so thoroughly practical, now became the of the firm, and to his vigor and shrewdness much of its success may be attributed. Year by year new coal pits were opened, additional furnaces put in blast, and the number of employés greatly augmented, till recently the Gartsherrie Works turned out about 100,000 tons of pig-iron yearly, and give employment to between 3000 and 4000 bread-winners.

It must not be supposed, however, that the Bairds achieved this success without much difficulty, and in spite of many obstacles; for every new undertaking on the part of the brothers entailed very careful considerations, if not anxiety; but such was their success that they have transformed many quiet pastoral districts into busy haunts of men, constituing the black country of Scotland. The total number of furnaces connected with the various works is forty-two, producing on an average 700 tons of pig-iron daily. Altogether there are 10,000 men and boys employed by the firm. Mr. James Baird continued the active management of the vast works till 1862, when he retired from business, and Mr. A. Whitelaw, M.P., succeeded to his place as chief.

Perhaps one of the greatest achievements of this celebrated firm was the invention of the Coal-cutting Machine, in the perfecting of which Mr. James Baird spared neither time nor expense.

Though constantly engrossed in business, he found time to make himself acquainted with the

of the day, and in 1851 (the year of the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park, which was supposed to be a prognostic of universal peace) he was returned as a member of Parliament for the Falkirk district of Burghs, having won the golden opinions of his fellow-countrymen who elected him.

From an early period, but especially of late years, Mr. James Baird had exhibited the deepest concern for the comfort of the thousands of toilers in the employ of his firm. He set himself earnestly to work in the wholesome direction of improving the salubrity and comfort of their dwellings, as a matter intimately connected with their morality and well-being. He also promoted the religious education of the rising generation.

He at length retired from Parliament in 1857, and from that time he strenuously devoted himself to and it is well known how freely his money was given to build churches and schools in vario parts of the country.

He never forgot his humble origin. Indiff ent to earthly dignity and honors, which w from time to time offered to him, he was, though surrounded by wealth of such mag tude, plain James Baird. Beneath a somew rough exterior there was a warm heart which f for the woes of his less fortunate fellow-m and in a quiet, unostentatious way he deligh in bestowing his wealth in promoting religi education and assisting persons in distress.

After a brief tour to Paris, Mr. Baird taken ill in London, but recovered sufficiently proceed to his home at Cambusdoon. Here message came—"Set thine house in order, fo

THOU SHALT DIE."

His malady assumed a serious aspect, and, spite of the best medical skill, Mr. Baird, calm and "ready to depart," breathed his last in presence of his wife and sorrowing friends.

He was twice married. His first wife, Ch lotte, daughter of the late Mr. Robert Lockh of Castlehill, died in 1857, five years after t union. In 1859 he married Isabel Agnew H daughter of the late Admiral Hay, who survi him. There has been no family from eit marriage.

His name has come prominently before world as the donor of half a million of pou ($2,450,000) as a supplementary endowment the Established Presbyterian Church in S land.

In his trust-deed giving the magnificent he states that the reason of the gift is that h deeply impressed with the spiritual destitut prevailing among the poor and working pop tion of Scotland, the tendency to a depar from the truth, and to an exclusion of relig in the teaching of the young, while, at the s time, the means available by law are insuffic to provide for the faithful preaching and te ing of the Word of God.

PUBLIC OPINION.

The Western Standard in an obituary no of Mr. Baird said :—"His life furnishes ano notable instance of the influence which a C tian mother may exert in stimulating and mo ing the character of her children. The exa of Mr. Baird's mother in energetic and ord attention to the details of her household, especially in the careful inculcation, at fit seasons, of religious truth and precepts, was ductive of the best results. This contribute make him one of the most remarkable merc princes of the age, and one of the greatest b factors of his country."

"The sweet remembrance of the just Shall flourish when he sleeps in dust."

Among the various funeral sermons upo death, Dr. Marshall Lang said :—"Do we all know that as riches increase, the love money very often increases also? Men do always get more generous and liberal as they come more opulent. It is in many cases other way. The life gets to be bound up in possessions. It is perilous, very perilous feel money accumulating. Therefore tha God that I can put my finger on the care Mr. Baird, and realize that he had a Mast whose feet he counted it his duty and priv to lay the wealth which that Master had g him power to get."

The Rev. Dr. Scott said :—"He was a whom neither wealth nor distinction could vain. Possession was to him a great resp bility, but he used it as became a steward o goods of his Lord, not squandering it in s less luxury, but spending it with a purpose, giving it in charity when he saw some pros of doing good. Scarcely any man in his time ever parted with so much of his weal the way of benevolence, yet the widow in gi her two mites did not think less of her off than he did of his. It seemed to him but l when he was doing what all others thought g for he did good hoping for nothing again."

The Rev. Dr. Gillan said :—"Mr. Baird' tellectual, moral, social, and religious insti who had seen Christ crucified, and who doubt told Saul all about the darkening of the heavens, and all about the last groan, when He said, "Father forgive them."

That scene was still fresh in their memories, and yet Saul goes down to slay Christ's disciples. He said he was the chief of sinners, and it was no mock modesty when he said that. He was. He had been a murderer. When Stephen was slain, and the murderers wanted to be less impeded in their work, and they wished to take off their coats and lay them down, but did not dare to do so for fear some one would steal them, Saul says, "I will take care of the coats; lay them down at my feet." And Saul watched the coats and he watched the murderers. Ah, yes, he was, as he said, the chief of sinners.

It was a wonder when he fell from the horse that day that he did not break his neck. It was wonderful that his feet did not catch in the trappings of the saddle, and he was not dragged or kicked to death. He was the chief of sinners, and yet Christ saved him. Well, that gives courage to all our souls; mercy for the chief of sinners. Says some one in this house, "There is no mercy for me, I have sinned so long.'

Paul had sinned greatly, and for a long time. But, says another, "There is no mercy for me, for my sins are so aggravated." Paul's sins were very aggravated and he was saved; and we may

III. THE GRACE OF GOD CAN CONQUER THE PERSECUTOR.

Christ and Saul were boys at the same time in different villages, and Saul hated Christ, and he hated all Christ's disciples; and I find him, in the region of my text, with writs in his pocket, on the way to arrest Christians, impatient of the time it takes to feed the horses at the inn. There was no pulling at the snaffle, but with loose rein riding faster, faster.

He did not go as a constable may go to arrest a criminal, sympathetic all the time with him. He went to arrest Christians because he wanted them butchered. The Bible says, he "breathed out threatenings and slaughter."

Damascus of Bible times still stands, a population of 135,000 people. It is a gay of white and glittering architecture, domes, ninarets, and crescents playing in the light e morning sun, embowered in groves of e, and citron, and pomegranate ; a river ing its brightness into the sea. The an- s described it as a pearl surrounded with alds. A group of horsemen is seen to be ncing upon that city of Damascus. Let all hristians hide themselves, for the men in cavalcade going over the hill are persecu- The leader of the band is an insignificant- ng man, as sometimes you find a leader, there is an intensity in his eye, and his is lathered with the foam of a long and a travel of more than one hundred miles.

rist wrapped in the glories of heaven looked from a cloud, and no wonder the horses ed and the equestrians dropped. Bruised dust-covered Saul rises from the earth, ing his eyes as well as he can against the re lustre with his hand, but unsuccessfully, e is stricken stone blind.

s he cries out, "Who art thou, Lord?" the l answers, "I am Jesus whom thou perse- st. He who beats those Damascus Chris- s beats Me. It is not their back that is ding, it is Mine. It is not their heart that reaking, it is Mine. I am Jesus whom thou ecutest."

rom that wild and over-mastering scene s the greatest preacher of all the ages, Paul, in whose presence kings turned pale ; Paul, before whom prisons dropped down ; Paul, into whose hand the affrighted sea-captain gave the management of the Mediterranean corn ship ; Paul, whose epistles are the herald of a resurrection day.

Oh, that while we are hearing the discussion of this subject we might be very earnest ; heaven above us, hell beneath us, eternity before us, God all around us. Master, help!

First of all, I am impressed, in considering this subject, with the fact that

I. A WORLDLY DOWNFALL PRECEDES A SPIRITUAL UPLIFTING.

A man gets but little sympathy for falling from a horse. They say if he could not stay in the saddle he ought not to have gone there. But here is a proud man on horseback, government documents in his pocket, he a graduate from a celebrated school where Dr. Gamaliel had been a professor, he, the rider, having taken two titles of the three of the schools, Rab the first, Rabbi the second, on his way to Rabbac the third —a proud man—yet instantly precipitated to the ground. Without any chance of looking after his dignity, or concluding as to the best way he had better fall, he drops into the dust.

But that, my friends, was the most successful ride that Paul ever took. Out of the dust of the highway he rises to be the illustrious Apostle of the Gentiles. It is the same story in all ages of the world—the same story in your life.

O Christian! it was not until you had been unhorsed from worldly prosperity, and your property was gone, and your reputation gone, and ten thousand misfortunes came, and you dropped into the dust, not until all that that God by His grace lifted you into great spiritual elevation.

Joseph found his way to the Egyptian court through the pit into which his brothers threw him. Daniel would never have walked amidst the bronzed lions that adorned the Babylonish throne if he had not first walked amid the real lions of the cave. Paul marshals all ages of Christendom as he falls flat on his face on the road to Damascus.

My dear brother, you must come down before you can go up—down into the dust of humiliation, before you can rise into the elevation of the Gospel. While you are riding along in pomp and power, your feet firm in the stirrups and reins firm in hand, you cannot expect great spiritual elevation. No battle, no victory ; no cross, no crown. It is through much tribulation ye are to enter into the kingdom of God ; and while worldly downfall precedes spiritual elevation, I suppose you have noticed that often worldly prosperity preceded spiritual downfall.

II. RELIGION IS NOT A PUSIL

Many people in this day wo that religion is a good thing calibre, for women without ar and for children under six infant class, but not for s when I see Paul, the intell ages, surrendering his heart ing this religion, I know it mous thing.

Paul was a scholar of the h had learned all he could in th village where he was born. Then he went abroad and learned Greek and Hebrew, perfected himself in belles lettres, until in after days he confounded Athenians, Corinthians, and other Greeks by arguments from their own authors.

I do not read any thing in Sir William Hamilton's treatises that shows greater discipline of intellect than that in Paul's argument about justification. I do not read any thing in John Milton's "Paradise Lost" sublimer in imagination than Paul's description of fight against Athenian temptation, with the occupants of all the galleries of earth and heaven looking on.

There was nothing in Robert Emmet's plea for his own life, or Edmund Burke's arraignment of Warren Hastings in Westminster Hall, that equalled the scene when Paul stood before robed officials and made that speech beginning, "I think myself happy, King Agrippa, because I shall answer for myself."

I bless God that Christ has had His disciples in all ages among the eminent—Mozart and Handel in music, Raphael and Reynolds in painting, Kent and Marshall in the law, and Grotius and Washington in statesmanship ; and the time will come when this religion will conquer all the observatories, all the universities in the world, when philosophy shall in its laboratory see that "all things work together for good to them that love God," and with its geological hammer will discover the "Rock of Ages."

My friends, do not think of shrinking back because somebody laughs at your religion, telling you it is an effeminate and weak religion. If they do, just take out your New Testament from your pocket and show them the picture of this horse and rider in the dust, and ask the sceptic mocker what it was that affrighted the one and flung the other.

It is not a pusillanimous religion. Paul would not have adopted it if it had been. It is a mighty religion. It is "the power of God unto salvation."

One of the ablest men we have ever had in America was John McLean, Judge of the Supreme Court in the United States. He went to the church one Sabbath with his family, a mere critic and somewhat of a scorner, but that day the truth went to his heart.

On his way home he said to his wife, "We will have prayers as soon as we get home." "Well," said she, "we will have the kitchen, because in the parlor lawyers, and it would and to us."— have neve house

I hear the click of the hoofs on that road to Damascus. Can it be that horse will stop and that rider will ever be thrown? Yes. A voice from the heavens, louder than a thunderclap, utters two words, the second the same as the first, but more emphatic, so that the proud equestrian might have no doubt as to who was meant. "Saul! Saul!! why persecutest thou me?" That persecutor was saved by the grace of God; so may any persecutor.

I am not talking now in abstraction. There are as many persecutors in the world to-day as there has ever been. I know that the bayonets of Napoleon prized open the Inquisition; I know that the dungeons around Rome are mere curiosities now; I know that the Coliseum in which the wild beasts sucked up the blood of the martyrs, while the emperors watched from the gallery and clapped their hands as the Christians went down under the paw and tooth of the lion —I know that the Coliseum is in ruins. But there are persecutions now.

Why all who live godly in Christ must suffer persecution. Ask that young man in the store, who is trying to serve God, while all his companions are careless or infidels, if the day of persecution is past. Ask that young woman who loves God, and is trying to serve Him where father and brothers and sisters are careless if the day of persecution is past. Ask that wife who is trying to keep up her religious duties of reading and praying when her husband is antagonistic to all that is holy and good, ask her if the day of persecution is past. Ah, no, no!

Oh, friends, how does this persecution make you feel? Pray for those who persecute you. Paul was saved; that one in your own household who hates the Christian religion may be saved. Though he may be on a steed swifter and of higher metal, the grace ofGod can take it by the bit, hurl it back, and hurl it down. Oh, give your heart to God first, and, having thoroughly consecrated yourself to Him, you can endure any persecution.

IV. THE GRACE OF GOD IS SUFFICIENT FOR THE WORST OFFENDER.

It was outrageous for Saul to go down on that errand. I want to tell you why it was specially outrageous for Saul to do that. Christ had not yet been dead three years. Only three summers before Christ had walked those very streets where Saul was. The story of His suffering was fresh. It was not the old story that it is all be saved. There is no height that grace cannot scale, there is no depth its plummet cannot reach—there is no immensity it cannot compass.

I wish we all understood it that there is mercy for the chief of sinners. It may be in this vast and august assemblage, which I shall never meet again till "the books are opened," that there is some one not accustomed to frequent the house of God, and who may have come in here this evening disheartened and discouraged, thinking there is no mercy for him. I accost you, my brother. I give you my right hand in the invitation "Whosoever." Whosoever! Oh, what a wide gate that is—large enough to let this whole audience en masse enter the kingdom of God; a door so wide that the twelve hundred millions of the race might go in abreast. "Whosoever will, let him come."

I seem to see Saul rising on that road to Damascus, brushing the dust from his cloak, and wiping the perspiration from his excited brow, and then swinging out his hands towards all ages as he cries, "this is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief."

In my church in Brooklyn at the close of the service one day a man came from the back part of the house and sat down near the pulpit. I saw him waiting, so I came down at the close of the service, and asked him if he would not go in amongst those making inquiry for their souls. . He said, "No, sir, you cannot do me any good. I came from the far West, but you cannot do me any good. The Gospel is not for me—I am a victim of strong drink."

He said, "I won't tell you my name; you know it. I rose to be one of the first men of my State. I have a beautiful wife and beautiful children, but am bringing them all to ruin. I thought if I came here I could be saved, but find I can't. Yesterday I was coming down on the Hudson River train. There was a man sitting beside me with a flask of strong drink. He asked me if I would have some of it. I said no; but oh, how I wanted it."

"The arid tongue of the liquor seemed thrusting itself from the side of the cork, and I felt I must fly from that presence. I went to the platform of the train and thought I would jump off, but we were going at the rate of forty miles an hour and I came back. That thirst is on me and you cannot do me any good."

I said, "You do not know the grace of God; come in here and we will pray for you." We prayed for him, and I then went to the drugstore and said to the doctor, "Can you give this man any thing to help him to destroy that thirst?" Well, the physician put up a bottle to help him. I said, "Give him a little more,"

The police at this pe od were greatly on the alert, for the whole ci was in a state of political ferment—every su icious circumstance was inquired into. M ky Haley's wistful gaze and muttered words ca ht the attention of the constable on patrol, ar hence his inquiry. The sudden question, lo ly spoken, so startled Haley that he nearly le o his hold of the overhanging tree against w h he was leaning. If he had done so he w ld have fallen down two hundred feet, and ha e been dashed to pieces on the rocks beneath hi in the bed of the river.

aking down Haley's name and the date, the ceman said, "You may now go, my man, and e my advice and leave this. It will be better you to mind your own business and not to rfere with respectable people."

his same evening was one of note in the his- of the Young Ireland Confederacy. The s of successful revolution in nearly all the at cities of the Continent—in Paris, Vienna, lin, Milan, Modena, Rome, and elsewhere— after day in succession arriving, fanned into te heat the spirit of insurrection over Ire- d. Republican clubs sprang up by the score over the provinces, arms were extensively pared and purchased, and at the signal of ir leaders thousands at the moment would e joined the standard of revolt, especially in southern counties and in Dublin.

ohn Mitchell, in his newspaper, the United shman, declared the hour had struck for the ievement of Ireland's independence, and open- alled upon his adherents, and they were many, r the land to rise, and with blood and iron ert their freedom. He even published elabo- e instructions for street warfare, comparing various systems which had obtained in dif- ent continental cities; and greatly lauded ken bottles, burning sand, cold vitriol, and lten lead, as useful articles to be flung by triotic citizens, male or female, from window- ls and housetops upon hostile troops moving in street beneath them; and this while, in the ne paper, he continually addressed Lord Clar- don, the Lord Lieutenant at the time, and o, as is well known, was a most forbearing d merciful man, as "Her Majesty's Execu- ner-General and General Butcher in Ireland."

We have stated that Smith O'Brien, and those that sympathized with him, had far less violent views, and were disposed to use far less objectionable means than the Marat-like Mitchell; but even they, in spite of themselves, as it were, were borne on to extreme measures by the astounding tidings from the Continent—refugee kings in ignominious flight from their kingdoms, ancient thrones overturned, and provisional governments holding the reins of power. Those who had long held by constitutional expedients, and protested with all their might against bloodshed, now gave their voice for civil war, but contended that not now but in the autumn was the proper time for an outbreak, when, as they said, the crops would be saved, food in abundance over the land, and the people at leisure.

This resolve was come to by the leaders in Dublin after long debate, and on the same evening that Haley from his vantage ground had feasted his spiteful eyes upon Percival with terrible resolve, Lord Clarendon, fully aware from spies of all that was going on, determined to strike at once and hard, and O'Brien, Mitchell, and Meagher were arrested. No jury, however, could be got to bring in a verdict against the first and the last, and they were released, but Mitchell was kept for trial until a new Act to secure his conviction was passed through Parliament, "The Treason Felony Act"—a procedure extreme and harsh, and which nothing but the desperate condition of affairs could at all warrant.

The 22d of May, 1848, was a notable day in Green-Street Court-House, Dublin. Not since 1803, when Robert Emmet died on the scaffold for insurrection, had a prisoner for a similar crime been placed at its bar, that is, not until John Mitchell took his stand there on the day that has been mentioned. The trial lasted until the 26th, and he was found guilty. The court was thronged to its utmost limits, and hundreds of Mitchell's political friends and former fellow-students in Trinity College crowded the galleries and other parts of the building, for this misguided man, though coldly cruel and diabolical in his proposals towards his enemies, had, it is said, a warm heart, and possessed in a remarkable degree the power of inspiring personal attachment.

He received his sentence with composure, and addressed the court in words measured and defiant. When it was observed he was about to speak, a hushed and death-like silence fell upon the thronging multitude.

"My lords," he said, "I knew I was setting my life on that cast. The course which I have opened is only commenced. The Roman who saw his hand burning to ashes before the tyrant, promised that three hundred should follow out his enterprise. Cannot I promise for one, for two, for three, aye, for hundreds?" and as he spoke these last words he pointed to Francis Meagher, John Martin, Devin Reilly, and to others, his associates, whom he saw clustered in the galleries. A loud and rapturous cry rang through the building of "Promise for me, Mitchell! Promise for me!"

Even Percival, who was present, though he never admired Mitchell, held aloof from his acquaintance, and abhorred his proposed method of street warfare, carried away by the excitement of the moment, shouted out his name among the eager requests of those about him. Prudence had dictated to him more than once the wisdom of staying away altogether; but in the eager and tense state of public opinion in the city, he was drawn as by an irresistible spell to be present at the trial.

Hundreds shouting and rising up in all parts of the building, and stretching forth their hands wildly towards the bar, a few young men even pressing forward to embrace the prisoner; the officials in charge were given to think that a rescue was begun, and especially as it was known such a measure had been secretly discussed in the confederate clubs on the previous evening. Swords were drawn, bugles rang out in the street, soldiers, horse and foot, hurried up with clanging weapons at the double, and soon a gleaming and serried hedge of steel surrounded the Court-House.

A number of police flung themselves on Mitchell, tore him from the clasp of his enthusiastic friends, thrust him roughly down the steps which led from the dock to the cell beneath, and put him at once in irons, strong chains being passed from his wrists to his ankles. He was then borne into a police-van, standing ready at the outside gate—dragoons with flashing sabres swarming about it. At a signal, the cavalcade dashed off, taking, at a trot, the most unfrequented streets. The Liffey was soon reached; along the North Wall the gun sloop Shearwater had been morred from early morning, her furnaces aglow and her steam up. Mitchell was carried on board; he had scarcely touched the deck when the paddles moved; the war steamer, beating the waters into foam, set out full speed for the open sea, and in a few hours the hills of his native land were lost, and that for years, to the view of the political exile.

Mitchell's conviction astounded the Confederates, and the tidings that he was gone caused a cry of rage to go up from "the clubs" over the country. Smith O'Brien and Meagher's abstention from any attempt at rescue, and those who had sided with them in that resolve, was stigmatized as cowardice. To prove the falsehood of the charge, they weakly suffered themselves to be moved to hurry on and head a revolt, and hastened to the south to put themselves in command of the various armed bands which had been long in training—we know, however, with what a feeble result. When the hour for action really came, the courage of blatant rebels oozed as from their finger ends, only a few hundred ragged and unarmed peasants alone obeyed the call of O'Brien.

A skirmish with a few police occurred at Ballingang farm-house, Tipperary; "The battle of the cabbage garden," as it has been called in ridicule, was fought. O'Brien's braver compatriots, dismayed by the bullets of half a dozen constables, scampered off, and, with one or two honorable exceptions, deserted their leader. Thus abandoned, Smith O'Brien was compelled to follow their example, became a fugitive upon the Tipperary hills, and in a few days, driven by hunger and exposure, was forced to make surrender and was placed in custody. In due course he was tried and convicted in Clonmel. Doomed to death, his sentence was commuted to transportation, and speedily he was on his way to the same exile which had overtaken Mitchell.

When insurrectionary movements are afoot, and the leaders are at bay, even though it is believed by the many that success is impossible, the public mind is greatly excited, and timid persons in thousands give way to panic. Then is the harvest time of spies and informers, and too often those in power, urged by the cries of the weak and passionate for vengeance, give way to measures that savor of oppression and revenge. The authorities had been incisive and vigorous in their treatment of John Mitchell, because they knew of his unscrupulous designs, and of those, his sworn adherents, who adopted his views. Neither he nor they would have scrupled to carry out their plans, if judged expedient, by the most sanguinary methods.

There were some of those men who would not have hesitated to anticipate the horrors, in after times, of the Paris Commune—horrors which paled the cheek of Europe—palaces of art, museums, libraries, reduced to ashes, houses by the hundred in ruin, and streets crimsoned and slippery with blood. It is an ascertained fact that on the night before John Mitchell's conviction swift messengers hurried to and fro between the Confederate Clubs in Dublin—anxious negotiations were carried on—earnest interviews were held between the heads of sections—desperate plans of operation were discussed, and it was all but resolved to make an onslaught in irresistible mass upon Green-Street Court-House on the following day, there pistol or poniard all who resisted, and from the very presence of the judges bear off Mitchell in triumph, and instal him president provisionally of the Irish Republic.

Meagher, Gavan Duffy, and those followers who thought with them, set their face as a flint against all such reckless schemes; and it was not until far beyond midnight that their more moderate counsels prevailed, and the city was saved from a furious yet organized assault that would have eventuated in frightful massacre. Mitchell disposed of, and in the manner which has been narrated, did not, however, set the Government at rest. The Young Ireland Confederation, like the hydra of old, had many heads; and in the very act of cutting off a remaining one there was a strange impulse to a fresh creation. Mitchell's conviction and banishment did not by any means cow his followers; it seemed for a time as though it but called to life an insatiate cry for vengeance; bold and fearless men offered themselves to head a revolt, and hundreds—it may be said thousands—for a few days eagerly declared themselves ready at any moment to follow the standard of insurrection. To meet the crisis, at one sitting the English Parliament—an act almost unprecedented—suspended the Habeas Corpus Act. The hour this determined measure was officially ascertained in Dublin Castle warrants of arrest were issued.

A GOSPEL SERVICE IN CHINESE IN NEW YORK.

An interesting meeting was held at the Mission-House, 14 Mott street, New York, on Sunday, August 17th, when a service wholly in the Chinese language was held by Mr. Jackson, an English missionary who has been laboring for two years in Canton. Mr. Jackson has been in this country only since June, and it was his intention to enter into work among Chinese in the West, but finding so large a field in this city he determined to work here. His wife, whom he married in China, is the daughter of a Wesleyan minister; she has been in the city but a few days and will assist him hereafter in his missionary labors.

The night being rather inclement, a small number of Chinamen were present, beside a very few whites. The hymn "Rock of Ages" was sung in Chinese, Mrs. Jackson playing the organ accompaniment, Chinese hymn-books being used. These books were printed in Foo Chow, and contain selected hymns, a few Moody and Sankey songs being among them. The words only are printed, as Chinese written music is very peculiar, and entirely different from ours. The Chinese members of the mission are taught the tunes by ear, and pick them up very readily.

Mr. Jackson delivered a short Chinese prayer, and "Hold the Fort" was sung, the whites singing in English, and Mr. Jackson and his flock in Chinese. The leader then read the twentieth chapter of St. John from a Chinese Testament, the others following him. Books were passed to all, Chinese and whites, impartially.

After another hymn, Mr. Jackson delivered a short sermon in the Chinese language upon the resurrection, making his remarks very explicit and elaborate in order to reach the mental capacity of his hearers. The latter paid close attention, and from their faces they seemed to understand the points of the sermon very clearly.

"Pass Me Not" was then sung, another prayer was offered, and the Doxology was sung and the benediction pronounced, all in Chinese. A general conversational meeting was then held, similar to an inquiry-meeting in Methodist churches. Quite a religious feeling has been excited among some of these men, and Mr. Jackson expresses great satisfaction at the progress of the work. He says that even in Canton he did not have so large a number of adults in constant attendance on the meetings. The neighbors cause him a good deal of annoyance, and the policemen detailed to protect the place are in many cases a protection in name only.

The congregation on Sunday night was made up of persons of all ages, from a boy of apparently ten years of age to an old man of fifty or more. A very few wore the dress of Europeans and had discarded the pigtail, but the majority wore the "regulation" blouse and had their queues wound around their heads. Ah Kee and his brother, Ah Fouy wore blouses of a very light-colored linen, almost white, elegantly launderied and fastened with gold clasps. The others wore blouses of dark blue or black cloth. Some of the Chinamen had come from as far as Seventieth street, through the rain, and are constant attendants.

NATIONAL CALAMITIES.

An Address by Rev. Henry Varley, on the Distress now Prevailing in Great Britain.

"The Lord saith to the great rain of His strength, Be thou on the earth."—Job 37: 6.

Nations are Judged in Time, not Eternity—England's Responsibilities—Paris's Chastisement in 1870—Causes of England's Present Adversity—1. Commercial Depression—2. Absence of the Sun—3. Costly Wars—4. Financial Losses—5. Other Losses—Drunkenness—Gambling—Luxury—The Comedie Francaise—Our Lord's Second Advent at Hand—Repentance Needed.

Ten years of world-wide depression and national adversity in England. What does it mean? Three months of almost incessant rain and sunless skies. How comes it? Is it a result of the attraction of the deadly upas trees of national iniquity, that have grown thick and fast during the past twenty years? Hearken! God speaks, "And the thick cloud is turned about by His counsels: that they may do whatsoever He commandeth them upon the face of the earth in the world. He causeth it to come, whether for correction, or for His land, or for mercy" (Job 37: 12, 13). I desire on this occasion to call your attention to the necessity that exists for confession and humiliation before God on account of our sin as individuals, as members of the Church of Christ, and as a nation.

I venture to submit some considerations that I think should be specially remembered at this time. Believing, as we do, that the living God is the moral governor of the universe, and that the nations of the earth owe allegiance to Him, and submission to His will, it is absolutely essential that we should understand "that the face of the Lord is against them that do evil," and that "it is an abomination to kings to commit wickedness, for the throne is established by righteousness." All human experience, all national history declares that iniquity is out of harmony with the nature of things, and that unrighteousness culminates only to be utterly overthrown.

So far as we can see, there is no platform for THE JUDGMENT OF NATIONS, as such, in eternity; nor can we fail to note, in the overthrow of Assyria, Egypt, Greece, Rome, and Israel, the unmistakable proofs that nations are judged in time. Setting themselves against righteousness, the stern, yet majestic question, "Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with thee, which frameth mischief by a law?" has had in these nations an awful and unmistakable answer. It has been well said—

> "Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small."

These thoughts force themselves to the front when, at this time of adversity, we consider England's national position in relation to righteousness and iniquity. Is she rejecting the former? Is she embracing the latter? I am not speaking of individuals now, but of the nation. How does the Lord view this great country in the all-important questions of national righteousness, commercial honesty, and national influence? Without egotism, it may be said that England is the representative nation of the earth. Her men, her mind, her money, and her commerce in the main govern and guide the world. Her power is the might of a highly civilized and intellectual people, and she has gradually come to her meridian life, side by side with an open Bible and the wonderful privilege of the dispensation of the Holy Spirit. No other nation on the face of the earth has known to any thing like the same extent, these high things.

At such a time as this the question forces itself to the front, what has England done, and what are her people doing in the light of these privileges? and of His government who said, "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted t heaven with privilege, shalt be thrust down t hell." Capernaum knew the unique responsi bility of being the residence of the Son of Go for three years. In her utter overthrow, in he unknown site lies the complete fulfilment of ou Lord's unchanging words. Is England in lik manner to reject the light, and in like manne sink down into the darkness and corruption o national decay?

The Word of God abundantly shows tha national iniquity and unrighteousness meet and merits the judgment of God. Notice, fo example, the passages in Deuteronomy 28, Jere miah 23: 10, Psalm 107: 34.

Let these suffice to show that the God o heaven withholds personal, national, and provi dential blessings, such as health, increase, sun shine, rain, harvest, national prosperity and in fluence, on account of national sin. Nay, more that the locust and the palmer worm, the bligh and the mildew, pestilence, war, and famin may, and do, become His servants in the grea fact of national chastisement.

NATIONAL SOWING AND REAPING.

How often in human history these latter hav been as a deep pit dug by the very people tha afterwards have fallen into them and perishe In graphic language, "They have sown to th wind and reaped the whirlwind."

Nations sow to the flesh, and of the flesh rea corruption. Think for a moment of Paris pric to the declaration of war with Germany. Trut compels us to affirm that the splendor of h architecture and social show was far exceeded her moral corruption. Truly "she was far an away beyond all others" the metropolis of lice tiousness. When the Parisian courtesans accon panied the soldiers of the Napoleonic empire the Franco-German war of 1870, thoughtful me said, "The time of ripened corruption is com and the judgment of the Empire and of France at hand."

A few months, and the harvest came; it wa reaped in national discomfiture—the overthro of all her armies; in the girdling band of ir around Paris. Horseflesh was sold at 10 fran per kilogramme; her inhabitants wan, haggar and exhausted; Germany's victorious legio paraded her splendid Boulevards, and dictat the conqueror's terms. Has France learnt—w England learn—that in the nature of thing "To work for good is to work against evil?"

In taking a rapid survey of some of the prin pal items of England's national adversity and causes, we mention first:

1. Commercial depression, covering every partment of national industry, lowering o trade, and causing much poverty and distress.

2. The absence of the sun in its brilliant pow jeopardizing our flocks and herds, our hay, cor fruit, and cereal crops, and which if continu means the loss of many millions of money a the greatly enhanced price of the necessaries life. Even should this not continue any long the losses in the hay crop are already very se ous.

3. The costly and unrighteous wars in which have been engaged, identified as they are wi huge armaments and naval forces, which oppr the national exchequer, and, what is worse, ide tify our country's glory and greatness with t barbarities of war.

4. Financial losses, the outcome mainly of t greed of speculation, results (I had almost sai of a vast system of deception and fraud, that h permeated our public institutions under the ing title of legitimate business, wherein boa of directors and heads of business houses ha speculated with other people's money as th never would have dreamed of speculating had been their own.

5. Losses of the Vanguard, the Eurydice, icess Alice on the river, and the gentle in- e of the palace; the lives sacrificed at Isan- dhi; the tens of thousands of Chinese that we ghtered in that land whose ports by force of s we opened for the introduction, sale, and ney profits of the deadly drug, opium. Could ore striking reproach be uttered than that veyed in the words of Dr. Morley Punshon, he report of the Wesleyan Missionary So- y, read by him at the recent annual meeting xeter Hall? "All through China the brethren deplore the blight of the opium traffic—a ter national calamity than famine—a calami- hich enlightened heathens are urging a Chris- nation, which first imposed it upon them, to ve." he hundreds of thousands of our own coun- nen that have fallen and are falling into the dage, depravity, and death of runkenness. The loss to national righteous- s by reason of the blasphemy and filthy lan- ge, so common that you cannot walk the ets without having your ears assailed with nclean lawlessness. The loss that is caused he desecration of the Lord's Day. The loss ational virtue and chastity by reason of the sisterhood of death, who eat, drink, sleep, ss, walk, and live for one ghastly issue—to ite to lust—in the awful language of the rd of God, "to hunt for the precious life." these things, should not the land be clothed abiliments of mourning?

he loss entailed by thousands of guilty men are partners in London's nightly pandemo- m. These line our best streets; a sickening wd, of whom it must be written in the strong guage of Peter concerning these days: laving eyes full of adultery, and that cannot se from sin." Men whose moral power has n sinned away; the slaves of the most de- ding passions that ever cast down and de- oyed "many strong men."

he loss entailed by trifling with, and the non- orcement of our national laws against gam- g. In the degrading vice of betting, indulged lmost universally. In the selfishness, pride, ury, license, and excess that mark the dress, ipage, houses, furnishings, converse, reading, l habits of the great majority of the people. ely the words of Theodore Monod apply with ce in our day. "Ask yonder sun, 'What art u doing?' and he will answer, 'The will of d;' those waves of ocean, and they will wer, 'The will of God;' tiny flower drinking he dew, 'What art thou doing?' and it will wer, 'The will of God.'"

But man—highest of God's creation—listen me. What art thou doing? Is not the answer s:—"What I choose. I please myself; I do l will, and assert my independence of God, as ugh He were not." It is not the fool in our that saith "There is no God," but the in- igent, the educated, and refined. Neither is ominable iniquity confined to the degraded l ignorant, but it is endorsed and committed h greediness by many of England's foremost s.

And shall not the heavens be laden with a se and sable cloud? Should not, ought not, light of the sun to be shut off from scenes ghastly and so terribly true?

May there not be another side—God's side— this question of England's adversity? What er commercial depression has hindered her ral degradation and revolution? Can we k back upon the years 1865 to 1870 with com- cency? More than this—Was it prosperity? ue, vast sums of money were made; but how re they spent? Mainly in luxury, excess, and tous living.

I well remember at that time a colliery pro- ietor near Wigan telling me he had three pits en, and from them one third less in quantity s being taken out than from two of those pits o years before. When I asked the cause, he id, "We never think of opening the pits for rk on Mondays now. On Tuesday a few men me; a larger number on Wednesday and Thursday; but we never get all our hands to work until Friday. The men earn 10*s.* in eight hours, and they make three days out of Friday and Saturday; draw the 30*s.*, and are off to the public house; the family and home is utterly neglected."

Durham and the surrounding localities became a plague spot for English drunkenness and criminality. I ask, Was that success? Strikes were the order of the day. The gulf between capital and labor was never wider than in 1865 to 1870. Workingmen talked treason, nor hesitated to say that the Prince of Wales should never sit on the throne of England. The international committee was intensely active, and a social upheaving among the workingmen was going on through England, the Continent, and America.

Among the rich an extravagance of display, an ostentatious vain show, became as common and as hollow as the mirage of the desert on a summer's day.

The bubble was fairly pricked when "the Empire" fell and Napoleon subsided to the quiet of Chislehurst. How large and inflated it was may be gathered from the fact that the foul gases of a selfish and luxurious abundance, the unholy and unjust rush after money among all classes, have needed ten years of world-wide adversity to reduce and check, much less exhaust.

A CHANGE NEEDED.

I for one am not by any means sure that we as a nation could bear the return of prosperity, or that we either are or ought to be, on the eve of a change. It is not a change of weather we need so much as a change of national life. The moon affects us less than our morals. The moral atmosphere is charged with heavy banks of clouds, labelled thus by God: "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come, for men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, drunken, disobedient to parents, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God, having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof" (2 Timothy 3).

Let us not forget that it is at this very time that a large proportion of what are called the "upper classes" have been pouring out thousands of pounds, and endorsing with rapturous applause the finished acting of those who have lent their extraordinary gifts to throw a charm around licentiousness. Vice has been put upon the stage in magnificent form—bouquets of splendid flowers have rewarded the successful and beautifully attired exponents of "Le Demi-Monde." Vice is no longer

> "A monster of such hideous mien,
> That to be hated needs but to be seen."

'Tis simply exquisite and delicious in the setting of "La Comédie Française." Think what the moral appetite must be of those who applaud to the echo scenes of which the Times speaks in these words: "Throughout the 'Demi-Monde' we are made intensely to feel that we are in le panier des pêches à quinze sous. We breathe the atmosphere, live the lives, are made conversant with the shifts and shabbinesses, the lies and evasions, the tricks and deceptions, the unnameable pasts, the miserable presents, the hopeless futures of that unavowed and unavowable society, where every closet hides a skeleton, and every face wears a mask."

'Tis a wretched story where, under the holy name of love, unclean, villainous lust is portrayed to excite most certainly the worst passions of the elegantly attired audience. Is vice comic? Should not the heavens be overcast? Ought the sun to shine or England's commercial depression be overpast when prosperity means high-handed iniquity?

THE LAST DAYS OF THIS DISPENSATION have indeed arrived, and many prophetic signs conspire to show us that the Second Advent of our Lord, to end this dispensation and commence His millennial reign over this earth, may probably take place within the next few years.

This much is clear to us, England's sin is our sin, not for partnership in commission, but for deep sorrow and confession before the Lord.

This much is clear, also. That true patriotism and Christian character must not only be humbled in the dust, but fired with the holy zeal of intercession for this guilty nation, even as Daniel and Abraham were. And future experience may make this clear that it is the will of God to humiliate England until she learns that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom, and that His face is set as a flint against national iniquity.

Finally, this also is clearly revealed. The Mighty God whose throne is heaven, whose footstool is the earth, speaks: "Therefore also saith the Lord, turn ye to Me with all your heart, and with fasting, and with weeping, and with mourning, and rend your heart, and not your garments, and turn unto the Lord your God: for He is gracious and merciful, slow to anger and of great kindness, and repenteth him of the evil. Who knoweth if he will return and repent, and leave a blessing behind him; even a meat offering and a drink offering unto the Lord your God?

"Blow the trumpet in Zion, sanctify a fast, call a solemn assembly: gather the people, sanctify the congregation, assemble the elders, gather the children and those that suck the breasts: let the bridegroom go forth of his chamber, and the bride out of her closet. Let the priests, the ministers of the Lord, weep between the porch and the altar, and let them say, Spare Thy people, O Lord, and give not Thine heritage to reproach, that the heathen should rule over them: wherefore should they say among the people, Where is their God?"

"And I will restore to you the years that the locust hath eaten, the cankerworm and the caterpillar, and the palmerworm, My great army which I sent among you. And ye shall eat in plenty, and be satisfied, and praise the name of the Lord your God, that hath dealt wondrously with you; and My people shall never be ashamed; and ye shall know that I am in the midst" not of Israel only, but of England (Joel 2: 12–17).

[The foregoing address, although it has at the present time a special reference to England, may be read with profit by the people of other nationalities. It inculcates the doctrine with which we are familiar in the history of God's ancient people, the Jews, but which this generation seems to have forgotten, namely, that national sin brings down from God, national chastisement.]

HOW TEETOTALISM ACTS.

SIR W. KING HALL an Admiral in the British Navy, said recently in the course of an address: "There are several ways in which I find teetotalism is looked at. I will give one of them. One Sunday, about two years ago, in London, I saw a man surveying his ten hansom cabs, evidently very proud of them. I soon got into conversation with him, and put this question to him, 'Have you any of your drivers teetotallers?' 'Ah,' he said, 'I don't like them; I hate them!' I thought I must get at this, and find out what he meant. What do you think his answer was? 'I'll tell you why. When my men in the other cabs earn my money, they go to the "public" and begin to spend a little for themselves, and give the horse a spell of rest; but as for these teetotallers, they keep the horses running long after they have got the money to pay me, in order that they may pocket some for themselves.'

"Before my present appointment I was superintendent in Devonport Dockyard. When the apprentices have served their time they are brought before the Admiral-superintendent and their character and loss of time stated before they are put on the establishment as men. On this occasion I was gratified to find that in the whole of the seven years there was only one young fellow who had lost half a day's time. I was surprised. I said, 'This is very good. Now I have one advice to give you, my lads. You will all go on the establishment now, and I hope that you will be teetotallers, as I am.' Their reply was 'We all are teetotallers. We have never been any thing else all our lives.'"

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Proceedings of the Democratic Conference at Niagara have been watched with interest by the country at large. To the surprise of many politicians it was evident that the influence of Tammany was less potent than the influence of the opponents of the great Democratic organization, and the Tilden party carried all the decisions. The inference generally drawn from the fact is that Mr. Tilden intends making a strong effort to carry the State at the fall elections. This course is unexpected, but is thought to have been the result of strong representations made to Mr. Tilden by Democrats in the West that if he hopes for the Democratic nomination in 1880 he must be able to show that his own State is secure.

The contest in Ohio is being fought with vigor on both sides. Secretaries Sherman, Schurz, and ex-Attorney-General Taft have made speeches in different cities of the State, defending the policy of the Administration. There is a decided feeling prevalent that the issue in Ohio will be regarded as an indication which party will have the responsibility of guiding the policy of the nation for a Presidential term.

Reports from Mississippi state that if Jefferson Davis can be prevailed upon to serve he will be sent to Washington as Senator for that State.

A Boston Physician Killed on the Swiss Mountains.—Dr. Mosely, a young physician from Boston, Mass., had safely accomplished the ascent of the Matterhorn on August 15th. On returning, and when near the cabin which is used as a resting place, he loosened himself from the rope uniting him to his companions. He had hardly done so when he made a false step, lost his footing, and glided rapidly down the steep ice slope, making frantic efforts to stop himself by grasping at projecting rocks. The next moment he disappeared over the precipice, falling on the glacier opposite Riffel, between Hoernli and the St. Theodule Pass, where the body lies, completely stripped of clothing by the rapidity of its descent. The body can be distinctly seen from below, lying on a projecting ledge of ice. An expedition for the recovery of the body was about to start when the telegram was despatched.

The sad event reminds us how on the mountains of life there are slippery places where if a false step is made it leads to swift and terrible destruction.

The Yellow Fever at Memphis has made progress during the last week, the new cases becoming more numerous. The place is now almost completely isolated. Dr. Mitchell, physician of Memphis, describes the city as wholly cut off from the world. There are no trains running into or out of the town, and no steamboats land there. The supplies are all brought down the river on barges, which are dropped by the steamboats a couple of miles above the city and allowed to float down. When they arrive at the city, men in skiffs or tugs secure them and bring them to the landing. This rigid seclusion has thus far prevented the spread of the disease.

Contributions in aid of the suffering city are invited, and boxes have been set in the public places of the chief cities to receive the nickels of sympathizers. During Thursday, August 21st, $51 were so collected in the box at the New York Post Office.

Mr. D. L. Moody's New Work.—The Corner-stone of a new school building which Mr. Moody proposes to erect in the northern part of the village of Northfield, for furnishing academic instruction to pupils, was laid August 21st. Mr. Sankey was present and led the singing. He has recently been on a visit to the home of his childhood in Western Pennsylvania. Mr. Moody officiated at the laying of the corner-stone, using a trowel which was used by his father. Among the articles placed underneath the stone were Mr. Sankey's voice, "in Hold the Fort," phonographically preserved on sheet tin-foil ; a piece of the grave-stone of the Rev. Benjamin Doolittle, the first minister in Northfield, who died 130 years ago ; a photograph of Moody's birthplace, yarn spun by Moody's mother 50 years ago, a copy of "Gospel Hymns," a Bible contributed by B. W. Jenkins, a Baltimore merchant, and a set of American coins. The academy is to be solely for the education of young ladies preparing for college.

The Ocean Grove Camp Meeting.—15,000 worshippers congregated in tents, hotels, and cottages are making the annual camp-meeting of the Methodist Church more than usually intersting by their devout participation in the services. The services August 19th opened with a conversation meeting, followed by a family Bible reading. At 9 A.M. the Rev. and Mrs. Palmer led the young people's meeting in the tabernacle. The opening sermon of the ten-days' camp meeting was preached before a vast congregation in the auditorium by the Rev. Bishop Harris. This was followed by an experience and praise meeting, under the leadership of Mrs. Lizzie Smith.

Conversion of a Sioux Indian.--Truth-Teller is the name of a Sioux Indian recently converted in Dakota Territory under the teachings of Bishop Hare of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The bishop states that the following account of his conversion is strictly correct : "Upon the occasion of the bishop's visit, and at one of his councils with the Indians, who had gathered to hear the Great Spirit man talk, Truth-Teller, who was present, suddenly arose in the midst of the people and advanced to the front, shook hands with the bishop, and then stepping back a few feet and drawing himself up to his full height, in a clear, ringing voice, which at once indicated the deep earnestness and bravery of the man, he declared his purpose to abandon all Indian ways, and to adopt those of the white man—to give up all heathen rites and ceremonies and worship only God ; and then, to attest his sincerity, took from his scalplock a war eagle feather—that ensign of bravery and of many years of savagery—and, handing it over to the bishop, said : 'I give to you this war eagle feather ; take it, and keep it in remembrance of the words of Truth-Teller,' and then, with an eloquent impressiveness that touched my heart as it never was touched before, he presented the bishop with the drum of the Order of the Grass Dance, and continued, 'I part with the feather and the drum and all Indian ways forever.'"

A Girl-Sailor Navigated a Ship Safely into San Francisco Harbor August 7th. The Templar, on her voyage from New York to San Francisco, was in danger of being lost owing to the captain and first mate with many of the crew being suddenly attacked by yellow fever on the voyage. Her safety is in reality due to the brave conduct and unfaltering devotion of Miss Armstrong, daughter of the captain. The second officer was a good seaman, but not a navigator, and Miss Armstrong offered to navigate the ship if he would take the observations. This was done—the second mate, taking the sun, hurried below with his sextant, and Miss Armstrong, weak and debilitated as she was, worked up the latitude and longitude, doubled Cape Horn, and finally brought the ship in safety to the Farallones. Captain Armstrong acknowledges that if it had not been for his daughter's indomitable will and perseverance the Templar would never have reached the Golden Gate.

The First Pastor of an Exclusively Colored congregation in this country died at Tarrytown, N. Y., Aug. 17th, at the ripe age of eighty years. An enthusiastic lover of the negro race, Rev. Simon S. Jocelyn devoted himself to their spiritual as well as their material welfare. He supported himself by his trade as an engraver, and gave to his work as a pastor his time and money without stint. He was much beloved by his people, and goes to his reward followed by the blessings of many who owe to his unwearied efforts, under God, their eternal salvation.

The Stewart Grave Robbery has Again been forced on public attention. It was generally believed that the corpse of the deceased millionaire stolen from St. Mark's Church-yard last November, had been recovered, and it was rumored that $50,000 had been paid by Judge Hilton for its surrender. The belief was confirmed by the fact that the magnificent mausoleum in course of erection, at Garden City, for the reception of Mr. Stewart's body, was fast approaching completion. Even Mrs. Stewart shared in the general belief that Mr. Hilton had regained possession of her deceased husband's remains.

It now appears that the thieves still hold thei ghastly booty, which they conveyed immediately after the robbery, to Montreal, whenc they write instructing a New York lawyer t open negotiations for its surrrender. They demand $250,000 as the price of their prey, an with calm audacity deprecate the employmen of the police in the case. They say the questio concerns only "the man who has Mr. Stewart' money and the man who has Mr. Stewart' body." They are mistaken ; the public is concerned that so vile an outrage should not go unpunished.

A New Mode of Raising Money for a Church --A few of the ladies of the Congregation Church of Marysville, Ohio, have prepared cookery book, and have realized a profit upo its sale thus far of $3.500. With this mone they have furnished an attractive brick church and still have several hundred dollars left for parsonage fund.

Twenty-nine Lives Saved.—A Crowd of Boys were playing on board of a lighter moored in the East River, New York, on August 12th, when a little boy thirteen years of age fell into the river between the lighter and the dock. It was known that the little fellow could not swim, and his companions, horror stricken, began to scream for help. Gilbert Long, the famous life saver, was doing patrol duty at the time, and hearing the cries hurried to the spot. Climbing down the dock, he hung to the piles, neck deep in the water, and with his unoccupied arm held on to the drowning lad. In a few minutes the drowning boy was on the pier. This is Gilbert Long's twenty-ninth rescue of life.

Gilbert Long is one of the three newsboys who formed the nucleus of the life-saving society of New York. Some time ago these boys came to the conclusion that the spare time spent in loafing around street-corners might be spent more advantageously near the river where accidental drowning is a frequent occurrence. They formed a society, of which "Nan the newsboy" is president, and the members patrol the warves and docks every evening, on the lookout for cases in which their services are needed. They are expert swimmers and have succeeded in saving many lives.

A Prodigal's Return.—An Aged Gentleman, formerly a draper in John Street, New York, now resides at the city of Elizabeth. He was one of the founders of the Bethel for Seamen in New York, and one of the first to inaugurate the Fulton Street Prayer-meeting, of which he was a faithful attendant. His son John who was a source of trouble to his father, left his home in [illegible], and for many years led a life of infamy and debauchery. He was recently induced to sign the pledge, and by divine help was enabled to keep it. After a year's probation, during which he remained faithful, he resolved to "arise and go to his father."

Taking with him a few of his temperance friends, he went to the old mansion in Elizabeth and told his tale to his father. The scene can not be described. It was a real prodigal returning to his father's house. When the old man saw his son standing before him he went to him and threw his arms around his neck, kissed him, and wept like a child. It was a scene that will be long remembered by all who were present.

Widows' Offerings.—A Lady went into the Protestant Episcopal "House of Mercy" in Philadelphia lately and handed the person in charge $500, saying she wished it to be invested for the use of the institution. When asked her name she refused to give it, and requested that the gift should be acknowledged simply as from "A Widow."

Mr. Spurgeon related recently a similar instance of a widow's munificence as having occurred in his own experience. He said he well remembered a little old woman, poorly dressed, coming into the vestry some years ago at a time of great straits, which not a soul in the world knew, not even a deacon of the church; and she said to him, in the most strange way, "Thus saith the Lord, behold I have commanded a widow woman there to sustain thee." She put down £50 ($245) on the table, vanished, and he has never seen her since. He never knew her name even, and never should, perhaps, until the day of judgment He supposed she would be in heaven now; it was some years ago, and she was very old then. Things had happened so, and his impression was that they would occur again.

A Home in a Prison.—For Twenty-five Years a woman has been a voluntary prisoner in the Tombs in New York. Fifty years ago Mary Valentine was a handsome, intelligent girl in this city. But she became connected with idle, dissolute companions, and her subsequent career illustrates the truth of the apostolic warning that "evil communications corrupt good manners" (1 Cor. 15 ; 33). She became addicted to the vice of drunkenness, and was frequently sentenced to terms of imprisonment for her disorderly conduct. While in prison, separated from her associates and restrained from indulgence in the liquid fiend, her whole demeanor altered and she became gentle, womanly, and lovable. But when she was released she fell again under the power of her old habits, in spite of the good resolutions formed in confinement.

One day some twenty-five years ago, the term of one of her customary imprisonments expired, and the good Matron, Mrs. Foster, brought her discharge to her. The woman began to weep. She did not want to go. She was very penitent for her past misdeeds, she said, and she was always so happy in the Tombs that she begged to be allowed to spend the remainder of her days there. The Charity Commissioners humored the prisoner, and she was suffered to remain. She had a little stool made, with her Christian name painted upon it, and on it she sat all day, reading or knitting, at the head of the iron stairway, with a smile and a kind word for every one. She went out of the prison walls but twice a year, on the Fourth of July and New Year's, and took particular interest in the Sunday services in the prison. On Sunday last she was taken ill, and now lies in her quiet room dying, having spent the last twenty-five years of her life peacefully and contentedly in jail.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey Assisted at the Service at Cooper Union, New York, on Sunday evening, August 10th. He sang with great effect, "What Shall the Harvest be." Mr. Sawyer prefaced the singing by relating how a Mr. Latimore, of Chicago, who had promised to be at the meetings, was converted by hearing that song. No other influence had been effective. He tried to get away from the impression of the song, but it ran in his mind and seemed written on the walls of his room. He tried to drown it in drink, but it came back the stronger. After his conversion his little daughter wrote him a touching letter. Her mother could not believe it was "papa" who had been converted and was now a sober and Christian man.

Dr. Cullis' Faith Convention at Old Orchard closed on Wednesday, August 13th. A Bible reading on the subject of the two pillars, Jachin and Boaz, was given by Miss Smiley. The points of resemblance between these pillars and Christian character was beautifully drawn, especially the two last resemblances—fruitfulness as shown by the pomegranates, and purity as typified by the lily work on the top of the pillars. Dr. Cullis has greatly endeared himself to the people, and he was unanimously requested to come next season. Many testimonies are given of the great help received in the life of faith by these meetings.

At the Recent Round Lake Camp-Meeting an earnest brother asked permission to relate a story in illustration of practical religion. He told of the Scotch boatman, who, after listening to a discussion between two theologians on the comparative value of faith and works, asked them to imagine the oar he held in one hand as faith, the one in the other as works. He then began rowing vigorously with faith, and the boat made no progress, but turned round and round. When he pulled with works alone, it was with the same result. But when he worked with equal vigor with both, the boat shot forward and made rapid progress. And so the brother believed it was in the Christian life. The two must go together.

How a Wedding was Brought About.—A gentleman invited to a wedding recently, asked the bridegroom how he first met with his charming bride. The bridegroom said in reply, "A year ago I was one of a large dinner-party of ladies and gentlemen at which a young lady was observed not to drink any wine. Our host noticed it, and invited her by name to drink a glass of wine with him. She, however, had the courage to decline, saying at the same time that she did so on principle. Nothing more was said. Her decision of character deeply impressed me, I sought an introduction to her, satisfied that one of her principles would make a good companion. I became a teetotaler myself, and now she has just become my wife. That's why I married her."

THE PROPHET LIKE UNTO MOSES.

A New Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me; unto him ye shall hearken; . . . . . And it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him."—DEUT. 18 : 15–19.

The Creature and the Creator—God's Dealings with Man in History—A Succession of Mediators —Moses the First—The Lord Jesus the Last— I. The Twofold Necessity for a Mediator—1. The Glory of God—2. The Sinfulness of Man— II. The Person of the Great Mediator—His Likeness to Moses—III. The Authority of the Great Mediator—Man's Dreadful Responsibility.

MAN, the creature, may well desire intercourse with his Creator. When we are right-minded we cannot bear to be like fatherless children, born into the world by a parent of whom we know nothing whatever. We long to hear our father's voice. Of old time, or ever sin had entered into the world, the Lord God was on the most intimate terms with His creature man. He communed with Adam in the garden; in the cool of the day He made the evening to be sevenfold refreshing by the shadow of His own presence. There was no cloud between unfallen man and the ever-blessed One: they could commune together, for no sin had set up a middle wall of partition.

Alas, man being in honor continued not, but broke the law of his God, and not only forfeited his own inheritance, but entailed upon his descendants a character with which the holy God can hold no converse. By nature we love that which is evil, and within us there is an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living God, and consequently intercourse between God and man has had to be upon quite another footing from that which commenced and ended in the glades of Eden. It was condescension at the first which made the Lord speak with man the creature; it is mercy, unutterable mercy, now if God deigns to speak with man the sinner.

Through His divine grace the Lord did not leave our fathers altogether without a word from Himself even after the Fall, for between the days of Adam and Moses there were occasional voices heard as of God speaking with man. "Enoch walked with God," which implies that God walked with him and had communion with him, and we may rest assured it was no silent walk which Enoch had with the Most High. The Lord also spake to Noah, once and again, and made a covenant with him: and then He, at still greater length and with greater frequency, spake with Abraham, whom He graciously called His friend.

Voices also came to Isaac, and Jacob, and Joseph, and celestial beings flitted to and fro between earth and heaven. Then there was a long pause and a dreary silence. No prophet spoke in Jehovah's name, no voice of God in priestly oracle was heard, but all was silent while Israel dwelt in Egypt, and sojourned in the land of Ham. So completely hushed was the spiritual voice among men that it seemed as if God had utterly forsaken His people and left the world without a witness to His name; yet there was a prophecy of His return, and the Lord had great designs, which only waited till the full time was come.

He purposed to try man in a very special manner, to see whether he could bear the presence of the Lord or no. He resolved to take a family, multiply it into a nation, and set it apart for Himself, and to that nation He would make a revelation of Himself of the most extraordinary character. So He took the people who had slaved amongst the brick kilns of Egypt, and made them His elect, the nation of His choice, ordained to be a nation of priests, a people near unto Him, if they had but grace to bear the honor. Though they had lain among the pots, with a high hand and an outstretched arm He delivered them, and with gracious love He favored them, so that they became for beauty and excellence as the wings of a dove that are covered with silver and her feathers with yellow gold.

He divided the Red Sea and made them a way of escape, and afterwards set that sea as a barrier between them and their former masters. He took them into the wilderness, and there fed them with manna which dropped from heaven, and with water out of the rock did he sustain them. After a while he began to speak to them, as He had never spoken to any nation before. He spake with them from the top of Sinai, so that they heard His voice, out of the midst of the fire, and in astonishment they cried, "We have seen this day that God doth talk with man, and he liveth." But

THE EXPERIMENT FAILED.

Man was not in a condition to hear the direct voice of God. On the very first day the people were in such terror and alarm that they cried out, "This great fire will consume us : if we hear the voice of the Lord our God any more we shall die." As they stood still at a distance to hear the words of God's perfect law they were filled with great fear, and so terrible was the sight that even Moses said, "I exceedingly fear and quake."

The people could not endure that which was commanded, and entreated that the word should not be spoken to them any more. They felt the need of some one to interpose—a daysman, an interpreter, one of a thousand was needed to come between them and God. Even those among them that were the most spiritual, and understood and loved God better than the rest, yet confessed that they could not endure the thunder of His dreadful voice, and their elders and the heads of their tribes came unto Moses and said, "Go thou near, and hear all that the Lord our God shall say : and speak thou unto us all that the Lord our God shall speak unto thee ; and we will hear it, and do it."

The Lord knew that man would always be unable to hear his Maker's voice, and he therefore determined not only to speak by Moses, but, ever and anon, to speak by His servants the prophets, raising up here one and there another ; and then he determined, as the consummation of His condescending mercy, that at the last He would put all the word He had to say to man into one heart, and that word should be spoken by one mouth to men, furnishing a full, complete, and unchangeable revelation of Himself to the human race.

This He resolved to give by one of whom Moses had learned something when the Lord said to him in the words of our text, "I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth ; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him." We know assuredly that our Lord Jesus Christ is that prophet like unto Moses by whom in these last days He has spoken unto us. See Peter's testimony in the third chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, and Stephen's in the seventh chapter of the same book. "This man was counted worthy of more glory than Moses, inasmuch as he who hath builded the house hath more honor than the house," yet did he bear a gracious likeness to Moses, and therein His apostles found a sure argument of His being indeed the Messiah, sent of God.

The subject of this morning's discourse is the Lord's speaking to us by Jesus Christ, the one Mediator between God and man, and our earnest aim is that all of us may reverently hear the voice of God by this greatest of all prophets. Our meditation will run in this line : first, we will think for a moment upon the necessity for a Mediator ; secondly, upon the person of the Prophet-Mediator whom God hath chosen ; and, thirdly, upon the authority with which this Mediator is invested, by which authority He calleth upon us this day to hearken to God's voice which is heard in Him.

I. We begin by considering how urgently there existed THE NECESSITY for a Mediator. I need but very short time to set this forth.

1. There was a necessity for a Mediator in the case of the Israelites, first, because of the unutterable glory of God, and their own inability to endure that glory, either with their eye, their ear, or their mind. We cannot suppose that the revelation of God upon Sinai was the display of all His greatness : nay, we know that it could not be such, for it would have been impossible for man to have lived at all in the presence of the Infinite Glory. Habakkuk, speaking of this manifestation, says, "God came from Teman, and the Holy One from Mount Paran. His glory covered the heavens, and the earth was full of His praise. And His brightness was as the light ; He had horns coming out of His hand ;" but he adds, "there was the hiding of His power."

Despite its exceeding glory, the manifestation upon the mount of God at Horeb was a subdued manifestation, and yet, though it was thus toned down to human weakness, it could not be borne. The unveilings of Jehovah's face no mortal eye could bear. The voice with which God spake at Sinai is by Moses compared to the voice of a trumpet waxing exceeding loud and long, and also to the roll of thunder ; and we all know the awe-inspiring sound of thunder when it is heard near at hand, its volleys rolling overhead. How the crash of peal on peal makes the bravest heart, if not to quail, yet still to bow in reverent awe before God ! Yet this is not the full voice of God :

IT IS BUT HIS WHISPER.

Jehovah hath hushed His voice in the thunder, for were that voice heard in its fulness it would shake not only earth, but also heaven. If He were for once to unveil His face the lightning's flame would pale to darkness in comparison.

2. This sufficient reason is supported by another most weighty fact, namely, that God cannot commune with men because of their sin. God was pleased to regard His people Israel at the foot of Sinai as pure. "Moses went down from the mount unto the people, and sanctified the people ; and they washed their clothes." They had abstained for awhile from defiling actions, and as they stood outside the bounds they were ceremonially clean ; but it was only a ceremonial purity. Before long they were really unclean before the Lord, and in heart defiled and polluted. The Lord said of them, "Oh that there were such a heart in them, that they would fear Me, and keep all My commandments always, that it might be well with them, and with their children for ever !" (Deut. 5 : 29). He knew that their heart was not right even when they spoke obediently.

Not many days after the people had trembled at Sinai they made a golden calf, and set it up and bowed before it, and provoked the Lord to jealousy so that He sent plagues among them. It is quite clear that after such a rebellion, after a deliberate breach of His covenant, and daring violation of His commands, it would have been quite impossible for God to speak to them, or for them to listen to the voice of God, in a direct manner. They would have fled before Him because of His holiness, which shamed their unholiness , and because of their sin, which provoked His indignation, because of the wandering, and instability, and treachery of their hearts, the Lord could not have endured them in His presence. The holy angels forever adore with that threefold cry, "Holy, holy, holy Lord God of Sabaoth ;" and He could not permit men of unclean lips to profane His throne with their unholy utterances. O no ! my brethren, with such a sense of sin as some of us have, and as all of us ought to have, we should have o cover our faces, and cower down in terror, if Jehovah Himself were to appear.

God's face is not to be seen. An occasional glimpse may come to spirits raised above their own natural level, so that they can for awhile behold the King, the Lord of Hosts ; but even to them it is a terrible strain upon all their powers, the wine is too strong for the bottles. What said John, when he saw, not so much absolute Deity, but the divine side of the Mediator ? "When I saw Him I fell at His feet as dead." Daniel, the man greatly beloved, confesses that there remained no strength in him and his comeliness was turned into corruption when he heard the voice of God ; and Job said, "I have heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear but now mine eye seeth Thee ; therefore I abho myself in dust and ashes." We must approac the Lord through a Mediator : it is absolutel necesary.

II. This brings us to consider of the appointed Mediator, and in my text w obtain a liberal measure of information upon thi point. Read these blessed words, "The Lor thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet fro the midst of thee, of thy brethren." Dwell wit sweetness upon this fact, that our Lord Jes was raised up from the midst of us, from amon our brethren. In Him is fulfilled that glorio prophecy, "I have exalted One chosen out the people." He is one of ourselves, a broth born for adversity. He was born at Bethlehe not in fiction, but in fact : where the horn oxen fed He in a manger lay, as any other ba might do, wrapped in swaddling bands, and d pendent on a woman's loving care as any oth babe might be.

He was like ourselves in His growth from i fancy to manhood, increasing in stature as do from our childhood to our riper age. Thou the holy child Jesus He was yet a child, a therefore He was subject to His parents. A when He came forth as a man, His was no ph tom manhood, but true flesh and blood ; He w tempted and He was betrayed : He hunge and He thirsted ; He was weary and He sore amazed ; He took our sicknesses, and carried our sorrows ; He was made in all poi like unto His brethren. He did not set H self apart as though He were of an exclusive c or of a superior rank, but He dwelt among the brother of the race, eating with publicans sinners, mingling ever with the common peo O sons of men, will ye not hearken when s an one as Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of man ordained to speak of the eternal God ?

Moses was truly one of the people, for he lo them intensely, and all his sympathies were them. They provoked him terribly, but stil loved them. We can never admire that ma God too much when we think of his disinter ed love to that guilty nation. See him on mountain there as Israel's advocate. The said, "Let me alone that I may destroy th and I will make of thee a great nation." proposal opened up before Moses' eye a gl ing destiny. It was within his grasp tha himself should become the founder of a rac whom the promises made to Abraham shoul fulfilled. Would not the most of men greedily snatched at it ? But Moses will have it. He loves Israel too well to see the ple die if he can save them.

He has not an atom of selfish ambition a him ; but with cries and tears he excl "Wherefore should the Egyptians speak an For mischief did He bring them out, to slay in the mountains, and to consume them the face of the earth ? Turn from Thy wrath, and repent of this evil against Thy ple." He prevailed with God by his plea for he identified himself with Israel. Mose as it were, gather up all their griefs and sor into himself, even as did our Lord. True I ite was he, for he refused to be called th of Pharaoh's daughter, and cast in his lot the people of God. This is just what our bl Lord has done. He will not have honor from His people, nor even life, unless the also. He saved others, Himself He coul save. He would not be in heaven, and his saints behind. He loved the people a proved Himself to be one chosen out of midst, a brother among brethren.

Mark well that, while thus our Lord brother, the great God has in His person s one who is lifted up above us all in the k edge of His mind. Thus saith the Lord (5 "I will put My words in His mouth." Our Lord Jesus Christ comes to us inspired by Not alone cometh He, nor of His own saith He, " The Father is with Me : I do al- s the things which please Him : the Father dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works." Both ord and work He acted for His Father, and r His Father's inspiration.

en and brethren, I beseech you not to reject message which Jesus brings, seeing it is not own, but the sure message of God. Trifle not a single word which Jesus speaks, for it is the of the Eternal One : despise not one single which He did, or precept which He com- led, or blessing which He brought, for upon ese there is the stamp of deity. God chose who is our brother that He might come near s ; but He put His own royal imprimatur Him, that we might not have an ambassa- f second rank, but one who counts it not ery to be equal with God, who nevertheless ur sake has taken upon Himself the form servant that He might speak home to our s. For all these reasons, I beseech you de- not Him that speaketh, seeing He speaketh heaven.

THE MAIN POINT

ver, upon which I want to dwell is, that is like to Moses. There had been no bet- nediator found than Moses up to Moses' the Lord God, therefore, determined to upon that model with the great prophet of ace, and He has done so in sending forth ord Jesus. It would be a very interesting for the young people to work out all the s in which Moses is a personal type of the Jesus. The points of resemblance are very , for there is hardly a single incident in the f the great Lawgiver which is not symboli- f the promised Saviour.

u may begin from the beginning at the s of the Nile, and go to the close upon the of Pisgah, and you will see Christ in Moses man sees his face in a glass. I can only ion in what respects, as a Mediator, Jesus is to Moses, and surely one is found in the hat Moses beyond all that went before him eculiarly the depository of the mind of God. and again we find him closeted with God rty days at a time. He went right away men to the lone mountain-top, and there as forty days and forty nights, and did er eat nor drink, but lived in high commun- ith his God.

this our Lord Jesus is like to Moses, only r surpasses him, for the intercourse between t and the Father was very much more in- e, seeing that Jesus is Himself essential . and " in Him dwelleth all the fulness of odhead bodily." Cold mountains and the ight air continually witnessed to His com- on with the Father. Nor these alone, for ode with the Father. His language was s spoken out as God was speaking within ; He lived in God, and with God. " I ," said He, " that Thou hearest me always." ad of having to point out when Christ was mmunion with the Father, we have rather, astonishment, to point out the solitary mo- when He was left of the Father, even that hour when He cried, " My God, my God, ast Thou forsaken me ?"

ly for that once the Father had left Him, ven then it was inexplicable, and He asked eason for it ; though He knew Himself to be suffering as the Substitute for man, yet did esertion by God come upon Him as a nov- hich utterly overwhelmed Him, so that He in agony why He was forsaken.

ses, to take another point, is the first of the ets with whom God kept up continuous reve- . Moses is described as a prophet mighty rd and deed, and it is singular that there was another prophet mighty in word and till Jesus came. Moses, again, was the er of a great system of religious law, and was not the case with any other but the Lord es.

ne will fail us, or we would mention to you Moses was faithful before God as a ser- over all His house, and so was Jesus as a over His own house. Herein he was the stern type of Jesus, who took the scourge of small cords, and drove out the buyers and sellers, and said, " Take these things hence : it is written, My Father's house shall be a house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves."

Moses, by divine grace, was very meek, and perhaps this is between him and Jesus. I have said, " by divine grace," for I suppose by nature he was strongly passionate. Divine grace had so cooled and calmed him that in general he was the gentlest of men. But what shall I say of my Master? Let Him speak for Himself. " Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest : take My yoke upon you, and learn of Me ; for I am meek and lowly in heart : and ye shall find rest unto your souls." Our children call Him " Gentle Jesus, meek and mild." The man Jesus is very meek above all men that are upon the face of the earth. He has His indignation, for He can be angry, and the wrath of the Lamb is the most awful wrath beneath the sun ; but still to us, in this gospel day, He is all love and tenderness : and when He bids us come to Him, can we refuse to hear? So meek is the Mediator that He is love itself, incarnate love so loving, that when He died His only crime was that He was " found guilty of excess of love ;" can we be so cruel as to reject Him? O brothers and sisters, do not refuse to listen to the voice of this Tender One by whom God speaketh to you.

Our Lord was like to Moses in meekness, and then to sum up all—Moses was the Mediator for God with the people, and so is our blessed Lord. Moses came in God's name to set Israel free from Pharoah's bondage, and he did it : Jesus came to set us free from a worse bondage still, and He has achieved our freedom. Moses led the people through the Red Sea, and Jesus has led us where all the hosts of hell were overthrown, and sin was drowned in His own most precious blood. Moses led the tribes through the wilderness, and Jesus leads us through the weary ways of this life to the rest which remaineth for the people of God. Moses spake to the people for God, and Jesus hath done the same. Moses spake to God for the people, and Jesus ever liveth to make intercession for us.

Moses proposed himself as a sacrifice when he said, " If not, blot my name out of the book of life ;" but Jesus was an actual sacrifice, and was taken away from the land of the living for our sakes, being made a curse for us. Moses, in a certain sense, died for the people, for he could not enter into the land, but must needs close his eyes on Nebo. Those are touching words, " The Lord was angry with me for your sakes ;" words which in a diviner sense may be fitly applied to Jesus, for God was angry with him for our sakes. Right through to the very end our blessed Lord Jesus Christ, our Saviour, is a prophet like unto Moses, raised up from the midst of his brethren. O my hearers, hear ye Him. Turn not your ear away from this Prophet of prophets, but hear and live.

III. I close with that point, and if my words are very few let them be weighty. Let us think of the authority of our great Mediator, and let this be

THE PRACTICAL LESSON.

Hear ye Him. Men and brethren, if our hearts were right, the moment it was announced that God would speak to us through Jesus Christ there would be a rush to hear Him. If sin had not maddened men they would listen eagerly to every word of God through such a Mediator as Jesus is ; they would write each golden sentence on their tablets, they would hoard His word in their memories, they would wear it between their eyes, they would yield their hearts to it. Alas, it is not so ; and the saddest thing of all is that some talk of Jesus for gain, and others hear of Him as if His story were a mere tale or an old Jewish ballad of eighteen hundred years ago.

Yet, remember, God speaks by Jesus still, and every word of His that is left on record is as solemnly alive to-day as when it first leaped from His blessed lips. I beseech you remember Christ cometh not as an amateur, but he hath authority with Him : this ambassador to men wears the authority of the King of kings. If ye despise Him ye despise Him that sent Him : if ye turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven ye turn away from the eternal God, and ye do despite to His love. O do not so.

Note how my text puts it. It saith here, " Whosoever shall not hearken unto My words which He shall speak in My name, I will require it of him." My heart trembles while I repeat to you the words, " I will require it of him." To-day God graciously requires it of some of you, and asks why you have not listened to Christ's voice. Why is this? You have not accepted His salvation. Why is this? You know all about Jesus, and you say it is true, but you have never believed in Him : why is this? God requires it of you.

The day will come when He will require it of you in a much more violent sense than he does to-day ; when you shall have passed beyond the region of mercy He will say, " I called you and you refused; why is this? I did not speak to you in thunder. I spoke to you with the gentle voice of the Only Begotten who bled and died for men : why did you not hear Him? Every Sabbath day My servant tried to repeat the language of His Master to you : why did you refuse it? You are cast into hell, but why did not you accept the pardon which would have delivered you from it?" You were too busy. Too busy to remember your God? What could you have been busy about that was worth a thought as compared with Him? You were too fond of pleasure.

My Master will require of me how I have preached to you, and I sincerely wish it were in my power to put these things in better form, and plead with you more earnestly ; but, after all, what can I do? If you have no care for your own souls, how can I help it? If you will rush upon eternal woe, if you will despise the altogether lovely One through whom God speaks to you, if you will live day after day carelessly and wantonly, throwing away your souls, oh, then mine eyes shall weep in secret places for you ; but what more can I do but leave you to God? At the last I shall be compelled to say " Amen" to the verdict which condemns you for ever. God grant that such a reluctant task may not fall to my lot in reference to any one of you, but may you now hear and obey the Lord Jesus, and find eternal salvation at once, for his dear name's sake. Amen.

Fashionable Novelists are Fond of Going to the haunts of crime and describing what they see there ; but why do they not take the trouble to examine the heights of Christian life that they may give true pictures of what they see there? A company of would-be naturalists in the olden time, who were writing a dictionary, once said to Baron Cuvier, " Here is a good definition of a crab." " What is it?" asked Cuvier. " A little red fish that moves backwards." " Very good," said he, " only there are three mistakes : it is not a fish, it is not red, and it does not move backwards." That is very much the style of definition that novelists give to Christian people. In denouncing hypocritical professors of religion—who cannot be too severely denounced—novelists often convey the false impression, that such men are types of Christian character, and they neglect to delineate sincere Christian men and women, who are illustrations of the life that is in the Lord Jesus Christ.

DELIVERED FROM A DELUGE BY PRAYER.

During a violent storm on the northern coast of Russia some years ago, the waters of the Gulf of Finland rose so high as suddenly to submerge a portion of the great city of St. Petersburg beneath a flood. A widespread sea of water stretched itself out on every side, with the houses just appearing above it. The hurricane tore up the fairest and finest trees. Numerous horses that were kept in stables were drowned; those that were let loose swam for their lives and were saved. The soldiers on sentry, not being relieved, nor daring to stir, stood till the waves flowed over them and buried them in the midst. Boats were got out, but it was impossible for them to float, except in the shelter of the few neighboring houses, and hundreds perished by overcrowding into them. Whole villages, with houses, people, and animals, were swept away. The prisoners in the fortress were drowned.

But much as St. Petersburg suffered, Cronstadt, from its lying lower, suffered still more. The hills were covered with the waves, which threatened to submerge the whole island. Stacks of corn were borne to a great distance, and cattle buffeting the torrent were mingled with the corpses of persons drowned or at their last gasp. The Emperor, in a shattered state of health, beheld the tumultuous scene with the greatest consternation. Wringing his hands, he cried, "It has come upon us for our sins;" and, lifting them up to heaven, he implored the Almighty to let His anger fall on his devoted head, but to spare his people.

The day wore away towards the afternoon, and still the waters continued rising. Had they continued rising during the following night and day there would have been seen but a universal wreck. But about four o'clock P.M., just as the greatest consternation was prevailing—just when deliverance was most needed to prevent the entire destruction of the city—at that moment the bow of promise appeared. A most beautiful rainbow was seen stretched across the sky. It was as a voice from heaven testifying to the mercy and faithfulness of that God who declared to Noah that the waters should never again overflow the earth. Encouraged by this token of peace, every one looked up, and lo, the rising of the water was stayed! Hope was kindled in many an anxious breast, and they who feared the Lord gave thanks to His name, saying, "He retaineth not His anger forever, because He delighteth in mercy."

Early on that eventful morning, before the wind had risen so high as to give any indication of the coming catastrophe, a poor German mechanic and his wife, who resided in a low part of the city, were obliged to go out on business. They were pious and industrious, and much respected by the religious community to which they belonged. The wife had risen betimes, dressed her two little children, given them their breakfast, and was prepared to leave them at home for as short a time as possible, at most for two or three hours. The children, a little boy five years of age, and his sister a year younger, were the joy of their fond parents' hearts; and when the mother turned the key of the door to depart, with her husband, she inwardly commended her beloved ones to the care of her Heavenly Father.

They took their way, confident of God's love and care, to that part of the city to which their business called them, and which was known by the name of Nevesky, a street running in a direct line from the Admiralty, and familiar to all who had viewed the beautiful metropolis of the Russian Empire. On reaching the house to which they were journeying, they proceeded to transact the business that required their attention, and were so engrossed by it as not to observe the gentle but rapid encroachment of the unwonted tide. On opening the door they beheld, to their surprise and consternation, the flood as it covered the ground rising higher and higher, and threatening destruction to man and beast.

The first impulse of the father was to wade through the water, then knee-deep, to the rescue of his children; but the idea seemed hopeless, for the room in which he had left them was so situated, partly below the level of the ground, and in a low quarter of the town, that the water must have entered it and done its fatal work. And then his dear wife; if he were to leave her, what would be the result? No one could tell how far the waters might prevail, and should he abandon his beloved partner, she might be drowned in his absence, and have none to deliver her.

On her part she durst not urge her husband to venture, lest his life should be sacrificed in the attempt. They looked at each other in perplexity and disquietude, and then turned their eyes upwards in silent prayer to God, "whose arm is not shortened that it cannot save, nor His ear heavy that it cannot hear."

In their distress they hastened to make known to those dwelling on the premises where they were staying the alarming condition of their children, inquiring of them if they could suggest any thing to be done, if not too late, to save their lives. Alas! the families to whom they applied, though they pitied them, were unable to help them, being intent on saving their own relatives, their merchandise, books, property, and whatever would be damaged by contact with water. Convinced by experience how vain is the help of man, they felt that their only resource was in prayer, not for the life of their children, for that they could not hope for, but that they themselves might be prepared to resign them, and to say with the bereaved patriarch, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away: blessed be the name of the Lord."

Thus watching, praying, and endeavoring to console one another, they passed the weary hours, waiting with anxious longing for the waters to subside. At four o'clock in the afternoon, as we have mentioned, the tempest abated, and the waters began sensibly and rapidly to decrease. Mournfully tempered, however, were the joyful feelings of the agonized parents, whose gratitude for their personal preservation was mingled with the bitter prospect of finding their darling children lying pale and cold and lifeless in a watery tomb.

Three painful hours elapsed before it was safe for them to venture through the water yet in the streets, to the humble dwelling that contained all they held dear on earth. They reached the door, and as it moved heavily on its hinges the mother's heart fainted and almost died within her. They looked in and saw the bodies of their dear ones stretched out upon a small round table, motionless, and locked in each others arms. No water covered them, but on looking up it was evident from the state of the room that the flood had reached far above the height of the table, and that the rest of the furniture had been completely under water. The fatal consequences seemed inevitable.

The father approached the table; he looked at his children—they breathed; he laid his hand upon them—they were warm; they were in a sweet sleep! "Miracle of mercy!" he exclaimed. "The God of love," said the mother, in a transport of joy, "be praised!" Yet how can it be? Surely their senses have deceived them, and they are in an illusion! Then by an instinct they were prompted at all hazards to dispel it, and roused the lovely little sleepers from their tranquil slumber.

On opening their eyes and recognizing their parents, they clung to them with fond delight, interrupting, however, the caresses bestowed upon them by complaints of hunger and urgent cries for food. Some remains of biscuit from the mother's pocket were instantly shared between them, and then they sought a key to the mystery of their preservation by asking them what they had been doing, and what had happened to them during their absence.

"When you and father," said the boy, "were gone, we played about the room. The water began to come in under the door, and I got some chips of wood, and Sissy and I played at ships, and the ships sailed along so prettily Then the water came over our shoes, and we got up on that chair, and when it came up a littl more we got frightened, and so we got up on th table, where it could not hurt us, and played o the table; and when we were very hungry w laid ourselves down and went to sleep, till yo and father came home."

From this recital, and from the fact of th surface of the table being dry, it was apparen that when the water had risen to its height i had lifted it up, like a little raft, bearing up it precious burden, while in its subsidence it wa let gently down, and the slumbering babes wer unconsciously and wonderfully preserved, to b restored to the arms of their praying parent They were joined by their neighbors in the ado ing exclamation, "What hath God wrought!

ANTICHRIST AND THE JEWS.

By Mr. R. J. Mahoney.

Popish corruption, arrogance, and cruelt though they may well be shadowed forth in Re 13 and Dan. 7 are far from exhausting, even fulfilling, all the characteristics of the w beast—the Antichrist—who in his fully dev oped character will set himself up against t profession of any belief in God. He will n declare himself to be God's vicar, but decl himself to be God Himself (2 Thess. 2). He proscribe all worship except of himself, as the emperors of pagan Rome, and all his w shippers will be branded with his mark, doomed to irrecoverable apostasy. None assert this to be true of all who have held hold the profession of Popery (see Rev. 13:

Thus we conclude that, whatever may be secondary and shadowy application of Dani and 8 and of Rev. 13 to Papal Rome, yet th Scriptures still wait their full and accurate complishment in a more developed and u served usurpation by the future personal A christ of divine prerogative, and unquali apostasy from the acknowledgment of Jehov name. That the immense majority of Chris dom will receive this delusion is manifest f Rev. 13: 3, 4, 7, 8, where all the (Ron world appears worshipping the beast.

But the true Church of God is kept by power of God through faith unto the salva ready to be revealed—kept waiting for the of God from heaven, who shall change t into His likeness at His coming. With Hi His glorious train they shall come to exe judgment on Antichrist and his hosts, in terrible day of God's wrath that brings th of this dispensation. When the mighty of murderers, fed with the blood of His sa have felt His vengeance in the valley of Jel aphat (Joel 3), where blood has flowed to the horse bridles (Rev. 14); when the ened sun and shuddering earth, and "ro waves of the sea," have confessed the righ wrath of their Creator; after all this has p away; the sun shall set in the fair mille splendor of a new age (Zech. 14). "At ev time it shall be light." Then Israel shall b upon earth (Isa. 49: 22, 23). Her people be all righteous (Isa. 4: 3; 54: 13; 60 62: 12); unfaithfulness shall never aga found in her. Her people shall go forth heathen, and outlying nations (who ha been involved in the special rebellion and ment of antichristendom), preaching the of the kingdom (Ps. 68: 10, 11). Where they go, "their feet shall be beautiful up mountains" (Rom. 10). The length of e shall be restored to the measure of patriarchal days (Isa. 65 : 20). Wars shall cease on earth, and the splendors of Solomon's reign shall be multiplied many fold. Satan is bound (Rev. 20), and the evil of man's heart is restricted in its outward working. Who can measure the material development and prosperity of earth under that long benignant sway of the Prince of Peace?

And yet that blessed period of a thousand years closes in a darker apostasy, and a more terrible judgment, than those which ended any of the previous ages. (See Rev. 20 : 7–10.) The dead of all the ages past who died in sin are raised to stand before the great white throne to hear their sentence, and to depart to their own place.

THE JEWS AND DANIEL'S SEVENTIETH WEEK.

The book of Revelation gives us the seven years of Daniel's seventieth week in detail, and there is resumed the thread broken off abruptly in Daniel 9 : 25–26. It is resumed amidst scenes of momentous gravity. Changes that would have occupied centuries in the earlier annals of the age are effected in weeks or even days.

The vintage of earth is fast maturing. Every fresh moment arrives laden with event, catastrophe, judgment. Earth appears as the battle-field whereon the powers of light and darkness become concentrated in close and final struggle. The shaft of the abyss is opened (Rev. 9) and the lost spirits of past ages issue forth in countless numbers, and endued with strange and awful powers, to mingle among men. Angels are seen charged with the infliction of direct and terrible judgments.

SATAN INCARNATE.

At this time Satan will become incarnate in a human being without limit and without reserve. He will produce the Antichrist in his own moral image, the contrast and opposite in all things of Christ, whom Jehovah sent forth as God manifest in flesh. On Satan's own terms this Antichrist will accept the kingdoms of this earth, and the glory of them.

In speaking of these last days of this age, Scripture gives prominent importance to this mysterious being. As the living saints are translated to the presence of God, so from the pinnacle of human greatness he is cast living into the lake of fire; and as amidst all the criminals of earth's history he stands pre-eminent in blasphemy and cruelty, so in the Apocalypse the awful tragedy passes from our view into eternity, and he passes with it, a central figure in the scathing light of righteous wrath.

Into such an arena, and to meet such an antagonist, Israel emerges from the humiliation of ages, once more a consolidated nation. Indeed, we gather from the book of Daniel that Israel will take a place so influential among the nations, that this great antichristian monarch, in the first stage of his ambitious career, will seek and obtain her alliance. He will make a seven years' covenant with many of the Jews (Daniel 9 : 27).

ISRAEL READY FOR HER MISSION.

The Eastern Question did not receive its final settlement at Berlin. The dismemberment of Turkey was then advanced a stage, and that was all. The process will still go on, and her Asiatic provinces, including Palestine, will probably be the next portion of her empire she will lose. They are now placed under the protection and guarantee of England, but the arrangement is a merely temporary provision, and the question must soon arise, in what way the liberation of Palestine from Ottoman rule shall be effected. If then, as a solution by no means unlikely, Israel should be restored to Palestine under the guarantee of the European powers, she would soon come to take a position far beyond that to which the mere number of her population would entitle her. Their wealth, their commercial connection with all the capitalists of the world, the distinctions which so many of them have achieved in politics, in diplomacy, in art and science, the varied experience brought together from all the European centres of activity, their linguistic acquirements, would all tend to make the capital of such a people the very focus of the intelligence, the taste, the luxury, and the enterprise of the world.

Such a state of things would be reached, not as in the case of other nations, by gradual development. The materials exist, ready, prepared, only waiting to be put together. They are not bound by complicated territorial responsibilities to the countries in which they sojourn. Their resources are transferable on the briefest notice; for the civilized world is their counting-house.

As in heathen fable Minerva issued fully caparisoned from the brain of Jupiter, so shall Israel, in the moment when the signal is given, leap forth into her place among the nations, in all the varied accomplishments of her children, the rival of the proudest.

GENTILE HANDS ARE AT WORK

even now preparing the land for the people. For the last six years the Palestine Exploration Society has been engaged in the survey of the whole land from Jordan to the sea. British officers, men distinguished for engineering skill and high intelligence, have made this service a labor of love. Three fourths of the country have been already mapped out on an inch scale similar to the Ordnance Survey of Great Britain, while the chart of Jerusalem and its environs, on the almost gigantic scale of ten feet to the statute mile, is a marvel of accurate detail. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the value of such a work to a government suddenly called to the administration of newly-acquired territory.

But before " Israel's time of trouble " comes, there is to be brought up for judgment. " Great Babylon comes into remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of His wrath."

After the raised and translated saints are caught up together to meet the Lord in the air (1 Thess. 4 : 16), the great bulk of the inhabitants of Christendom are left on earth. The salt is taken, and the great mass, amidst which it had lain scattered, is left to its own corruption.

In its possession are left the temples, cathedrals, churches, and places of worship which stud the face of that which is called the Christian world. Then will be seen the fully-developed character of the ecclesiastical Jezebel (Rev. 2 : 20–24). Faithless and treacherous to the Lord whom she professed to own, she now casts off every shred of responsibility or loyalty to Him.

She lends herself without scruple to the governments of earth. She becomes in their hands, so far as it suits her own purposes, a pliant instrument to repress or manipulate, to overawe or cajole the populations. Without principle and without shame, she embraces in her latitudinarianism every heresy that seeks her influence and sustains her authority. Thus she appears before John, in Rev. 17, sitting on the throne of kingdoms, " the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth."

In this her last phase of corruption and apostasy, the measure of her iniquity is accomplished, and she is held to answer, not only for her own long career of persecution of the saints of God, but also for the crimes of every false system which she has affiliated. So that, when her judgment is come, in her is found the blood of saints and prophets, and of all that had been slain in the earth.

Rev. 17 and 18 detail

HER JUDGMENT.

The kings of the earth, and their elected Emperor, at last find her influence too powerful, her intrigues too dangerous, her hierarchy too formidable in rivalry for their own interests. Her pretensions will brook any compromise of principle, but none of power. " In her heart she saith, I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow." Like Jezebel, her prototype, she paints her face and tires her hair.

Like her she gathers herself up in her traditional fascination and arrogance to meet her antagonist. But, like her, she is cast down at the command of the new and daring adventurer, and he treads her under foot. The wild beast and his satellite kings execute God's vengeance on her, and thus the system of corrupt Christendom comes to its end in the universal massacre of its hierarchy, its orders, and its followers, at the hands of the nations which it has so long swayed and debased by its corruptions.

But as, once before (when this scene was rehearsed in miniature), Napoleon of France found that his rising empire could not cohere without some sort of religion, so will the last head of the Roman empire find that, in doing away with all the mechanism of religious system, he has destroyed an essential element of human statecraft. Then another kindred spirit (the two-horned beast) comes to his aid, and, in council with him, evolves that described in Rev. 13.

" In the midst of the week " (of seven years) " he (the Antichrist) shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease."—Truce-breaking and blood-shedding are the characteristics of this enemy (Ps. 55 : 20, 21).—Then shall Israel be " trodden down like the mire in the streets." " The blood of God's saints shall be shed like water round about Jerusalem." " Then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world till then." Multitudes shall look for refuge in apostasy; but " whosoever shall seek to save his life shall lose it; and whosoever shall lose it shall gain it alive " (Luke 17 : 33, Greek). Israel must learn her last lesson, never more to put her trust in man.

The closing scene is recorded in Zech. 14.

DELIVERANCE

comes not till the Lord's feet stand on the Mount of Olives, and the tribes, in deep contrition, recognize Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of God, the King of Israel. The Mount of Olives shall be cleft asunder into a deep and far-extending valley. The same convulsion of nature shall cause a deep and inexhaustible fountain to burst forth in Jerusalem, swelling into a mighty river as it flows westward to the Mediterranean, and eastward into the Dead Sea, purifying its waters, fertilizing the contiguous desert, and probably continuing its beneficent course as far as the Persian Gulf (Zech. 14 : 8; Ezek. 47; Joel 3 : 18; Isa. 35 : 1, 7). These rivers would appear to be navigable (Isa. 33 : 20, 21), and thus would Jerusalem become geographically and commercially the metropolis of the earth.

Then shall " Israel blossom and bud, and fill the face of the whole earth with fruit."

A Gleam Across the Wave.—The Rev. Spencer Compton, the earnest evangelical episcopal minister at Boulogne, France, relates the following incident :—" During a voyage to India, I sat one dark evening in my cabin, feeling thoroughly unwell, as the sea was rising fast, and I was but a poor sailor. Suddenly the cry of 'Man overboard!' made me spring to my feet. I heard a trampling overhead, but resolved not to go on deck, lest I should interfere with the crew in their efforts to save the poor man. 'What can I do?' I asked myself, and instantly unhooking my lamp, I held it near the top of my cabin and close to my bull's-eyed window, that its light might shine on the sea, and as near the ship as possible. In half a minute's time I heard the joyful cry, 'It's all right; he's safe,' upon which I put my lamp in its place.

" The next day, however, I was told that my little lamp was the sole means of saving the man's life; it was only by the timely light which shone upon him that the knotted rope could be thrown so as to reach him."

Christian worker, never despond, or think there is nothing for you to do even in dark and weary days. " Looking unto Jesus," lift up your light; let it " so shine " " that men say see"; and in the bright resurrection morning what joy to hear the " Well done!" and to know that you have unawares " saved some soul from death!"

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

THE DOWNWARD COURSE.

Effie listening for her husband's return, heard a dog bark a little way off ; surely Robert must be on his homeward way. Effie fancied that her ear could detect the click of the latch on the gate.

She eagerly unlocked her door, and ran downstairs to meet her husband. No one was there, her ear had deceived her. She opened the kitchen door and looked out ; nothing was stirring but the bat which darted past with its unsteady flickering flight. Effie drew back with a weary sigh, and seated herself near the open door.

Eleven o'clock struck. The fire had long since died out in the kitchen grate ; not a spark remained amongst the gray ashes. So had the brightness and warmth died out for the time from the heart of Effie. She had found the match-box and lighted a candle. What black shadows every object cast on the wall !

What could be detaining Robert so long ? He was doubtless having a merry evening. How often he had said that no one could sing a jolly song better than did Harry Cole, and that Nellie had the knack of making every one near her feel snug and at home ! Effie had never cared to hear this, and the recollection of Robert's praises of his old friends by no means tended now to make his wife feel more cheerful.

Had Robert a less happy home now that he was a married man ? Would he have led an easier, more cheerful life had he never met Effie Campbell ?

Midnight struck. Effie counted every stroke of the clock, and shivered. It was summer, but the night breeze which came through the open door felt cold ; or was it the chill at the heart of the young wife that made her think that it was so ?

Effie was becoming seriously alarmed at the delay in her husband's return. All kinds of painful fancies came into her head as the night wore on. Was Robert taken ill ? Could he have been waylaid and robbed, perhaps even murdered, on his homeward way ? Effie had heard horrid stories of highway robberies, and, in her nervous state of mind, they all recurred to her now, till her heart sickened with fear.

"I can't bear this suspense longer. I'll put on my bonnet, light a lamp, and go out to meet my husband," said poor Effie to herself. "The loneliness and darkness are so dreadful ! Ah ! surely that is the click of the gate at last."

Effie ran eagerly to the narrow gravel path which led from the gate to the farm-house.

The summer night was not very dark ; the stars were glittering like diamonds above in the deep blue sky. Effie could distinguish her husband's figure, though it did not look as upright as usual, nor did it move onward with step as firm. Effie hurried to meet her husband, then drew back with an exclamation of pain. For the first time in his life, Robert Holland came reeling back to his home !

The next day was the Sabbath. It was to be no day of holy rest and devotion to Robert Holland. He awoke late in the morning with an aching head, and a painful sense of shame. The young farmer was no hardened offender ; if Effie was vexed with her husband, he was much more vexed with himself.

Effie had still a strong hold over the affections of Robert. If, without uttering one word or giving one look of reproof, she had let him see that she grieved less because he had sinned against her, than because he had sinned against God—that she cared for her husband's honor and happiness more than she did for her own—she might have drawn him back from the dangerous path on which he was entering.

Poor Effie needed the wisdom which cometh from above, to guide her in a trial which to her was so new, but she had never asked for that wisdom. Besides this, her own constant yielding to small temptations had unfitted her to become as a guardian angel to a man exposed to great ones.

A woman whom her husband had been able to call "silly" stands at a terrible disadvantage when she seeks to influence him for good. Effie's little follies, her love of dress, her curiosity, had not prevented Robert from loving her, but they did prevent him from leaning on her when his tempted soul most needed support. The pretty, lively bride had been too well contented to be as a petted playmate. She had not risen to her proper position, that of a trusted friend.

Adam, in the Garden of Eden, had many bright birds and playful creatures to delight his eye, and amuse his mind, but amongst all these there was not found a helpmeet for Adam. It was woman's privilege and honor to be a helpmeet to man.

That is a wife's true mission. But it is not, and cannot be fulfilled by the wife who has not gained her husband's respect as well as his love. In the constant daily companionship of the home, the character of both husband and wife is revealed to each other as it seldom is during the days of courtship, and happy are they who find the favorable estimate on which they entered on their life-long engagement confirmed by their fuller knowledge. But it is seldom that some disappointment is not experienced on both sides.

The man who was all smiles and good-humor before marriage is found to have an irritable temper ; he who was unremitting in his attentions now is often absent-minded and pre-occupied. The girl whose beauty captivated her lover develops a temper which repels her husband, or a levity that disgusts him. Then is the time when the future happiness of the young couple trembles in the balance. Mutual forbearance, and a loving care and watchfulness, may save angry words and bitter heart-burnings that like a cankerworm would else eat away all the joy of life.

The husband should see to it that his wife should always turn with confidence to him for sympathy, support, and succor, and that he never shakes that confidence by a hasty word. The wife ought to endeavor by cheerfulness, contentment, and womanly loyalty, to prove to her husband that she is worthy of his respect and confidence. So may a love far more abiding, far stronger, and more precious, grow up between them that the storms and troubles of life are powerless to weaken.

But above and beyond all, the mutual love of husband and wife should be cemented in the higher, holier love of both to God. In that bond of union alone, is there security for married happiness, and gloomy are the future prospects of those who have at the outset of their united lives omitted to consider that corner-stone of their happiness. Effie and Robert had done as too many do ; they had consulted their inclinations only and God was not in their thoughts. They were now beginning to see how sad a mistake they had made.

Since their marriage Robert and Effie had regularly on every Sunday gone to church together. They had, indeed, not once remained to partake of the Holy Supper. Robert had never been a communicant, and Effie had not liked to stay without him. The natural consequence had followed : at this time, when Robert had fallen under temptation to self-indulgence, the lust of the flesh, in one of its most dangerous forms, Effie could not call in religion to aid her in rescuing her husband from the enemy's snare.

Robert did not choose to go to the house of prayer on that Sunday, to play the hypocrite, as he said to himself, after disgracing himself in the eyes of his wife. For the first time, when the church-bells chimed in the morning their Sabbath summons, Robert told his wife, when she came downstairs with her prayer-book in hand, that he meant to stay at home, there were plenty of things to be done on the farm. Hunt might go to morning service if he liked it, instead of waiting, as usual, for that to be held in the evening.

"Am I to go to church alone ?" said Effie in a tone of reproach ; "I have never done so since the day we were married."

"You have Mrs. Cross and her boy to keep you company," replied Robert. "I see them on the road, they've not much the start of you, you can easily overtake them."

"I do not want to overtake them ; I do not care to walk to church with Mrs. Cross," said Effie, almost pettishly ; "and to have her talking to me all the way about—about matters with which she has no concern. I am glad she wil not return to dinner to-day. She is going to din with some of her village friends she told me."

"Nor am I sorry to be rid of her company fo once," muttered Robert. And yet both husband and wife had an unpleasant conviction tha their lodger would make use of this opportunit for gossiping with her neighbors, to spread fa and wide the story of the farmer's coming hom drunk from the "Crown" on Saturday nigh The intoxicated man had been so noisy, that h return had aroused both the widow and Fre from sleep.

Effie Holland went to church, but less becaus she longed to lay her sorrows at the feet of he Lord, than because she feared what the neigh bors might say should both she and her husban be absent from their accustomed places. Eff had hitherto led a life so easy and pleasant, th she had not realized what a privilege is express in the injunction to cast all our cares upon Hi who careth for us.

Miss Temple met Effie as the congregatic quitted the church, and kindly asked after t health of Farmer Holland. The lady was stru by the constrained manner of the young wife she murmured something about "a slight hea ache," and could not but notice that Effie look harassed and pale. The trials of one night h left their trace on a countenance usually ro with health, and bright with careless goo humor.

Whilst Effie was at church Robert had ti to think over what had passed on the previo evening, and he did so with shame and regr The young farmer had a warm, affectionate hea and though selfish and self indulgent, had ne before sunk into that mire of drunkenness wh degrades a man lower than the beasts that p ish. Robert was grieved at having wronged wife by giving way to a vice which, if it beca habitual, must, as he well knew, bring them b to ruin.

"I did promise that I would make my p darling happy," thought the penitent husba as he stood leaning against his fence, look down the road by which Effie must return fr the village. "I did promise to make her hap and I meant to do so, but how soon I've bro my word ! I must try to make up to my p Effie, and I'll tell her that I'll never vex he this way again.

Here she comes, how grave and sad she is lo ing, not like my own bright little pet ! She a thorn at her heart, and it is I that have pu there, good-for-nothing fellow that I am ! no ! my Effie shall never be the wife of a dru ard ! If I can't keep to two or three glasses cut the 'Crown' altogether !"

Holland swung himself over the fence, went to meet his wife. Effie had indeed a th at her heart, and more than one. It was only grief at her husband's intemperance caused a festering sore, but remembranc words that had escaped him when he scar knew what he was saying ; words which, w he was sober, Robert forgot that he ever uttered.

"No, no, no ! you may try as you will, you not worm the secret out of me !" had bab forth the drunken man, and all in tones so that Mrs. Cross had overheard them even thro her closed door. These words of Robert now rankling in the memory of Effie, an creasing to painful intensity the curiosity w she had felt ever since the arrival of the l which bore the postmark of "Guildford." It of these words that Effie was thinking whe met her husband on the road which skirted farm.

Come, Effie, don't be down-hearted; I've en you cause to be put out, but this sort of g is not likely to happen again," said Robert, ing his wife by the hand. "I know that I ed last night like a fool; but when a fellow s amongst half-a-score of old companions, there's singing and dancing, and that kind hing, he gets tripped up by the heels before knows what he's after."

ffie remained silent; her heart was full, and eyes brimming over with tears.

Let bygones be bygones," continued Robert, r a pause. "You know that there should be squabbles between a man and his wife." The ner was stroking gently with his toil-hardened n the little hand which he held.

ffie raised her glistening eyes for a moment. " or any secrets between a man and his wife her" burst from the lips of the mortified obert instantly dropped her hand, and with uttered curse on curiosity, vaulted back over fence, and left Effie to pursue her way alone he road.

he meal which followed was partaken of al- t in silence. Robert was gloomy and sullen. secret, whatever it might be, now appeared ave upon him much the same effect as a n has on a watch-dog; it worried him, pre- ted his feeling at ease, made him watchful surly.

ffie, naturally perhaps, but unwisely, pushed e her scarcely tasted food, and gave way at to a passionate fit of crying. Robert could endure to see her tears, which seemed to to convey the bitterest reproach, so he took readiest way of escaping from what annoyed . The Sunday as well as the Saturday even- was spent with the Coles at the "Crown."

rs. Cross returned to the farm-house a few utes after Robert had left it, and found Effie miserable and somewhat indignant. The ow was no good companion for Effie at this of trial. It was not that Mrs. Cross bore malice towards the couple with whom she ed; on the contrary, she rather liked Effie, thought Robert "a pleasant, kind-hearted, d sort of man."

rs. Cross had no deliberate intention of ening the breach between husband and wife. was merely a worldly, covetous, low-mind- woman, who said what she liked to say, and what she chose to do, without any regard for feelings or welfare of others.

rs. Cross had set her heart on finding out t Robert had hid from his wife, and it was neans of Effie that she hoped to work out purpose. There was no chance of Effie's etting her husband's letter, or her husband's uarded words, whilst Mrs. Cross was near her expressions of pity, her hints, her ots, her attempts to rouse a young wife to rt her rights and resent what the widow d "Farmer Holland's most strange and terious conduct." And so under her foster- care the breach between the two widened.

is needless to recount the events of each ing day. Robert sometimes remained to supper at home, but quite as often was ab- —there was no need to make inquiries as to her he went—there was about that, at least, ecret. The Holland's were no longer of one t and mind, confidence between them was en, and where confidence is lost, love soon ns to cool and prepare for flight.

rs. Cross took pleasure in teasing Robert, by ing out Effie to talk over, in his presence, pleasures of the life which she had spent Lady Ethel in London. The farmer cared ttle to hear of the luxuries which his wife enjoyed before their marriage, as Effie did to of Holland's merry days when he lodged in house of the Coles. Neither husband nor could bear conversation which suggested a t as to whether marriage had really added e happiness of the other.

THE COMING OF THE LORD.

S. S. Lesson for September 7th. (1 Thes. 4 : 13-18 and 5 : 1-10). Golden Text, 4 : 17. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

ONE of the objects for which we are converted is to look for the coming of the Lord. "Ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God, and to wait for His Son from heaven" (1 Thes. 1 : 9, 10). Our passage of Scripture for to-day declares the Lord's coming to be the appointed means for comforting those who mourn departed friends. "I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him" (ver. 13, 14), and again (ver. 18), "therefore comfort one another with these words."

The Thessalonians who were much occupied with the Lord's return may have thought those who fell asleep in Christ were deprived of the joy they themselves anticipated in His coming. So Paul, who had sometimes spoken "by permission and not of commandment" (1 Cor. 7 :6, 12, 25, 40), declares on this point, "this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep. For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, so shall we be ever with the Lord." Undoubtedly the trumpet of the archangel is the same as in Matthew 24 : 30 31, and 1 Cor. 15 : 52, "The last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." And in Dan. 12 : 2 the same event is described.

Of this blessed fact there can be no doubt, and that this is the true precious hope of Christ's Church, "the redemption of the body" (Rom. 8 : 23, 24) when the last enemy death shall be destroyed (1 Cor. 15 : 26). But we turn naturally to our Bibles that we may endeavor to gain light upon the times and seasons. Here Paul meets us, and says of these, 'Ye have no need that I write unto you, for yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord cometh as a thief in a night. For when they (not ye) shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child, and they shall not escape." These words show us that to some at least the Lord's coming will be sudden and unlooked for. The Thessalonian converts were not among them, for Paul says, "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief." Reader, how do you stand with regard to the Lord's coming? Are your loins girded, and is your light burning, and are you like unto a man who waits for his Lord? (See 12 : 35, 36).

But what is this "sudden destruction," and what has it to do with the Lord's coming? Surely it is the time of trouble (Dan. 12 : 1, and Matt. 24 : 21, 22), the great tribulation such as was not from the beginning of the world to this time—no, nor ever shall be.

Perhaps the most anxious question which agitates the children of God is that one on which they are so much divided. Will the Lord come to take away His people before or after the time of tribulation. (See Matt. 24 : 29–31.)

But Matt. 24 : 40–44 seems to imply that the coming of the Son of Man (instead of being preceded by the tribulation, which if a sign of Christ's coming must be a most unmistakable sign) will be sudden and in a time of peace. "There shall two be in the field; the one shall be taken and other left. Two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come." This description seems hardly to agree with the great sound of a trumpet, the dead rising, etc., and thus we are driven to inquire whether there may not be two parts or stages of the Lord's coming—one perhaps before the tribulation, and one perhaps to follow it. This appears to be the teaching of Revelation 14, where we see (ver. 1-5) the first fruits gathered and standing before God, following the Lamb whithersoever He goeth. Then (ver. 6–11) the time of tribulation, and later (ver. 14–16), the harvest which is then gathered in, before the wine-press is trodden in the last awful struggle in the battle of Armageddon.

If we are right in supposing this is the signification of this passage in Revelation 14, then some other passages which speak of Christ's return become more clear. Heb. 9 : 28, "Unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation." Only to them that look for Him? There are many earnest Christians who do not look for Him, but who think that the millennium is to be introduced by the universal preaching of the Gospel; others are too taken up with themselves, their work, their cares, to be looking for His appearing. Another passage is Luke 21 : 36, "Watch ye, therefore, and pray always that ye may be accounted worthy to escape those things which are coming on the earth, and to stand before the Son of Man." This would imply that there was a way of escape for those who watch and pray, whereas others might not escape those things which are coming upon the earth. And Rev. 3 : 10 would appear to accord with this: "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience I will also keep thee from the hour of temptation (or trial) which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth."

However it may be, our blessed privilege is to watch. Paul says to his Thessalonian converts, "Ye are all the children of light and the children of the day. We are not of the night or of darkness. Therefore let us not sleep as do others, but let us watch and be sober." One who watches observes things which others pass unnoticed, and this is the privilege of such as see all political occurrences, and all religious movements, in their relation to their Lord's coming. A watcher hears every sound and recognizes every footstep and perceives the first streak of dawn. There is a meaning to him in things which are without meaning to everybody else. The watcher by the sick bed sees changes and symptoms which others cannot detect, and they who are acquainted with God's word concerning the coming of Christ can adopt the words of the Psalmist (Ps. 130 : 6), "My soul waiteth for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning; I say, more than they who watch for the morning."

But kindred with watching is sobriety. "Let us watch and be sober." It is not sober to enter into anything which may involve or entangle us, anything which may clog our steps or increase our earthly obligations. How can a man who is looking for the Lord's coming enter into perilous money speculations which must absorb all his time and thoughts? The Lord's coming would interfere with all his hopes. How can we be really distressed or really elated about any temporal thing if the centre of all our hopes is in the Lord's return? It is this blessed hope which brings all things into their right order.

"Let us who are of the day be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love," all movements of the heart covered and restrained by faith in the living God and love to Him and to all men, "and for an helmet the hope of salvation." As all contact between the heart and the outer world must be guarded by such a breastplate, so the thoughts and imaginations, reflections, etc., must be guarded by the hope of salvation, that of the entire being, when Jesus comes again. Intellectual pride, the pride of life, finds a sorry ending in the death of the body, but in the confidence of entire redemption through Jesus Christ all mental power which is utilized by Christ spreads its wings and finds itself at large.

Riots in Quebec.—A Desperate Fight Broke out at Quebec on Friday, August 15th, between the French Canadians and the Irish ship laborers. The former, having organized an independent labor society, were marching through the streets, some three thousand strong, when they were attacked by the Irish Catholics of the parent society, and a free fight ensued. Shots from revolvers and blows were freely exchanged, to the injury of a great number in the crowd. The French Canadians were driven back, turning at times to fire upon their adversaries. The principal hardware stores were entered by the crowd and fire-arms abstracted. Twenty-six men are known to have been wounded more or less seriously, and one man died. A meeting of French Canadians was held in the afternoon, at the close of which they repaired to the plains, where they and their friends assembled in large numbers. When they were able to muster 1800 men, armed with rifles, shot guns, revolvers, and other arms, a rush was made for the city, and the principal streets of the St. Louis suburbs were invaded by the mob, which rushed through them firing shots and howling most discordantly.

Exeter Hall, in London, the Famous Place in which so many religious meetings have been held and so many anti-slavery speeches made by well-remembered orators, is to be sold by the proprietors, and probably converted to other uses. It has paid a dividend of 2 to 2½ per cent. Most of this was derived from musical entertainments, but a recent act of Parliament prevented its being used for such purposes without expensive alterations as a protection against fire. About £25,000 ($122,000) had been offered for the property. The place has so many hallowed associations that general regret will be felt if it is devoted to other than religious purposes.

Rev. Charles Spurgeon, Jr., one of the Twin sons of the eminent preacher, has accepted the invitation of a Baptist Church at Greenwich to become its pastor. He was born September 30th, 1856, and possesses much of his father's spirit and power of influencing large assemblies.

John Bright's Recent Speech on English Misrule in India appears to have been misunderstood by some of our contemporaries. They have derived from it the impression that natives are not employed in the civil service of India.

But in fact the majority in number of civil servants in the pay of the English government in that country are native Indians, some of whom are in receipt of high salaries, even as much as $6000 per annum. The impression Mr. Bright must have intended to convey was that the covenanted or higher official service is in the hands of Englishmen, which is true, but the natives are unwilling or unable to go to England for the necessary training for those offices, or they might secure them at the examinations as readily as Englishmen do.

If Mr. Bright meant to say any thing different from this it must have been the result of want of knowledge on his part. This eminent statesman has derived his extensive and minute knowledge of India from books, and some of his statements have been refuted by Sir Bartle Frere, the late Lord Lawrence and other men who have derived their knowledge of India from personal observation. The truth is that in India, Englishmen have more difficulty in finding employment under the government than natives have. It may be said that England has no greater glory, and no surer hold on the favor of God than the justice and impartiality with which she has treated the people of India, and we should be sorry if a different impression obtained ground in America.

A National Crime of England's may be the more freely alluded to after the tribute just paid to the justice of that country's treatment of the people of India. We mean the open welcome given by the royalty, nobility, and aristocracy of Great Britain to Miss Sara Bernhardt, the leading actress of France, and the mother of four illegitimate children. Her Majesty the Queen appears to have kept aloof from her, but the Prince and Princess of Wales have received her at Marlborough House, and, as a matter of course, the lesser dignitaries have vied with each other in heaping honors upon the woman. Her genius is considered to extenuate the infamy of her private life.

If we are to judge of God's dealings with nations from the lessons given to us in all parts of the Old Testament, then this open crime of the rulers and leaders of the English people is a sufficient explanation why God continues to afflict their country with His judgments. In such a case prayers for relief are vain without repentance, as was well shown in Mr. Spurgeon's recent sermon on "The Present Crisis," published in the CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 31st. In this number we give some pointed remarks by Mr. Henry Varley on the very case before us. Miss Bernhardt is expected to pay a visit to the United States soon, and we fear that the leaders of society here (exclusive of our God-fearing President) will not treat her with the obloquy that overwhelms an "erring woman" of less distinguished talents.

The Rev. Newman Hall's Divorce Case has been the subject of comment in the daily press. This has arisen from the prominent position held by Mr. Hall among the Evangelical ministers of England, and from his world-wide reputation as the author of "Come to Jesus," and othe works of inestimable value.

The facts of the case cannot be too widel published, as the enemy of souls often cause garbled statements of such cases to be propagate in order to injure the cause of Christ.

The decision of the Westminster Court of D vorce, on August 9th, dissolved Mr. Hall's mar riage with a woman who, for the last twent years, has been a plague and sore hindrance t him in his ministerial work. In 1846 they wer married when he was a minister at Hull, an thirty years old, her age being eighteen. Sh was a spoilt child, self-willed, petulant and vai but talented and attractive. After their remov to London in 1854, she began to evince disi clination to religious associations, and present insisted on regularly riding in the hunting-fie in the neighborhood of Tring, as necessary her health. In 1869 she left him altogether, a has since constantly associated with a you livery-stable keeper named Richardson, wi whom the jury have found her guilty of seric misconduct. Sir James Hannen, the President the Court, in his summing up, said:

"In my opinion it is not at all an unwort motive for a husband to desire separation fr a wife if she has wronged him, and because desires to marry somebody else. Having b deprived of the comforts of a wife for so ma years, it is not at all unnatural that he should sire that most blessed of all companionsh and end his days in the enjoyment of comf of which for years he had had no experie Mrs. Hall was sinning against God as wel man. PRINCE LOUIS NAPOLEON.

IN our issue of July 24th we gave a full biography of this unfortunate young Prince; we here briefly epitomize the same.

He was born at the palace of the Tuileries in Paris, on March 16th, 1856. Great were the rejoicings in that gay city over that auspicious event.

Economic Louis Philippe had spent over the young Count de Paris 100,000 francs ($20,000) in "gratifications" to household and attendants upon a like occasion, but the Emperor's largesses ran to 850,000 francs ($170,000). But the world just then was in a liberal mood, and one at least of the many contributions of the time, the 80,000 francs ($16,000), raised by subscriptions limited to twenty-five centimes and supplemented by a small grant from the State, left traces of a good work long afterward in the permanent shape of the Prince Imperial Orphanage.

A characteristic anecdote is related of a quarrel which took place between the young Prince and the daughter of the Princess Metternich, when they were both children, at Fontainebleau, which gives early indication of the generous character he afterward more fully displayed. The children were talking about a doll's dress belonging to the Princess, and the latter was so provoked by the Prince's remarks about it that she boxed his ears. The Prince reddened, drew back as if to avoid the temptation to return the blow, and then said, in a haughty tone, "Mademoiselle, what you have done is very vulgar; you would deserve that I should do the same to you; but I must not, for you are nothing but a little girl."

In 1870, after the battle of Sedan, he went with his Imperial parents to reside in England.

While a cadet at Woolwich he was driving to Woolwich, down the Shooter's Hill Road, with the Duke of Connaught, third son of the Queen, when they were overtaken by a very heavy hailstorm. The servant suggested that they had better turn into the "Sun in the Sands" hotel. "No! no!" replied Prince Napoleon, "put up the collar of my cloak," a course of action which the Duke of Connaught fully approved, and they both drove on through the pitiless storm, which paid no respect to their earthly rank. On nearing the Herbert Hospital the familiar form of the sergeant instructor was observed through the mist-like storm; the Duke of Connaught hailed him to get up and ride down the hill; but the old soldier, with a salute, signified his disapproval of such an unsoldierly action. At this reply the Prince jumped at once out of the carriage and joined the sergeant in his trudge by the roadside to drill quarters, the Duke of Connaught quickly following.

A desire to share the hardships and perils which his military comrades at Woolwich had gone to encounter in the Zulu war led him to go to the seat of hostilities in South Africa in the spring of 1879, and there he was unfortunately killed by a sudden attack of Zulus upon him and several others who were out on a reconnoissance.

THE ARRIVAL OF THE BODY.

The Orontes, Indian troop-ship, which conveyed home the body of the Prince from the Cape, arrived at Spithead at four A.M. on Thursday, July 10th. At eight the body was lowered over the side of the great ship into a pinnace and towed by a steam launch to the Enchantress, the Admiralty yacht appointed to bring the body round to Woolwich. The pier of that place was reached about four o'clock on Friday evening. There, among the other watchers, were many who were his soldier companions. Ten officers were selected to bear the Prince's body to and from the gun carriage which conveyed it through Eltham to Chiselhurst.

The coffin prepared for the Prince consisted of an inner shell of lead, lined with white and violet quilted satin. The outer shell was of mahogany, covered with violet-colored velvet, and mounted with elaborate brass ornaments, in which the initials "L. N." were cut. The Napoleonic arms and a cross were affixed to the coffin lid. Between these two ornaments was a French inscription, giving the date of his birth and death.

THE FUNERAL.

When the body reached Camden Place, Chiselhurst, it was handed over by the cadets of the Engineers to the Empress. It was placed for the night in a little chapel, in which the body of Napoleon III. lay until the Napoleon chapel which forms part of the Roman Catholic Church of St. Mary's was erected.

To this church, which is at some little distance from the residence of the Empress, the funeral cortége proceeded the next morning. Queen Victoria went down early to Chiselhurst for the purpose of comforting the Empress by her presence in the supreme hour of trial. The Queen did not join the procession, but with the Empress viewed it unobserved from Camden House.

The pall-bearers were the Prince of Wales, Duke of Edinburgh, Duke of Connaught, and Duke of Cambridge, representing, respectively, the nation, the navy, the Prince's own corps, and the army generally. Besides these were the Crown Prince of Sweden, the Prince of Monaco, and two French marshals.

"Stag," a beautiful brown steed, which was usually mounted by the young soldier in his rides to Woolwich and back, was led after the coffin. Mr. Gamble, a Scotchman, wore on the occasion the identical uniform—cocked hat, with tricolored rosette, green and gold coat, and dress rapier—which he wore at the baptism of the Prince Imperial twenty-three years ago.

With the gentlemen cadets was a man named Henry Weathers, who was present at the funeral of Napoleon I. at St. Helena in 1821. He was also at the funeral of Napoleon III. at Chiselhurst, in 1873, and now at that of the Emperor's only son.

The exact date of the Prince Imperial's death was not the 1st of June, as generally misstated, but Saturday, 31st of May, at four in the afternoon. A letter from the seat of hostilities states that he was slightly lame at the time from an abscess in the hip, and this may have prevented him from vaulting into the saddle with his usual alert skill. He was very active, and was a noted runner at the athletic sports of the Woolwich cadets.

THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON III.

THIS remarkable man was born on April 24th, 1808, at the Tuileries; and his birth, like that of Bonaparte's only son the King of Rome, was announced by the firing of cannon—a mark of honor only conferred upon those who were of the Imperial family.

His father, Louis, brother to Napoleon I., was formerly King of Holland; and his mother, Hortense Beauharnais, was the daughter of the Empress Josephine. Napoleon Bonaparte is reported to have been much attached to him, and on more than one occasion to have expressed a presentiment that he would be the ultimate representative of the Napoleon dynasty.

At the age of twenty he united for a short time with his brother in an Italian rebellion against the Pope. His conduct in the dangers to which he was thus exposed was marked by great self-possession and courage. From an early period in life he was profoundly impressed with the conviction that he had a great mission and destiny to fulfil in relation to France.

In accordance with this belief he landed at Strasbourg on December 17th, 1836, with a few associates, and endeavored to excite the garrison and inhabitants of that city to revolt against the government of Louis Philippe. A portion of the military forces stationed there ranged themselves under his banner, but, from a want of compliance on the part of other regiments, the attempt proved abortive, and he was apprehended, and upon trial banished to the United States, where he did not remain more than two or three months.

A second expedition for the same purpose, and with a like result, was undertaken by him on August 6th, 1840. Embarking from the l lish coast in company with a band of dev adherents, he landed at Boulogne, and mar with his followers into the town, hoping to c an uprising of the people in favor of his m ment. They failed, however, to respond a

Napoleon's campaign against Austria was a series of uninterrupted successes. Having utterly overwhelmed and routed the Austrian army at the battle of Solferino, he had the power in his hands of fulfilling his promise of giving Italy to the Italians. But here the real character and aim of the man came to light. His desire was not to give freedom to any one—

"How should a tyrant set men free?"— but to consolidate his own seat on the French throne, and to carry out the programme he had planned in exile. He desired to revenge the fall of his uncle, Napoleon I., and to chastise his uncle's enemies. Russia had been punished for the burning of Moscow by the Crimean campaign, and now Austria had been humiliated for her share in his fall. He desired no more in that direction, and he concluded a peace with the Austrian Emperor at Villafranca, which took all Europe by surprise and left his promise of freedom to Italy unfulfilled.

By that peace Venetia, the gem of the Italian States, was left in the hands of Austria, and the Pope still held the States of the Church. Nor did that end his breach of faith. Italy was forced to hand over to France Nice and Savoy, to compensate the Imperial hireling who had falsified his large promises to the Italian people.

Two articles of his programme were achieved. It still remained to punish Prussia to annex Belgium, and to take vengeance on England. Whether he seriously contemplated the fourth and fifth articles of the programme will never be known, for the third step in his progress brought his imperial career to a close.

1870 he declared war against Prussia—a war which ended in a defeat of his armies, and his surrender to the King of Prussia at Sedan. He was carried prisoner to the Castle of Wilhelmshöhe, and the victorious German army entered Paris in triumph, and in the Palace of Versailles the King of Prussia was proclaimed Emperor of a united Germany.

Upon his release from the Castle of Wilhelmshöhe he came to England and took up his residence at Chiselhurst in Kent, where he died in January, 1873.

THE EX-EMPRESS EUGENIE.

EUGENIE, Countess of Teba, is descended from the family of Gurzman, one of the most renowned houses in Europe, for it is the parent-stock from which have sprung great Dukes and Grandees of Spain.

The Empress Eugénie is not the first of her race who has been raised to a throne, for in 1663 Dona Louisa Francesca de Gurzman married the King of Portugal, Don Juan IV. of Broganza. Her Majesty loves to recount that she is lineally descended from the family of the great St. Dominic. Her maternal grandfather had been a Scottish gentleman, Consul to his Britannic Majesty at Malaga; her father, the Count de Montijo, a Spaniard, who had served the Empire, and had been among those nominated to defend Paris against the allies in '15.

After her father's death, Eugenie de Montijo, Countess of Teba, accompanied her mother to Paris, where she entered with zest into the gayeties of the French capital. There she met her future husband, then President of the French Republic. The narrative of their first meeting is quite full of romantic interest.

A few nights before the coup d'état President Louis Napoleon gave a grand ball at the Elysée. The wealth and fashion of Paris were represented there. Perfume of flowers and strains of sweet music filled the air. Magnificent as the scene was the President, tired of it, and longed to be out under the calmer light of the stars; so taking his friend, Edgard Ney, the Duke of La Moskowa, by the arm, he started out through the conservatory for the cool gardens.

As he stepped through the doorway a picture met his gaze that almost took away his breath, and for a moment he stood as one in a dream. It was not long, however, before he saw that the beautiful vision was reality. Standing before a mirror in the conservatory was the most exquisite creature he had ever seen in his life. A young lady, whose golden hair had fallen from its confining comb down over her white shoulders, was trying to arrange the truant curls with nervous fingers.

The gallantry of a Frenchman would not permit him to stand staring in the doorway even at so beautiful a sight; so stepping quickly to her side, the future Emperor, with a courtly bow, offered his arm to his future bride, and conducted her to a dressing-room, where she could repair the ravages of the dance. It was a case of love at first sight, and the ardent Napoleon hastened back to the ball-room, where he awaited with impatience the return of the beautiful Spaniard. Nor did his regard for Mlle. de Montijo prove transitory. He proposed marriage to her, and was accepted.

Their union was solemnized with great magnificence in 1853. Nor did Napoleon ever regret his choice, for after he became a prisoner, and his wife a fugitive, the revolutionists, in sacking his palace, found there a document in the Emperor's handwriting, in which he expressed his glowing admiration of his wife.

When the Empress was ascending the throne, the city of Paris offered to her a magnificent parure of diamonds. She refused the jewels, and begged that she might be allowed to dispose of their value for the good of the city. With the proceeds she established in one of the worst parts of Paris an orphanage, which is still flourishing under her patronage; and when the Emperor died, the children sent a superbly embroidered memorial wreath, which is now one of the ornaments of the tomb at Chiselhurst.

In 1864 the town of Amiens was desolate and terror-stricken by the presence of cholera, which was slaying its victims by hundreds. Half the population had fled in sheer fright; nurses and doctors had lost their self-possession. The Empress Eugenie left her home in the Tuileries—the young mother, the happy wife—without hesitation and without fear, and hurried to the city. She entered the hospital and the homes of the poor; she stood by the bedside of the dying; she poured words of consolation and encouragement into their ears; she personally soothed their last moments. It had its reward. Fresh courage, new hope, sprung up in consequence in the Minster city, and those who had fled returned to their homes; from that time the disease slowly died away.

In the absence of the Emperor during the Austrian campaign, the Empress was appointed Regent, and on the return of the victorious monarch the Ministers unanimously requested that Her Majesty should assist at the Cabinet meetings; and from that time dates the undoubted influence which she obtained, by sheer force of talent and power of will, in the Imperial councils, which influence the Jesuits knew well how to use. But they over-played their part in inducing her to urge on her husband to engage in the disastrous Franco-German War of 1870, which led to her flight from Paris to England.

Since the death of Napoleon III. the Empress has lived in dignified retirement at Chiselhurst, almost within the shadow of the tomb of her beloved husband. Since the death of her beloved and only son she is said to have written to her aged mother that she purposes spending a few months in retreat in a covent near Burgos, and afterward she will join the Countess of Montijo.

PRINCE JEROME NAPOLEON.

JOSEPH CHARLES PAUL JEROME BONAPARTE, cousin of the late Napoleon III., is the second son of Jerome Bonaparte, brother of Napoleon I., by his second wife, the Princess Frederika of Wurtemberg, and was born at Trieste, September 9th, 1822.

He passed his youth in Austria and Italy, and later he resided in Switzerland. He then passed five or six years in England, which he mainly devoted to the study of the English Constitution. But his friends appear to have been few, and in his consequent isolation he imbibed sentiments by no means favorable to that country. Nevertheless, the effect of his studies of English institutions have had considerable weight in the formation of his political opinions.

After a short visit to Spain he received permission to reside in France in 1845; but in order to nullify any undue influence which his name might give him, he assumed the title of Comte de Montfort. This privilege was, however, soon withdrawn, for he was discovered to be engaged in intrigues against the Government of Louis Philippe.

When his cousin was chosen President of the Republic in 1848, he returned once more to Paris, and was elected to represent his great ancestor's native island, Corsica, in the Assembly. In this position the wilfulness of his disposition again made itself apparent, for he allied himself to the extreme Republican party, who sought to make him their willing instrument to overthrow his cousin Louis Napoleon. So ardent was he in his attachment to Republican principles that, when he discovered that his cousin meditated treason to the Constitution, he went to Victor Hugo and denounced him, and urged the great Republican leader to have Louis Napoleon arrested. This fact, doubted by many, is affirmed by Victor Hugo himself in his latest work. Nevertheless, in 1851, he threw off his Republican friends for his cousin's Empire, and shouted "Vive l'Empereur!" with the loudest. He was then sent as ambassador to Madrid, but as he quitted his post whenever he pleased without authority, he was soon recalled.

In 1853 he was made a French Prince, honors were showered upon him, and he received the rank of General of Division. The French people have ever regarded him as holding the very secondary and not very creditable position of a hanger-on rather than as a man of action. One of the standing jokes against him is that he always commands "a reserve," or forlorn hope, but under his command neither he nor it ever comes to the front. He commanded the "reserves" in the Crimean war, and his sudden exit from the scene of action did not raise him in the good opinion of the French nation. The sobriquet of Plon-Plon given to him on that occasion will perpetuate the memorv of that ungallant retreat.

His wilfulness, aided possibly by envy at the height of fame to which his cousin had risen, manifested itself soon after his return from the Crimea. He is credited with giving information to the Republicans concerning the conduct of the war in the character of an eavesdropper. That party was not slow to use the same in order to tarnish the glittering escutcheon of Napoleon III.

The pamphlet in which this information was given was suppressed, but Prince Jerome was never forgiven by Napoleon III., and the inheritance of this condemnation strikingly appears in the late Prince Louis Napoleon's will, in which he desires to set aside the Prince Jerome from any claims on the Imperialist party of France.

He was President of the Exhibition Commissions of 1855 and 1865. On the first occasion he gave great satisfaction, but on the second he suddenly resigned his post because of a reprimand which he had received from the Emperor for a thoughtless or envious speech which he had made.

In 1859 he married the Princess Clotilde, daughter of the King of Italy, by whom he has two sons and one daughter. He commanded a division of the French army during the Italian war, but his division was composed again of "reserves," and neither he nor his division were engaged with the enemy.

He made a violent attack in the Senate upon the family of the late King Louis Philippe, one of whose sons, the Duke d'Aumale, challenged him to fight a duel, but Prince Napoleon had the courage to refuse to take part in the game of murder, and thus displayed greater moral courage than if he had accepted the challenge.

Upon the fall of the Empire in 1870 Prince

Napoleon came again to England. Here he equipped a yacht and started upon an extended cruise to the United States and South America, returning to the Mediterranean, and visiting almost every port in that great sea.

In 1872 he endeavored, but without success, to organize a party of his own in opposition to the interests of the recently deceased Prince Louis Napoleon.

His personal likeness to the great Napoleon is very striking, and in the character of his mind his associates notice also a mental resemblance to that extraordinary man.

An Englishman who visited him recently writes : "As to the personal qualities of Prince Napoleon, he is a man of remarkable ability and wide culture. That he can write, and write well, is shown by his contributions to the Revue des deux Mondes and other publications ; he is, moreover, an acute art critic, and there are few sciences with which he is not acquainted ; with more than one his acquaintance is profound. It would seem, indeed, that the new chief of the Bonaparte family possesses not a little of the genius of its founder, and had he been endowed with greater steadfastness of purpose, and been less of a cynic, he might have made for himself a name in history, and his now hardly concealed pretensions to the throne of his uncle might, in certain not impossible contingencies, be crowned with success."

Among "the not impossible contingencies" is that of the French nation, with its characteristic fickleness, becoming tired of a Republican form of government, and looking around for a monarch who is in accord with the ideas of the time. Prince Napoleon's socialistic ideas and his avowed sympathy with Republican principles might in such a case appeal to the people, and by a plebiscit grasp supreme power. He would thus unite the prestige of the Napoleons with the principles of the Republic, and attain a popularity rarely aroused by an aspirant to a throne.

Moreover, the disasters of Sedan, which would have operated as a bar to Prince Louis Napoleon's pretensions, do not apply to Prince Jerome, for it was well known in France that he was opposed to the war with Germany, and did his utmost to dissuade the Emperor from entering upon it.

It is certain that if France desired a change of government, Prince Napoleon would be the most popular of the three pretenders to the throne, the other two being the respective representatives of the Bourbons and the Orleanists. By the law of France, he is, too, the legal successor to any rights the Bonapartists have in France.

Prince Napoleon cannot be said to have any religious opinions at all, his disbelief in the verities of the Gospel of Christ being openly avowed. Remembering this, one is not surprised at some of his published opinions upon social matters.

For nearly twenty years, and at a time when two lives—those of the Emperor and his infant son—intervened between him and the head of the Bonapartist family, some prophetic expositors pointed to Prince Jerome Napoleon as possibly destined to be the final great head of the Roman Empire, the little horn of Daniel 7 and 8, and the ten-horned wild beast of Revelation 13, 17, and 19, who is to perish at the battle of Armageddon at the Second Advent of Christ. Time alone can show whether such anticipations are well founded. But he certainly possesses many of the characteristics we are taught to look for as distinguishing that monster of iniquity.

CARDINAL BONAPARTE.

Lucien Bonaparte, now a Cardinal in the Church of Rome, is the second son of Charles, second Prince of Canino, and grandson of Lucien, brother of Napoleon I.

It is necessary for the purpose of this sketch to take a hasty glance at the "family tree" from which the Cardinal is descended. Not one of the historical romances of which the race reared by Carlo Bonaparte and his wife Letitia Ramolini, in the Island of Corsica, are heroes, is more curious than the strange chain of events by which a Bonaparte finds himself a Cardinal and a devoted servant of the Roman Pontiff.

When the clever company of youthful Bonapartes left the widowed home to seek their destinies as rulers of men, most of them found it convenient to throw off the robe of Catholicism with which their youth had been clothed.

Lucien, the grandfather of the Cardinal, was the least robust of the brothers, possessing a sensitive nature, and was the scholar of the family. He often restrained the high-handed policy of his great brother in his venturesome life as soldier, Consul, and Emperor. In the Emperor's view of the matter, Lucien disgraced his family, like his brother Jerome, by marrying beneath him. So while the less talented brothers were kings, Lucien was never created a Prince of the Empire.

At the fall of Napoleon I. Lucien retired to England, and lived surrounded with comfort, and much respected, in a magnificent house in Thorn Grove, near Ludlow Castle. Here Charles, the father of the Cardinal, was born, and here the father received from the Pope the title which descended to the son—Prince of Canino.

Lucien, the cardinal, was born in Rome on November 15th, 1828, and was the second son of Charles Bonaparte. Until twelve years of age he enjoyed the society and educational supervision of his grandfather, in whose home he had the advantage of mingling with the best society in Europe. As a boy he was in character every inch a Bonaparte, and in features the counterpart of Napoleon I.

In his twentieth year, when every capital in Europe was ablaze with revolution, he made a bold stand against his father, who was elected President of the short-lived Republic which was established in Rome. He had fled from Rome to Naples at the same time as the Pope escaped to Gaeta. From his letters at that time it appears that the son withdrew from Bonapartism and its creed at the same ratio as the father drifted into Republicanism. He had no sympathy with the programme of his cousin Louis at Paris, nor of his Republican father at Rome.

Unlike his cousin Jerome, honors were forced upon Lucien Bonaparte. The devotion of the Empress Eugenie to the cause of Catholicism, and the restoration of the Pope to Rome, and maintaining him there for many years, gave the Napoleons some claim to Pontifical favors, although others of the Bonapartes were still the avowed enemies of Papal pretensions. Under these circumstances Lucien Bonaparte was the only channel through which clerical favors could be conveyed. These were the only ones the Pope had it in his power to bestow.

Lucien Bonaparte was made successively private chamberlain of the Pope and a domestic prelate, but his retiring habits of life induced him to live in an oratory in comparative seclusion. On March 13th, 1868, he was created a Cardinal, an honor which he accepted unwillingly. This creation occurred just in time to allow the Cardinal to attend the Vatican Council, and he voted for the dogma of the Infallibility of the Pope.

So little is he seen in the Vatican that his absence gave rise not long since to a suspicion of his having a leaning toward the King of Italy, who is looked upon as the spoiler of the Catholic Church. He is regarded by some as likely one day to become Pope of Rome, and even possibly to fulfil the prophecy of Revelation 13 : 2.

KILLED IN HIS OWN TUNNEL.

At the Interoceanic Canal Congress lately held in Paris, there sat among the leaders of the enterprise a noticeable gray-haired man with keen eyes and a melancholy look constantly upon his face. The company gathered round to congratulate him upon the approaching successful termination of one of the greatest engineering achievements of the century. Then, turning to a friend at his left, "I have worked all my life," said he, "for a little renown and a little wealth ; and now, in the moment of m triumph, I find that neither is worth what i has cost me. Indeed, the only use of the mone from the Congress to Airolo, at the tunnel' mouth, and was showing the levels to a Frenc engineer, on the morning of Saturday, July 19t when he was suddenly overcome by a jet of fo gas ; he called for a glass of water, and fell dow dead.

His death was singular. When he underto the St. Gothard contract he told his friends have entered into his life, and a settled mela choly took possession of him. Every accide that occurred among the workman affected hi deeply, and never was there a piece of enginee ing more remarkable for its casualties. In t first year sixteen men were killed ; in the se ond, twenty-four. In 1876 nearly one hundr

RNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE ;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

A hrilling Story by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

TE suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act al- the aspect of matters. Well-known and ost partisans of Mitchell, and those who athized with him—such of them, at least, d not fled to the provinces—were speedily nd, and the prisons of the city, trebly ed, were filled with political offenders. It d that for a week Lord Clarendon never ed his clothes, was up night and day re- g messages and sending forth despatches ; Government officials were worked at high ire, and the civil and military forces were ready for action at a moment's call.

ny one during this eventful week had stood nt of a certain range of buildings in Lower Yard, he would have seen every now and certain unattractive looking individuals with slouching gait from the main entrance the quadrangle, and, after a furtive survey surroundings, to make sure they were not ved, plunge suddenly through the open door ell-known Government office. These in- iduals are paid informers and spies ; they come to give the authorities the names of who in their presence committed them- to treasonable words or actions, under the that the same ardent and self-sacrificing tism which burned in their own bosoms d in the breasts of those degraded and erous hirelings—hirelings who, in many had egged on their victims to the political for the discovery of which they now ed a money payment ; and the price not un- ently was pocketed with an inward chuckle, h it might prove the price of the life of a comrade.

will describe the interior of the office as it red one day in the middle of the week we spoken of. In the centre of the floor is a square table, covered in black leather ; it lie several law books, and large folded ap papers, fastened about the middle with pe or elastic bands. At the head of the sits Mr. Katcham, the chief of the depart- and at each side of it are his clerks, and im stand, dressed in their handsome uni- four or five superior officers of the Irish abulary. A man is standing close to the opposite to the chief, who is questioning and the clerks are carefully taking down positions.

Te man is Micky Haley, the quondam piper, ow self-styled littérateur, and he has come nounce Arnold Percival Montaigne as a unced disloyal man, an advocate of civil ter, and altogether one most dangerous to large in such a time of public peril.

ou say, my man, you have known this eman, Montaigne, for a long time?" said ief, looking full into Haley's face.

ndeed, an' ye may say that," said the piper. Sure, wanst upon a time, yer honor, I was a onman—savin' yer honor's presince. Not, dherstand, that I iver was wan in me heart, onor,"—and Haley spoke the lie without a r,—"but, bedad, I liked to be acquainted, ow, wid their onderhand ways and saycrits, at upon an occashun, yer honor, like the nt, prehaps I might have the chance, yer r, as I have now, of earnin' an 'onest pinny tin' out the thruth to the good o' me coun- Well, uv coorse, bein' a sworn-in man, free admittance to the meetin's, yer honor, help uz and save uz!—if I war to die this it, I'm ready to take me solemn oath—"

"Remember, my man, you are now upon your oath," said the chief of police.

"Indeed, that's thrue for ye, yer honor. Shure, I 'onestly kissed the book, so I did, and it's meself that's behouldin' to your honor's honor fur puttin' me so koindly in mind uv it. Well, thin, afore yer honor, and these gintlemin peelers, in their beautiful goold and silver lace, I sware upon me solemn oath that I have seen this same Mr. Montaigne, innocent as he looks here in Dublin, at a ribbon meetin', and that too when every wan presint giv their vote for the murdher uv a gintleman who lived in the neighborhood, and him wan that niver done anyboddy a ha'porth o' harm, God bless uz! And, be the same token, it was voted to kill him, not by shootin' o' him—oh, no, that death was counted too aisy for him by half—but to pounce upon him on a suddint—like a dog on a rat, yer honor—whin shootin' snipes in the bog, tie him hand and fut, so that he culdn't stir, bury him alive in a deep and saycrit cave, knowed to uz, and lave him to die o' starvashun."

We know that this whole statement of Haley's, made on oath, was, in all the particulars given, perfectly correct. That Percival had been seen by Haley at a Ribbon Society assembly ; that at the meeting held on that occasion all had given their vote for murder and by starvation ; but the malignant piper suppressed a most material fact, one which altered the whole nature of his assertion—that Percival was there sorely against his will, and he himself was the subject of the diabolical outrage—was not one to pass the sentence of slow death, but was the intended victim. Haley's testimony produced a thrill of horror in the heart of all in the office, and the chief deemed it incredible. Seeing this, the informer added, "Och, thin—though it's hard to think such things can happen in God's world—ye may believe every word I'm a-tellin' ye, yer honor. Sorra a word of a lie is in it from beginnin' to end. It's all Bible truth.

"An' shure, I wudn't for all the world do sich a thing as tell a lie, and me on me oath. It 'id be insultin' to yer honor, and would be doin' a hurt to me tindher conshense. And more nor that, what I've jist tould yer honor isn't the whole that I've to say—no, nor half uv it. Fur I can declare, upon the solemn vartue o' me oath, to yer honor and the gintlemin poliss here, that the sintince I have named was—savin' yer prisince—actually and totally carried out. Yes ; the gintlemin who in the prisince o' Mr. Montaigne it was agreed should be 'put out o' the way' wuz pounced upon, wuz bound hand and fut, wuz tied arms and legs, faster nor anny pig ever carried to market, wuz put in the cowld, dark cave to starve, and this same Mr. Montaigne know'd all about it."

"Oh, the dreadful miscreant," exclaimed the chief ; a judgment that was echoed by all in the office. "But, perhaps, my man, he relented, and had this wretched person you speak of afterwards let go," suggested two or three. "No, niver a bit, yer honor," said the imperturbable Haley. "It war another man altogither that, takin' pity on the poor prisoner, did the marciful job. If it war left to be done by the dacent man, Mr. Montaigne, shure the condimned and bound man, yer honor, wud to this hour have been in the cowld and dark cave, and railly, I suppose, be this time wouldn't be even a corpse, but a grinnin' skileton. And, afore me God!" the scoundrel added, "I've only sed the thruth, yer honor, though shure enough the words are hard to be towld o' anny gintlemin. But dosn't it only show uz, yer honor, that it's a bad worreld, and that there's manny a black heart carries a fair countenance?"

Seeing he was heard with rapt attention, Haley proceeded, "More nor all this, yer honor, I can tell ye. This same Mr. Montaigne, for his own inds, calls himsel' a Protestan', but I know betther nor that, fur wid me own two eyes I have seen him, when he thought no one know'd it, in —— chapel." This also we know, so far as it went, was the statement of fact. What follows, however, was false, or gross exaggeration.

"And I noticed," he continued, "that he sprinkled the holy wather—God bless us!—and crossed and blessed himsel', and bowed and prayed and thumped his craw (his breast), and listened to the priest, like any Catholic. An' shure, there's thim givin' all their lives to mass culdn't have done it betther, and, in consequince, as yer honor will see, 'tis plain as a pikestaff that me Protestant Mr. Montaigne is nothin' but a concealed hypocritical and recusant Papist, on whom no wan can depind for wan momint. And now, yer honor, havin' said this to aise me mind, I cum to what belongs more to me presint business."

"That's right, my man," said the chief. "What you have stated is no doubt important, but what we now require here is a statement concerning matters that pertain to the present threatened rising. Keep to this, will you?" "All right, yer honor," answered Haley. And then he added, with cringing flattery, "Och, and to be shure but it's yer honor's honor that has the head for biz'ness. Upon my conshence, it's the Lord Lieftinant himsel', if things only went be desarts, that ye ought to be." "Go on with your deposition, my man, and don't talk nonsense," said the chief sternly. Haley bowed at the rebuke, and thus proceeded, "Well, yer honor, about Mr. Montaigne and John Mitchell (that's gone beyant the says) and the clubs that I was spakin' of, this is what I have to say. Three weeks ago I seen this same idintical gintlemin, Mr. Montaigne, with me own eyes (as I did him in the chapel, as I've said) at the Capel Street Club," and Haley paused as having made a great revelation. "Is that all?" said the chief.

Haley evidently had supposed that this one fact would of itself be a sufficient condemnation of Percival, for he looked quite disappointed at the remark of the chief. "At the Capel Street Club," repeated Haley, "I say I've seen him, and yer honor knows what sort of ground for a loyal man that same place is." "Oh, yes," said the chief. "It's now altogether an illegal thing to meet there since the last Act, but it was not so, my man, at the time you have mentioned." "Ah! but then," urged Haley, "I've seen him there twice;" and then, to make his testimony of more weight still, he went beyond what he knew was truth—"Ay, scores o' times, yer honor." "Bad enough," remarked the chief. "But then mere attendance of itself at the club you mention does not make this Mr. Montaigne a dangerous man. Have you ever heard him speak words of a treasonable character?" Haley never had ; no one ever had.

But the malignant piper, having gone so far, would not now be balked of his revenge. He knew the times were such as to produce in the minds of the Castle officials a disposition to readily receive and believe information about political offenders, for alarm was abroad ; so he made up his mind to invent such a charge against Percival as would ensure his arrest.

"Did I iver hear him spake traysin, is it, ye ask me, yer honor? Och, thin, it's meself that has, more's the pity ; for it's hard to be down on a gintlemin." "When did you hear him?" inquired the chief. "Wan time is as fresh as a daisy in me mimry," said Haley. "Give the date, if you can," said the chief. "It was the — of April," replied Haley, and he gave the very day upon which, as we have related, civil war was resolved upon in a meeting of the confederates.

"Were you there yourself?" said the chief. "Oh, thin, sure I was," answered the piper. "And what makes you so sure of the day, my man, for the date is important?" "Bekase of a sartin thing that happened on it to meself," was the answer. "What was that?" "Och, thin," said Haley, "it war a curious thing all out, yer honor, but wan to fasten it well in me mind. I'm a piper by purfession, yer honor, that is, I was ontil lately ; and on that day, savin' yer prisince, I tuk up me pipes for a bit o' private divarshin, and I burst me bellows playin' the 'Wearin' o' the Green' for a friend o' me own from the counthry."

CURRENT EVENTS.

General Grant's Avowal that He is not a candidate for the Presidential chair, and does not desire a nomination, continues to be much canvassed. It is said by General Grant's friends that if nominated he would not refuse to become a candidate, but the impression grows that Mr. Sherman would be as good a candidate, inasmuch as a prejudice exists against a third term President, and Mr. Sherman's success in managing the financial concerns of the nation would secure for him the support of the business classes.

The Political Contests of the Fall have Already at this early stage been marked by two shooting cases, one of which has had a fatal termination, and in the other the victim lies in a critical condition.

In Yazoo County, Mississippi, Mr. Henry M. Dixon was candidate for the office of sheriff. He had formerly been a Democrat, and has been so energetic as to have incurred the charge of bull-dozing. But having had a disagreement with his party, he was now running as an independent candidate. Considerable animosity had been aroused against him by this course, and he had been urged to withdraw from the contest. On August 20 Mr. Dixon, armed with a revolver, encountered on the public street a prominent Democrat named Barksdale, who was carrying a shotgun. A dispute ensued, in which Mr. Dixon was shot, and died soon afterwards.

Murders of this character are much commoner among respectable people in this country than they would be if the legislature rigidly enforced God's law—"Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." (Gen. 9 : 6.)

The Shooting of Rev. I. S. Kalloch on August 23d is the second of the crimes alluded to, having its origin in politics. Mr. Kalloch is a Baptist minister, formerly of Boston, Mass, but who had taken to politics as a profession, and was running as workingmen's candidate for the Mayoralty of San Francisco. He was violently opposed by the the Chronicle, and the editor, Mr. Charles De Young, in assailing him descended to personalities, and publicly charged him with disgraceful conduct of which Mr. Kalloch was said to have been guilty twenty years ago in Boston and Kansas. Mr. Kalloch retorted by reflections on the morality of De Young's parents, and threatened to publish a detailed statement, whereupon Mr. De Young drove to his hotel and shot Mr. Kalloch, injuring him seriously. He now lies in a precarious condition.

A determined effort was made by the mob to lynch Mr. De Young, and it was thought for some time that the jail would have been destroyed, but Mr. Denis Kearney, who has powerful influence over the lower classes, earnestly advised moderation and peaceable conduct; and he succeeded in allaying the popular indignation. Great excitement prevailed for some time, and it was thought necessary to protect the jail with cannon, and call for military assistance.

While nothing can excuse the lawless act of Mr. De Young, it is to be regretted that Mr. Kalloch, who is professedly a disciple of the meek and lowly Saviour who, "when he was reviled reviled not again," should have followed the bad example set him in returning personal abuse for personal abuse, and so caused the enemies of Christ to blaspheme.

The Filling Up of the Bay of New York by the process of dumping into it the garbage of the streets has been for some time the subject of protest. The existence of the practice has been persistently denied by the commissioners, but the New York Herald recently chartered a steamer to watch the actions of the garbage-laden vessels, and caught them in the act. Pilots say that the channel is gradually being filled up through this unlawful practice, and that vessels get aground at places where a few years ago they might have sailed in safety. Now that proof has been furnished, it is hoped that the authorities will protect one of the finest harbors in the world from wanton destruction.

Dr. Talmage writes from England: "This summer is cut out from all the months and years of my life as the one most pleasurable. The hand-shaking, the streets blockaded by friends, and the 'God bless yous' from hundreds of thousands of people, will make me feel better forever.

"I have preached and lectured sixty-three times already ; and such enthusiastic times I have never had before, and never expect to have again. By the day of my return I shall have spoken in all the principal towns and cities of England, Ireland, and Scotland. My party, worn out with excitement, have retreated from the scene, while I so far have increased in health. I can stand as much kindness as any man I know of."

From Memphis there is at Present no Hopeful news. The frosts of next month are eagerly anticipated as the only hope for the stricken city. The expenses of the Fever Board are now $1000 per day, and an earnest appeal for assistance has been issued.

The deserted state of the city has proved a temptation to burglars and incendiaries, who have plied their vile avocations, with energy. A patrol force has been organized, but robberies continue to be committed by burglars on the back streets. The city looks more deserted daily. Business has almost ceased except for the nec saries of life. Doctors, nurses, Howard visito members of relief organizations, State troo police, firemen, newspaper reporters, and lour ing negroes are all the people one sees on t street. Occasionally some woman or child com along the street to remind of the past, t even that woman or child is acclimated. Ma white persons continue to go to camps. The c ored people yet remain in the city.

In the suburbs mounted patrols of volunt citizens do duty day and night, protecting pers and property. Incendiaries and burglars wh arrested are not escorted to jail, but are e cuted. All persons are required to be in th homes between the hours of nine at night a four in the morning. Any person found obeying this order are arrested.

The Oneida Community, of which an Acco appeared in the CHRISTIAN HERALD of Febru 27th, have lately taken an important step deference to the opinions of their neighbors. ternal dissensions and external pressure have duced John Humphrey Noyes, the founder of community, to forbid the immoral cust known by them under the title of complex m riages. Hereafter under the new rule mem must either live celibate lives or be marrie one wife, as in ordinary civilized society. It been decided to retain their other commun principles and practices ; viz., to continue to their business and property in common ; to tinue to live together and to eat at the s table ; to retain the common department fo fants and juveniles, and to maintain the pra of regular evening meetings for mutual critic These people have been leading sinful lives as is usually the case have ended by quarre among themselves. A project commenced carried out in violation of the laws of Go in it no element of stability.

One of Mr. Moody's Neighbors at North says of him : "I have seen him in a great large places, but I come here to this little t where he knows everybody and takes an int in everything, to be more thoroughly cha with him than ever before. People like to la Mr. Moody knows it, and has the tact t the audience in good humor to commence "That is very good singing for one cong tion," he said at a meeting the other day a close of the first verse of "Guide me, O Great Jehovah," "but there are a good different congregations represented here, a ought to sing better than that. All sing Mrs. Davis, take that fan away from your m Mrs. Smith, I didn't hear your voice! Charles, you can sing! Here, mother, h the place ; you sing! Now try again. I'l watch and see if there are any who don't si

The Ocean Grove Camp Meeting.—The York Daily Witness describes the meet Ocean Grove on Sunday, August 24th, as the most spiritual days that have been wit there this season.

At daylight the Tabernacle was crow what is known as the sunrise meeting. Th followed at nine o'clock by a love feast auditorium. Hundreds stood with um over their heads sooner than go away.

It was a perfect outpouring of the peopl one thousand offering testimony for Chris when the regular service commenced, o meetings were convened in the Taberna the Young People's Temple.

As the time arrived for the evening se sight presented itself in the meeting g that far exceeded even the expectation o who had predicted a rush. Fully ten th were packed together, hundreds of chai tables being brought out from the tents t on. It was a grand picture to look out that vast multitude united in singing praise.

Another Peabody Gift.—Mrs. Judith I of Georgetown, Mass., a sister of Geor body, has made a bequest of $10,000 for th fit of the public library of that place.

Mormonism is Believed by Some Persons to ve redeeming features, but the following pas- ge from a recent article by Bishop Haven, of e Methodist Episcopal Church, reminds us at a fountain cannot send forth at the same ace sweet water and bitter: "Another evil is eaking out. The pretence that this course of e cures immorality is come to an end. Salt ke City is said to be as full of public aban- ed characters as any other city of like size. en daughters of Brigham Young are said to of this sort. This lust of polygamy has over- ped its professed bounds, and a many-wived rmon is as licentious as a single-man sinner ewhere. This overflowing iniquity makes the y doubly and trebly corrupt. There is no puri- in man or woman. Polygamy makes each a ature of lust and sin. The whole region rots the festering of its own hellish passions."

Doctor Cullis's Faith Work.—Doctor Cullis, ho carries on in Boston a work of faith similar that of Mr. Muller in England, likes to dwell on the fact that there are two possibilities-- mely, "all things are possible with God"; and ain, "all things are possible to him that be- eveth." (Mark 9 : 23.)

It is fifteen years or more since Dr. Cullis ened a House for Consumptives, where the or suffering from this disease can be sheltered d suitably cared for as regards both body d mind until cured or released by death. The hole number cared for thus far is 1802. It has en supported without any solicitation from an; but in answer to prayer, God has, through e gifts of persons widely scattered as regards cality, sent the amount of $364,242.21.

Over $8000 have also been sent in the same ay for the establishment of the Cancer Home, r which secret prayer was daily offered through e long period of eight years.

A Girl's Hair Sacrificed.—Julia Clarke, a San rancisco factory girl, was caught in a machine cently by her long hair. She seized a pair of ears and cut off her tresses so quickly that she as not drawn between the wheels and killed, s she otherwise would have been. So to save er bodily life the girl promptly sacrificed a easure which was naturally precious to her. low much more is it necessary sometimes to crifice what is dear as a right hand or a right ye, when eternal life is at stake (Matt. 5 : 30).

A Beneficial Law Relating to the Amuse- hents in the low-class halls of our cities will oon be in operation, and it is hoped will be tringently enforced. It is designed to sup- ress the dangerous shows which have been ractised. It forbids the occupant of any place f amusement, or grounds, or building, to allow is place to be used for an exhibition of skill in nife or sword throwing, or to allow a bowgun, istol, or firearm of any kind to be discharged at r aimed toward any human being. Some such rohibition is undoubtedly wholesome. Hardly year ago the country was shocked by a fatal asualty to an actress, in a play in which one erformer shot with a rifle at an apple on the ead of another.

A depraved taste brings large numbers every- here to witness performances in which the inter- st centres in the danger of the feats performed. The Spirit of God alone can regenerate that aste, but it is right and proper to place by legis- ation all possible restrictions on its indulgence. Deut. 22 : 8.)

Pen-Picture of Mr. Spurgeon.—Dr. Hurst, of Drew Seminary, Madison, N. J., who is now ravelling in Europe and has visited Spurgeon's Tabernacle in London, writes that "he is still he prince of London preachers." Dr. Hurst heard im twenty-two years ago, when he was more mpetuous and nervous, and still on trial before he world. He had every thing against him— he press, popular prejudice and suspicion, and ll the closed places to popular favor. But he as gone on declaring like David that his strength was in God (1 Sam. 17 : 45), and no ne now doubts his power and worth. "He has Anglo-Saxon grit and pluck, and you might as well tell the thunder blast to stop as to attempt to control Spurgeon."

Dr. Hurst expected to see him getting old, but though he has given out energy enough for seventy he lacks considerably of fifty years, and bears those years remarkably well. His thick black hair has now some stealthy threads of gray. He wears a full beard, waddles just a little more than when he weighed less, and takes things much more quietly than in the storm and stress of younger days. Nevertheless, the doctor says one can see a change in Spurgeon. "He has not the incisive force of former years. He is as deep-sighted, has that same grand metallic ring of voice, and knows how to play on his audience with the old masterful skill, but lacks the cleaving and lifting power of the older days of adventure and initiative. He is far more proper than in former times. He seems to be more conscious of a critical atmosphere about him."

The Evangelist, Mr. S. H. Pratt, has Recently concluded a seven weeks' course of special services in Holyoke, Mass., assisted by a large and excellent choir. The Sunday evening congregations were estimated at about two thousand persons. The Holyoke paper says: "The effect of such constant attention to Divine truth, and the deep wants of the soul, must be good, and only good. Many have been moved and helped into higher views of life and better living. In view of this fact every fastidious critic and every infidel carper should be silent." At a crowded after-meeting on the last Sunday evening of the services, upward of four hundred persons in forty-five minutes testified of their faith in our Saviour, and their purpose to live in His service. Let Christians pray that the young converts may be enabled to remain steadfast.

Dr. Talmage's Return from Europe has been postponed for a month; so he will not occupy his pulpit in Brooklyn till at least the first Sunday in October. His admirers in this country will learn this with mingled feelings—feelings of regret that they must wait so many weeks longer before they can have his warm eloquence at their doors again, and feelings of pleasure that the immense sphere for personal influence so suddenly opened to him in Europe is not yet to be closed. The readers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD will be no losers by Dr. Talmage's prolonged absence; for our arrangements are complete to publish special reports of his latest sermons every week.

Rev. Mr. Pentecost, assisted by his Evangelistic singer, Mr. Stebbins, is holding a series of meetings in the Clarendon street (Dr. Gordon's) Baptist Church, Boston, Mass. The congregations are good, even in the heat of summer, and are increasing. The blessed results of them are already beginning to be gathered.

Owing to the Falling Off of Legacies, the late receipts of the Home Missionary Society were $10,000 less last year than the year previous, but the gifts of living contributors were $7000 larger.

MORE AND MORE, OR LESS AND LESS.

A New Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"For whosoever hath, to him shall be given and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath."—MATTHEW 13 : 12.

Two Sides of one Truth—A Great Principle—I. Illustrated in the Parable of the Sower—1. The Wayside Hearers—Sealed Ears—2. What is to be Heard—A Poisoned Dish—A Happy-go-Lucky Business—3. How to Hear—The Gospel Exclusive — The Devil's Garden—Satan Turned Benevolent—II. Verified by the Experience of Gracious Souls—When Starlight is Used Sunlight is Given—All Graces Grow—Growth a Gift —III. Verified by the Experience of the Insincere—Keeping up Appearances—"The Earl of Nowhere"—The Cheat Kept up to the end.

Two great general principles are conspicuous in the gospel. The first is that God giveth of His grace to the empty—"He hath filled the hungry with good things, and the rich he hath sent empty away." The second principle is that where God has given a measure of grace it is His wont to give more—"He giveth more grace."

These two principles do not contradict each other, but help to make each other complete. In their proper order they exhibit both sides of one truth, and give us instruction as to the Lord's dealings with two different stages of spiritual condition. Each principle has its own range. Are you as yet unsaved? Then the principle which you have to do with is this, that God will fill the empty and feed the hungry. You have to go to Him with nothing of your own except your needs, and ask for every thing at His hands.

When a man has received grace, or when he professes to have done so, he comes under the second principle. He must take care that he has indeed and of a truth received that which God in the gospel presents to him; for if he does not at the very beginning receive really and truly the true grace of God he will begin with falsehood and end in shame. He must see to it that he has the beginnings of grace, or he cannot have their increase.

This last principle I shall endeavor to use at this time for our warning and instruction. May the Holy Ghost greatly bless it to our hearts, so that those who profess to be the people of God may make sure that their profession is founded on the truth; and may those who are mere hearers of the gospel be disturbed in their consciences and aroused from the sleep of death.

THE PRINCIPLE ILLUSTRATED.

I. First, we shall study this principle as it is illustrated in the parable of the sower. You will not fail to observe that this saying of our Lord occurs in three evangelists in connection with the parable of the sower. Besides our text, you will find it in Mark 4 : 24, and there it is at the close of the parable of the sower; you will meet with it again in Luke 8 : 18, still in connection with the same parable. The principle must be very important, or else our Lord would not have taken care to have it recorded by three evangelists; and He must have intended that we should read it in the light of the parable, or He would not have connected it therewith. Let us consider our text in its original connection. Each evangelist has given a shade of difference to his record.

1. In Matthew, whence we take our text, the words tand in connection with the hearing of the word—not any mode of hearing, but hearing itself.

Our Saviour's first picture in the parable of the sower is that of the seed falling upon the wayside or the hard road. There was much traffic through the field, a footpath which was trodden hard by many feet ran from one end to the other, and a handful of seed fell upon it. So the gospel falls upon men who are occupied with obstinacies, prejudices, pursuits, ambitions, cares, and these make so much traffic through their minds that they are hardened toward the gospel, and it never reaches the inner man, but lies upon the hard surface, a rejected thing.

When they hear it they do hear it, and that is all; as the saying is, "it goes in at one ear and out at the other."

What is the sure result of this mimic hearing? The Saviour in the parable represents the birds of the air as taking away the seed which fell upon the roadside and devouring it, and He tells us by way of explanation that Satan comes and takes away the word, lest in any after time it should obtain an entrance into the heart. Thus is the text fulfilled: "Whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath." How many of our hearers are of this kind! They lose what they have because in very truth they never had it. Their attendance at worship is coming and going, coming and going, and nothing more. Like a dog in and out of the fair, they have no business to do when they go to the house of God. They are no more the better by their going and coming than the door which swingeth on its hinges, and turneth in and turneth out, and then rests in its place. Such persons, like the wayside, do not receive any thing; and, receiving nothing, they continue to receive nothing; nay, they even go from bad to worse, for, though they received nothing at first, they at least seemed to do so, and in due course even that seeming disappears.

2. In Mark 4 : 25, our text is used in reference to the doctrine which is to be heard. The Saviour in the twenty-fourth verse says, "Take heed what ye hear." I would press that important exhortation upon you all as most needful at this time. Nowadays people do not care what they hear. If a man can speak fluently, if he can be rhetorical and sensational, if he can tell many pretty stories, if he can use claptrap and bombast he will have many auditors. Time was with our fathers when if a man went half an inch astray as to orthodoxy they would have none of him; and though we would not have you so censorious, for we are not to make a man an offender for a word, yet we would have you jealous for the truth. If we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel than that which ye have received, I charge ye listen not to it.

False doctrine is a poisoned dish, however daintily it may be served. The false teachers would, if it were possible, deceive the very elect; but ye know what the Saviour said, "All that ever came before me were thieves and robbers, but the sheep did not hear them." "Take heed what ye hear." A man cannot hear false doctrine long without being injured by it. He may at the first say, "I like the man, I admire his cleverness, although I dissent very much from what he says." This is treacherous ground to stand upon, for imperceptibly evil comes of it; "their word doth eat as doth a canker."

You cannot expose the soil of your heart to a continued sowing of tares but what some tare or other will take root, and by-and-by, instead of having the good wheat growing in your soul, there will spring up the tares whose end is to be burned, and you will have lost the harvest which should have been produced in your spirit.

There are many who, when they hear the gospel, are, according to our Lord's second picture, mere superficial hearers. They take some heed to their hearing, but not to what they have heard; for if they regarded the value and dignity of the word they would take it more thoroughly to heart, and it would permanently affect their lives. These are they who receive the word in stony places. When the gospel comes to them they catch at it without much consideration; they are hot and eager for it, and rejoice because it has come in their way, "Anon with joy they receive it." They sing and shout at once, "Happy day! Happy day! This is the gospel for me. I have found peace and heaven, and will never be anxious again."

These people have not counted the cost, or weighed the truth, or entered into its inner meaning and spiritual certainty. There has been no repentance of sin, no sense of guilt, no humbling before God, no brokenness of spirit, no inner conflict, and no work of the Holy Ghost in the soul. It has all been a sort of happy-go-lucky business, in which they caught at what came in their way and promised them fair. They will soon fling away that which they have so inconsiderately embraced; when the sun is up the plant which has no root will wither; when persecution arises the unregenerated convert will be offended. Our Saviour warns us against this in the language of the text. If you truly receive what you hear you shall have more; for unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance; but if, like the stony ground, you never really have the seed, but simply allow it to sprout in the surface-soil which conceals the rock of your unrenewed nature, then under trial you will lose what you have: the sprouting of the grain so prematurely will only end in an equally rapid withering, and all will be gone.

3. In Luke 8 : 18 this grand principle is used in reference to taking heed how we hear. Our Lord said:—"Take heed therefore how ye hear: for whosoever hath, to him shall be given; and whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he seemeth to have." Many are attentive to the gospel, and they have some discernment, and will not listen to what is unsound, so that they do regard what they hear, and yet they have small consideration for how they hear it, and that especially on one point.

The suitable way to hear the gospel is to give it full and entire possession of the heart. The gospel is exclusive. It will not be one of two masters. I would have you, my brethren, be among "the exclusive brethren," in a very excellent and admirable sense of the term. Our Saviour gives us a picture of the non-exclusives, who are set forth as the seed sown among thorns. The soil received the good seed after a fashion, and then it received the nettles and the thorns; and these nettles and thorns and wheat all began to grow together—a happy family some would say, but a devil's garden is nearer the truth.

In these days such a garden is projected on a large scale by some of our public writers and speakers. The church and the world are to become one, and saints and sinners are to blend together in one universal round of play-going.

We are actually urged by persons who suppose themselves to be Christians to renew the old league which was established in the days of Noah, and brought on the Flood, when the sons of God and the daughters of men joined in alliance, because the sons of God thought that they should greatly improve the world by uniting with it. At this time we are told that it is wrong on our part to forsake the debasing amusements of the ungodly, for if we would join in them we might improve their tone and quality. If heaven would go down to hell, hell would be greatly improved. See how benevolent Satan has turned, and how anxious to be reformed.

Hear ye the voice of God which runs in another manner: "Come ye out from among them, be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing." "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." Beware of religious play-going and pious theatricals, for they are a snare into which only the vain and foolish will fall. Let thorns be thorns, and let not wheat attempt to grow among them.

See you that plot of ground? how charming is its aspect, wheat springing up with its green blades among the thorns and thistles! Is it not a delightful compromise? What was the end of this conglomeration? Why, the wheat died; it was choked, and could not grow in such uncongenial society. Know you this, that if ye receive Christ ye must cast out the love of the world. Christ will be aut Cæsar aut nullus—either king or nobody. He will have the whole of our heart or none of it. We must altogether give ourselves up to His influence and to His sway; for if we set up another king and say to Him, "Thou shalt reign and Christ shall reign, too," Christ will not have it; He will up and away, for His jealousy will not endure a rival, and His sovereignty will not brook a consort.

Take care, then, how ye hear the gospel; hear it, knowing it to be the only word which can save your souls. Receive it into your being, to become every thing to you; for if you do not there shall be taken away from you that gospel which you think you have, since you have not afforded it the reception which it demands and deserves. If you say to sin, and self, and all else, "Begone! my heart is for Christ alone, this good seed must not be cumbered with such weeds as you are;" then the truth is in you, and shall be more and more fully apparent within you, bringing forth fruit abundantly after its kind.

In connection with this parable, then,
THE SUM AND SUBSTANCE
of our text is this: the word must dwell in us truly, and then it will dwell in us richly; but if it enter not in very deed into the heart we shall lose it altogether before long.

He who receives gets more; he who does not receive loses what he seemed to have. There is no standing still: there is a necessary movement one way or another. In this business a man daily grows richer or poorer. This is no stagnant sea, the current bears all vessels onward either to the fair havens or to the black sea of eternal ruin. Here stands the inevitabl decree: he who has, shall have; he who is a mere pretender, and has not, shall lose even his power to seem to have.

EXPERIENCE VERIFIES THE PRINCIPLE.

II. Let us try and bring out the same principl in reference to the experience of all graciou souls. Our experience verifies the truth of th text, "Whosoever hath, to him shall be given and he shall have more abundance."

In the world among men it is commonly ob served that it never rains but it pours. Wher you see a sheep there is generally a flock Money makes money. Poverty remains poo Want of capital brings bankruptcy. A con pany starts on imaginary or borrowed capital it makes a fuss and a noise, but it never pro pers. By-and-by it breaks up, and all is los and yet it never had any thing of its own to lose thus it verifies to the letter the truth—whosoeve hath not, from him shall be taken away eve that he hath.

Ordinarily, prosperity is a hen which likes lay where there is a nest-egg, and when o swallow of success comes others will follow Certainly we have found it so in the things grace; where grace has been given more gra comes; spiritual capital well worked multipli the stock, and spiritual wealth is realized whe there is a solid basis to begin upon. Let give instances.

When a man believes the gospel in its mo elementary form that man will soon be taug the higher truths. When we begin with sor people by telling them the plain way of salv tion, they raise doubts and quibbles. "But," their favorite word. They cry, "I cannot this and I cannot understand that." We nev thought they would see it or understand it, f they generally want to understand the most di cult parts of the gospel first, like a man wl must needs stand on the top of Mont Blanc l fore he has reached the valley at its base.

Imagine the folly of such a conversation this: "Here are your letters, my child; this l ter is A." "Sir, I cannot learn A B C, for yet I cannot read a single line of Homer's iad." "Come then, my child, and learn t multiplication table." "Alas, sir, I cannot it, for I am not yet acquainted with the Diff ential Calculus." Surely the child mocks and is unwilling to learn. The elements can mastered, although the higher grades of stu have not been reached. Half the difficult of unbelievers are the result of unreadiness be taught.

Dear friend, if you cannot yet follow the L into the depths, he will save you if you foll him into the shallows as far as you can. If y are staggered by any one truth, do not the fore reject your Lord, but be willing to acc that which does not stagger you. Touch hem of His garment if you cannot reach His vine Person, and you shall soon find that y tained in the elementary truths of the gospel will, by the grace of the Holy Spirit, lead you to an understanding of the deeper mysteries. Use your starlight and you shall have sunlight soon.

As it is with faith, so it is with the possession of any real, genuine grace. Take repentance for instance: a man may say, "My heart is hard, and I cannot repent as I would." No, my dear friend, but do you really hate evil, and do you labor to avoid the faults into which you formerly fell? Do you mourn and regret mistakes, and errors, and transgressions of which you are convinced? Well, then, this repentance of yours will deepen: you will come to be very sensitive one of these days, and you will chasten yourself even for a sinful thought. Though now you cannot reach the sensitiveness which you long for, yet, if your repentance be real, though it be weak at first, to him that hath shall be given, and your repentance shall grow. If there be in your heart an evident love of sin it is idle for you to hope that your repentance will increase, for you have none. Your green bay-tree is not the weeping willow, and will never grow into one, however much it may spread; but the least twig of the willow, if planted by the watercourses, will be sure to flourish.

Take faith again. If thou dost really believe in Jesus Christ, and look to Him for salvation, that faith, though it be very weak, will become strong. If it be there at all it will wax great in the soul; but if you say, "I think I believe," and yet you really do not believe, you will never grow in faith; in fact, the faith you think you have will in the day of trouble altogether vanish, and you will find yourself in despair. If thou wilt really trust my Lord and Master, though thy faith be but as a grain of mustard seed, yet, if it be real, thou shalt have more and more till thy faith can move mountains and pluck up trees. It is God's plan to add more to the first little deposits of faith, even as a master builder adds stone to stone till the structure is complete.

It is so with love to God. Who among us loves God as he would wish to love Him! We sigh out—

> "Yes, I love thee and adore—> Oh for grace to love thee more!"

But beloved, the point you have to watch is not so much the possession of the flaming love of a Samuel Rutherford or a Madame Guyon, as the making sure of even the lowest degree of genuine love to Jesus. See that it be true even if it be feeble. A spark of fire is true fire, and is quite enough to begin with. It turns every thing with which it comes in contact into its own nature, and it spreads by the force of its own intensity. The like is true of love. If you have real fire it will burn, but if you have only a painted fire, it will not increase.

It is the same with zeal for God's glory; we are none of us as zealous as we ought to be for Christ, but the way to get to be flamingly zealous for His name is to be truly zealous at the first. If you desire His glory, though faint be the desire, it will become more and more intense. If you feel that you must live to praise Him, if you desire to be made willing, even to die to praise Him, you will ere long feel seraphic zeal. True grace must grow, there is no fear about its increase.

Why did not the Lord give us the largest measure of grace to begin with—why promise more abundance as an after result? I think it is because we value grace all the more when it comes to us by little and little. Again, it is to our good to be exercised to get more grace. A poor woman is allowed to go and glean in a field: your generosity might say, "Come, my good woman, I will give you the corn, and you shall not have the trouble of gleaning;" but that might not be so good a thing for her as to allow her to gather the wheat by her own efforts. It is often much better to enable the poor to help themselves than to help them without their own exertions. God is wise toward us; He means to give us the corn, but He decides that we shall glean it, and so exercise ourselves unto godliness. We are to become rich in grace, but it is to be by heavenly trading. Growth is gift, remember that. God's grace is received, not as a dead external thing, but as a living outgrowth, and for outgrowth there must be inner life.

You, then, who hope that you have a little genuine grace in your souls, may well take courage. Let the truth contained in the text cheer you—unto you shall more be given, and you shall have more abundance. Do not think because you have but little faith you are always to be doubting and trembling. You shall grow out of it, my brother, as your faith becomes established. Do not suppose that because your hands have been weak and your knees have been trembling, they are always to be so.

A dead post which we saw in the ground twenty years ago is the same post still, no bigger, no smaller, and only altered by becoming rotten underground; but the tree which you saw twenty years ago, what a difference there is in it! It was then a sapling which you could bend, but now it has become as an iron pillar, and there is no moving it. So ought it to be with us, and we must aspire to have it so. May God the Holy Spirit work it in us, for Jesus' sake.

The main point, however, to come to is this—have we really obtained the first living principle? Have we the heavenly seed really in our souls? A prince may get his casket full of shining stones, but what if they should all turn out to be paste gems? A collector of coins might accumulate a multitude of them; there are dealers who will gratify his taste and supply him with an endless number of counterfeits, but if a master of the science should look over his treasures and condemn them as mere shams, what a disappointment would befall him! Brethren and sisters, let us each one put himself into the test house; let us ask the Lord to search us lest we be found destitute of grace. To him that hath that shall be given, and if we have not true grace it shall not be given to us, but we shall even lose what we have.

III. I must now mournfully conclude with the other side of the truth as exemplified in

THE EXPERIENCE OF THE INSINCERE.

Insincere men and women find that what they had is taken away from them. I will illustrate this point very rapidly. It is in this way.

Many who hear the gospel have been brought up to do so from their childhood; but if they do not heartily receive the gospel, they in many instances give up attendance upon the outward means of grace when they get away from the restraints of religious society. They find it dull work to sit so long and listen to drowsy prayers and dull preachings. They find it uncomfortable to get into crowded congregations, cold to be in small ones, and unhealthy to sit in the close atmosphere of a meeting-house. They see many faults in the service, and grumble quite cleverly.

At first they stop away one part of the day. Once is quite enough for them, they say; they cannot stand twice. Then, by-and by, every excuse is made for stopping at home. Sometimes it is wet, at another time they feel a little out of sorts; these things would not keep them from business, but a very little suffices to excuse a man's staying at home on Sunday. At length they do not go at all. Thus there is taken away from them what they really did not have: they did not really hear, and now they do not nominally hear. There are thousands of people in London at home to-day, hardly dressed even at this hour, from whom is taken away all wish to hear the gospel.

Here is another form of the same thing. The man keeps on hearing, but not having received the gospel he loses all power to appreciate it. "I do not know what has come over our minister," he says, "I used at one time to feel something when he was preaching, but it is not so now. He is getting old, and has about spun himself out." Other people do not think so, however, for they have been converted and blessed under his ministry. What has happened? Why, this man has lost what he seemed to have, namely, the power to appreciate the gospel. He recollects the day when he used to stand in the aisles all the time, longing to catch every syllable, and then would go home and get on his knees, and after a fashion pray for mercy. Nothing affects him now. Tremble, my hearers, if that is your case, for you are going fast to perdition, with nothing to stop you. You are dying at the root and will continue to lose all sensation until death ends in corruption.

In certain persons this takes yet another form. They did receive the grace of God in a way and there was an effect produced upon them, but it all disappeared. I have seen an unconverted man admirably reformed for a time by hearing the Word. The drunkard's cup has been given up, and foul language has ceased; there has been a great moral improvement; but, alas, it has not lasted.

Unless gospel work is inward heart-work, if it merely lies in external reformation, the man often goes back to be worse than he was before. The evil spirit which had left him returns, and takes with it seven other spirits more wicked than itself, and they enter in and dwell there, and the last end of that man is worse than the first. If the gospel does not save you, it may in the end even make you worse: if it is not a savor of life unto life it will become a savor of death unto death.

One more version of this same truth, and I have done. Some appear to receive the Word even further than those in whom it produces an external reformation, for they make a confession of faith in Christ: they pray, and perhaps they preach; their voices are heard in Christian assemblies, and they appear to live the lives of Christians. I have seen them even become eminent for supposed sanctity, but if they have not received the Word, really and truly, what a miserable life theirs must be! They do not get the secret of true religion, and yet they have to keep up an appearance of it.

Surely, the poorest people in the world are those who have to keep up appearances and have not the means to do it with: they are always getting in debt, and yet have to look everybody in the face. I always pity a penniless nobleman,

THE EARL OF NOWHERE, LORD LACKLAND.

Many professors are in a like plight, they have a name to live and are dead. They do not really believe what they profess to believe. They have a shrewd suspicion that all is not right within, and hence they get no comfort from all their religious talking and doing; it is a task, a dreary, cheerless task. They have no proof in their own hearts of the truth of the gospel; for they lack the internal evidence, which is the best of all. Their religion has never changed them, nor stirred the deeps of their being, and at last it becomes impossible to keep up the imposture. Just as with a man who continues to live beyond his means, there comes a time when he must be bankrupt, so there comes a time with the spiritual deceiver when he cannot keep it up any longer.

Look at Judas; he sold his soul for thirty pieces of silver and a rope—that was his way out of his profession. Others have become grosser sceptics and viler haters of Christ than others; their hypocrisy has curdled into blasphemy. Others have settled down in utter indifference, callousness, and carelessness, and have slept themselves into hell.

Where the cheat is kept up till the end, what a waking awaits the deceiver! When he will have to go from the hearing of the gospel to the howlings of the lost, from his pew in the house of God to his place in Tophet: when he will have to be dragged away from the cup of the Lord to drink in very deed the cup of devils; when he will be shut out from the association of the saints to dwell for ever with the condemned: when that God whom he professed to worship shall reject him, and Jesus Himself shall say, "I never knew you; depart from me, ye workers of iniquity!" God save us from such a doom, for His name's sake. Amen.

ANTHONY'S LOVE FOR HIS BROTHER.

ANTHONY and Patrick were the only children of a poor farmer in Ireland. He had enough to keep his family pretty comfortably till the famine of 1847, when he was compelled, like many others, to emigrate to America. By them religion had been but little thought of.

Arrived in the settlings, they settled down, with many others from their place, in a new clearing. But loss of property, banishment, and sorrow, instead of driving them to Him whose blessing maketh rich, hardened their hearts, and, to banish care, this unhappy family took to that fatal drink, which has ruined thousands. About Christmas, 1856, a letter was received from Ireland announcing the death of a relative, who had left them all his money. The family joyfully returned to Ireland, but drink had done its fatal work for the father, and he never saw his home again.

The mother and her sons took a house in a country village. By this time the boys were grown into handsome young men: they were all the world to each other. But they were any thing but steady and settled in their habits, and when the government appealed to young men in 1857 to enlist in the army and go to India to assist in suppressing the mutiny, Anthony and his brother eagerly took the Queen's shilling in hope of change of scene and excitement. Bitter were their mother's lamentations when she heard it, for had they not now enough and to spare? But it was done, for the lads did not care much for her, so long as they had each other.

Anthony and Patrick had a speedy voyage, and landed safe in India. There the old temptation to drink assailed them; and during the few days they were detained in Calcutta, fearfully did they indulge in this sin. On the march up country Patrick was seized with sunstroke at a village called Dearee, on the Soane, and from thence was borne insensible to the next station. Poor Anthony was wretched; he marched by his brother's doolie, and at the station of —— obtained leave to remain by his brother till evening, when he must leave with his detachment.

The twenty-four hours on the road without medical aid had done their work for Patrick; all who saw him knew that he was dying. His brother felt it too; and it was sad to hear that passionate pleading, "Oh, speak to me once again, Pat! Sure, you'll never go and leave me all alone then! Oh, speak to me again!"

The writer was in the habit of visiting the hospitals, and came in during the course of the morning. I was told by one of their regiment that they were dissolute, drinking lads. It seemed too late for a ray of hope to shine on that awful death-bed, and hopeless to strive to check that heartrending grief. Patrick had never recovered consciousness from the time of his seizure. I asked Anthony his history, which he gave as I have narrated; "and now," he continued, "if Pat dies where will he go?"

I opened my Bible, and long did we read and talk together over Luke 23 : 39–43, and the second chapter of Ephesians. Fearfully excited did the poor boy become as his heart opened to understand and believe the wondrous love of Jesus, the Lord of Glory, dying for all sinners. That love constrained his heart. "Oh," he said, "it would not be hard to love Him, and give up all for Him. This here drinking has never done us any good: but, oh! tell me what I can do for my brother. Oh! what if he die like the thief, without looking kindly on this Saviour? What if he die in his sin?"

I told him he could pray, and long did we plead together for the poor sufferer. I rose at length to go. "Will you," said Anthony, "promise me to look in at him while he lives, and write me word of him?"

About 5 P.M. I called again at the hospital, but a group of men in the veranda told me Patrick was dead, and his brother was gone to stay by the body till the marching hour.

Weeks passed, and I heard no more of him. One morning I was sitting by the side of a Highlander, Campbell (he has now gone home to Jesus), when some doolies were brought into the portico, and amongst the men in them I recognized several old friends. Amongst them was Anthony. He looked ill, very ill; and his right sleeve hung unoccupied at his side, telling a tale of battle and suffering. No one could look on that tall, fine young man, handsome and soldier-like, though pale and haggard, without realizing keenly the bitterness of sin's consequences.

Yet, as I looked at Anthony, I felt the expression of care was chastened, and there was something very touching in his calm, sad look. "I have come to die where my brother died," he said.

From that day he faded rapidly. As to himself, he had found Jesus, and enjoyed sweet peace. All his sins he felt were forgiven; "and now," he often said to me, "I should long to go, but it haunts me that Pat mayn't be there, and yet he was a better lad than me. Why was I saved and he not? Oh, I would have died to have him in my place. It is so hard to believe it just."

Again, and again, he implored me to tell him if I thought Pat would be in heaven.

How could I comfort him on this subject? I could only say that we know not what passes between the soul and its Maker; that he must remember Jesus died for sinners, and that therefore He wills not that any should perish.

To change his thoughts from so painfully hopeless a theme, I urged him to pray, while he had time, for his mother, and great comfort he found in so doing. "If I am heard, and she is saved, it will perhaps make heaven a little happier; but, oh, if Pat is not there! No; I can never be happy if he is lost!"

About five weeks after his first coming into hospital he died. I saw him late on the Saturday afternoon. "Just where Pat died," he said, "at the evening hour; but he had no Saviour—no hope! And I—Oh, if I knew he was but forgiven, I should be so happy." For some days past he had wandered much in mind, and it touched the manly hearts around to hear ever that plaintive appeal, "Tell me, do you think Pat was forgiven?"

Campbell often read his Bible and prayed with Anthony. On this Saturday Campbell said, "The thought has just come to my mind that your brother, may be, was not insensible all the while. He may have heard the message of mercy, and joined in prayer, 'Lord, remember me;' and like the thief, at the last hour, may have been forgiven." Eagerly did Anthony drink in every word, and the intense joy which lighted up that face I can never forget.

"Now, Lord, lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace," he said. "Yes, yes, I never thought of that. How wicked I have been to grieve so. The love of Christ constraineth me, and all deep, quiet in his heart, it may have constrained him."

He asked me to read the last verses of Revelation 7 : 9–17. "It is all light now. I am so happy. I long to go.

'Jesus sought me when a stranger.'

He has done all things well. He has remembered me. I shall soon see Jesus. There will be no night in our home!" These were the last words he spoke. He seemed exhausted, and lay apparently unconscious till 9 P.M., when he went home to Jesus.

A few weeks after I received a letter from his uncle in Ireland, saying that Catherine had received her son's letter, with the solemn tidings of Patrick's death and Anthony's conversion. At his request she had procured a Bible, and attended religious service. "And," wrote the uncle, "though her past bad way of life had brought her into ill-health, so that when the letter came she had but three or four weeks to live, yet I make bold to say that I'm sure she's happy now in heaven, though I would have been glad to have her die in our persuasion."

A YOUTH LOST BY THEATRE-GOI

By the Rev. W. Haslam.

THERE was once a young man in Engl who was brought under deep conviction of after hearing an awakening Gospel serm When he reached home his parents saw that was not happy, and instead of taking him by hand and praying with him, and showing the blessedness of the state of conviction— it was the next best thing to conversion— left him alone; and the young man, unhap tried to amuse himself, and to shake off thus convictions.

Soon after this there came an invitation f some worldly friends to visit them in Lon The young man was pleased at this opportu of escaping from the reflections he disliked, his parents consenting, he determined to to the modern Babylon. Here he was rather much freed from religion and religious serv He heard of nothing from morning till night the world and its pleasures.

One day it was proposed to go to a the The young man trembled at this, for he never been to one, and he knew his mo would not like him to go; so he declined. so-called friends laughed at him and teased about being such a saint. So he said he w go part of the way with them. When nea building they got into a crowd of people were all pressing forward toward it, and it difficult to retire. So he said he would jus ter and see the inside of a theatre, and away when the crowd had done pressing in.

He sat down and looked about, but did feel happy. His companions tried to diver mind, and make him laugh, but he felt mor crying, till at last he rose and determined out at once. He did so, and as he was ma his way out, he recognized, with surprise, son in one of the boxes of the theatre. young man could scarcely believe his eyes was the very minister who had preached the ening sermon in the country. So the young thought, "If such a good man as that se harm in a theatre, why should I?" and fears and anxieties all fled from him tha ment, and he sat down to give his attenti the performance, and thought he liked it much indeed, and he would just like to go very soon.

When he returned from London to hi home his parents saw a great change in son. He thought the country was a very place—there was no place like London. ever religious impressions and thoughts he have had before, they were all gone now, a was all for the world and its amusement pleasures, particularly in London.

Soon after this he was taken ill, and worse and worse, and it became evident th could not recover. On being told this came alarmed. He had no peace of soul, a conscience condemned him.

Poor young man! he had no rest in his be nothing but an awful foreboding before him parents sent for the awakening preacher to and visit him, and sent again, because the was very ill. He came, and entered the little suspecting what kind of a reception ed him. As soon as the young man saw h screamed out, "Take him away! take him he has murdered my soul!" The poor lad dered and trembled to have that man room, and they were obliged to ask him tire, and the minister himself felt ashame did not return.

The dying man pointed at the preache said, "I went to a theatre in London, and afraid, and was going out, till I saw you and then my fears went away, and now lost! I am lost! God has given me up away, go away; you cannot do me goo more!" It remains to say the young ma without hope, without pardon, without Seeing the preacher in the theatre was the bling-stone over which the poor boy fell, n appears, to rise again.

THE NEAR RETURN OF CHRIST.

By Cheyne Brady.

The Prophecy in Thessalonians—Several Events to Occur—Nature of the Millennium—Translation, not Death, our Hope—Christ's Advent "for" and "with" His Saints—His Descent at Armageddon—G. Guinness's Book.

"THE Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first." Every departed saint, wherever they may have fallen—in the sleeping place or in the ocean—will assuredly be raised up at the descent of our Lord into the air. "Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord." Oh, what joy and glory, the souls redeemed through the blood of the Lamb shall be gathered, and we shall never more be separated from Him (1 Thess. 4 : 16, 17).

To borrow a familiar illustration, just as when we hold a magnet over particles of minerals, wood, dust, and steel, each bit of steel is drawn up and adheres to the magnet, leaving all the rest unmoved; and as in the steel filings there is a certain quality or affinity which causes the magnet to raise them, so the believer, united to the risen Man in heaven and filled with the Holy Ghost, is raised up and caught up by the great magnet, Christ Jesus. "If the spirit of him that raised up Jesus our Lord from among the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his spirit that dwelleth in you" (Rom. 8 : 11).

"Wherefore, comfort one another with these words." Was not this also comfort to the new converts at Thessalonica, where Paul had been preaching for three weeks, and where he had taken out from among that heathen and idolatrous city a people to the name of Christ Jesus? These converts had no Bible nor New Testament; they had received but a short teaching from the apostle, but they had "turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God, and to WAIT FOR HIS SON from heaven."

Difficulties had arisen in their midst; some left off work in the speedy expectation of the immediate return of the Lord, some thought the day of the Lord had commenced; so that Paul deemed it necessary to send them these epistles. Let us place ourselves in their position, and read these letters as they did; and is it possible to come to any other conclusion than that Paul, by the Spirit, intended to assure them that the Lord they waited for might come at any time and take them up to Himself?

They believed, and so do we, that there is nothing necessarily to intervene before the descent from heaven into the air of our blessed Lord and the rapture of the saints.

"'A little while!' our Lord shall come,
And we shall wander here no more:
He'll take us to our Father's home,
Where He for us has gone before;
To dwell with Him, to see His face,
And sing the glories of His grace."

Scripture predicts many events to take place in the last days. There are to be, amongst others, a restoration of the Jews, a re-building of their temple, a besieging of Jerusalem, the revelation of the Man of Sin and his destruction, and then a thousand years of blessedness, called the Millennium.

But we are not to look for any of these events as necessarily intervening before His Second Advent. Some of the first mentioned may or may not happen ere He comes, but our blessed hope, our clear object, our definite expectation is Himself, the Man now seated on the throne, with whom we are now indissolubly united by the Holy Ghost, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

THE MILLENNIUM NECESSARILY INVOLVES THE PERSONAL COMING AND REIGN OF CHRIST.

A period of blessedness to last a thousand years, commonly called the Millennium, is very clearly predicted in Scripture. The reader is referred to the following, amongst many other passages, from which its general characteristics may be educed:—Ps. 72; Isaiah 11 : 1–12, 35 : 1–10, 65 : 17–25; Jer. 23 : 5–8; Ezek. 43 : 2–7; Micah 4 : 1–7; Hab. 2 : 14; Zech. 14 : 1–9; 1 Cor. 15 : 25; Rev. 11 : 15, 20 : 1–4. In that glorious time

The Lord shall personally reign.—Ps. 72; Is. 11 : 4, 5; Rev. 11 : 15.

His resurrected and translated saints of this dispensation shall reign with Him.—Rev. 5 : 10, 20 : 4.

Satan shall be bound for 1000 years.—Rev. 20 : 1–3.

Israel shall be restored—Jer. 23 : 5–6; and her enemies destroyed.—Zech. 14.

Righteousness and peace shall prevail on the earth.—Is. 11 : 1–12.

The wolf and the lamb shall feed together, and the lion eat straw like the ox.—11 : 6.

Swords shall be beaten into ploughshares and spears into pruning hooks.—Mi. 4 : 3; Ho. 2 : 18.

No more sorrow or suffering, and life prolonged to the days of a tree.—Is. 35 : 10; 65 : 19–22.

The curse shall be removed; instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree.—Is. 35 : 1–7; 55 : 13.

Universal blessing to the heathen.—Ps. 2 : 8; Zech. 14 : 8; Is. 27 : 6, and 66 : 19.

Can we conceive such a state of universal blessedness without the personal presence of Christ?

OUR HOPE IS TRANSLATION, NOT DEATH.

Such a hope is characteristic of all young converts; in their early love, zeal, and simplicity they expect the speedy coming of the Saviour they have found. And it may be adduced as a remarkable circumstance, that whenever the eyes of a Jew are opened to see that the Messiah has come, he invariably takes the attitude of hopeful expectation of His Second Coming. We may add, also, that such was the hope of Luther, Calvin, Knox, Bunyan, among many other shining lights.

Death is in no place put before the believer as his hope. Falling asleep in Jesus is spoken of as possible, or as a contingency; but the hope of the believer is the second coming of the Lord, when he shall be translated. The disciples so understood the Lord's saying as to John, that he should not die.

But this truth is not left to mere inference; it is clearly and distinctly revealed in the Word.

"The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God: the dead in Christ shall rise first, then we that are alive and remain shall be caught up to meet Him in the air, and so we shall ever be with the Lord."

"Behold I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep (or die), but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we (living ones) shall be changed" (1 Cor. 15 : 51, 52).

Death has been robbed of its sting, death has been deprived of its terrors; but still, to most people the actual passing away cannot be contemplated without concern. But, to be translated, to be changed from mortality to immortality, without tasting death; to be caught up alive to meet the Lord in the air; to see the Lord; to be changed into His likeness! "We know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is" (1 John 3 : 2). Is not this a hope both glorious for the future and powerful for the present?

But, Lord, 'tis for Thee, for Thy coming, we wait,
The sky, not the grave, is our goal;
Oh, trump of the angel! Oh, voice of the Lord!
Blessed hope! blessed rest of my soul!

DISTINCTION BETWEEN CHRIST'S ADVENT "FOR" AND "WITH" HIS SAINTS.

The personal return of the Lord to the air FOR His saints must ever be distinguished from His descent on the earth WITH them to introduce the Millennium.

We believe His Second Advent, apparently foretold as one event, will consist of two acts or parts:

First—His Advent into the air FOR His saints, and Secondly—After an interval, His descent on the earth WITH His saints to destroy Antichrist with the brightness of His appearing, and to introduce peace and blessedness.

The length of the interval between the rapture of the saints and their descent from heaven with the Lord has not been clearly foretold, but during that time the various events foretold to happen at His advent, such as the restoration of Israel, the revelation of Antichrist, etc., will probably have their fulfilment.

The first act or part in His advent is specified in 1 Thess. 4 : 16, already quoted.

Observe particularly that this passage only speaks of the resurrection of the saints, whether dead or living, and makes no reference to the ungodly, dead or living, neither has it any thing to say of the Lord's coming to reign or to judge.

It refers to the first resurrection, which is composed of the departed saints, and not to the second resurrection, consisting of the wicked at the end of the Millennium (Rev. 20).

The second part or scene of Christ's Second Advent is foretold by Zech., chap. 14, "His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, and the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee."

And again by Enoch, as we are reminded in Jude 14, 15. And Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, "Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of His saints, to execute judgment upon all."

The saints will first be taken up into the air to be with Christ, and afterwards they will come to the earth with Him, stand on the Mount of Olives, and with Him reign on or over the earth.

In Rev. 19 : 11–16 we have a description of Christ's future descent on the earth at the battle of Armageddon in the following splendid vision:—

"And I saw heaven opened,
And, behold a white horse;
He that sat on him was called Faithful and True.
In righteousness He doth judge and make war.
His eyes were as a flame of fire;
On his head were many crowns;
He had a name written that no man knew but HE Himself.
He was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood;
His name is called the WORD OF GOD.
And the armies which were in heaven followed Him
Upon white horses,
Clothed in fine linen, white and clean;
Out of His mouth goeth a sharp sword,
That with it HE should smite the nations:
And HE shall rule them with a rod of iron.
He treadeth the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God,
He hath on His vesture and on His thigh a name written,
KING OF KINGS AND LORD OF LORDS."

That this vision refers to the personal advent of the Lord Jesus Christ with His saints before the Millennium, is generally accepted. The arguments in proof of this interpretation are well summed up in the following extract from a remarkably able work by Mr. H. Grattan Guinness

"When, therefore, we find a vision, symbolizing in the most persistent and magnificent way a personal advent of Christ, just where we might have expected to find it, just where all prophecy would conspire to fix its place, just where its absence would render it impossible to harmonize multitudes of other predictions; when we find it written large in letters of light, and stamped with a sublimity of symbol and circumstance worthy of such an event, and too grand for any other, we bow to this final testimony of the prophetic word, and admit that Scripture leaves no room to doubt that the Lord Jesus will come again in person to this earth before the Millennium—in other words, that the grand advent will be Pre-millennial."

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

"COALS TO BURNING COALS." (Prov. 26 : 21.)

It would be difficult to set bounds to the trouble a mischievous woman can make, when she is disposed to set herself to the task. When a child plays with fire we take its dangerous plaything from it with a warning; we know what destruction may follow indulgence in the pastime, though the child does not know. It is a pity no one has the authority to take a woman in hand when she is amusing herself by taking the weaknesses of two of her associates and using them as fire-wood to kindle a blaze capable of destroying the happiness of two lives.

Now, the secret of Robert's letter was the sore point in the lives of the Hollands, and this sore point their lodger, Mrs. Cross, delighted to strip bare. She liked to see the writhing of husband and wife, not because she was malignant, or thought she was doing serious harm, but because she was mischievous and enjoyed her miserable sport.

It was a bad thing for Robert and Effie that such a woman as Mrs. Cross should have been in their house during those early days of their married life. Her presence stirred up strife between them, and encouraged in Effie that spirit of curiosity and distrust which it would have been better to have repressed. Robert, for reasons of his own, meant to keep his secret, and Effie, urged by Mrs. Cross, was resolved to learn it, and so there resulted constant hostility and irritation.

Had Effie remembered her early teachings, had she been living near to God, and looking constantly to Him for guidance, and carrying to Him in prayer the trouble that lay upon her mind, she would have been content to wait His time for relief. But Effie had not yet the faith that works patience, nor the calm reliance upon God that the world cannot destroy nor even disturb. So that when Mrs. Cross was bent on worrying her, and raising a crop of doubts in her husband, the soil of Effie's mind was in a manner prepared to receive the evil seed.

In the manner of a general, who, being defeated in an attack on one point of his enemy's position, tries another on a different point, the widow resolved to stir up trouble in a new form.

"You have not shown farmer Holland the note which you had this morning from Lady Ethel," observed Mrs. Cross, one day at the dinner-table, addressing herself to Effie. "Married folk like now-a-days to have their own little secrets, I see."

"I have no secret, I never had, I hate secrets, replied Effie, nettled by the disturbing word. "Robert is welcome to see any note that I get, if he cares to read it."

Robert looked moody, as he often now did, for he took his wife's words as a kind of reproach.

"Tell your husband what Lady Ethel wrote about," said Mrs. Cross, who knew perfectly well the contents of the note, which had been shown to her by Effie.

"Lady Ethel only wishes to know whether I have any sister who could take the situation which I held with her, as she has given my successor notice to quit," said Effie.

"Some sister as clever and trustworthy as yourself," observed Mrs. Cross, quoting from the note of the lady.

"Yes, dear Lady Ethel had always such perfect confidence in me; I was very happy while I was with her," said Effie. Whether intentionally or not, her words again conveyed a reproach to Robert. A headache, which troubled the farmer at the time, had not improved his temper.

"It is a pity that you ever left Lady Ethel, if you were happier with her than you are here," cried the irritated man, pushing back his chair from the table.

But Effie, with all her imperfections, had love for her husband too deep and strong to suffer her to regret for a moment having left an easy situation in order to share his lot, whether for weal or woe.

"O Robert, how can you speak so!" exclaimed the young wife, her eyes filling with tears; "I could never now be happy anywhere if you were away!"

Robert met Effie's loving gaze, and returned it. For a time the breach between the two Hollands appeared to be bridged over, for both felt that though petty differences might arise, and had arisen between them, they were still all in all to each other.

But yet the unhappy secret remained to keep open the fatal rift; Effie's curiosity to penetrate the mystery only strengthened with time. She no longer fully trusted her husband, and bitterly felt that he did not trust her. No union can be perfect indeed that is not in the Lord.

Meanwhile other troubles were thickening around the young pair. Robert saw more and more clearly that his farming was not a success. He had, as he had told Effie, drawn out all the remainder of his little nest-egg from the post-office bank. It was not without difficulty that the farmer made up the sum needful for payment of the second quarter's rent to the widow.

"How can this be?" asked Effie. She was not satisfied with explanations concerning the blacksmith's bill, and charges for repairing fences, or her own knowledge that a horse was lame, that a cow had died, and that the hay crop was quite a failure. Where were the two five-pound notes that had so mysteriously disappeared? If Robert had felt himself so poor, why and to whom had he sent away money—money so much needed at home?

In the meantime the long summer days wore on. Salem looked beautiful in July. The round ripe gooseberries nestled thick on the thorny branches under the sheltering leaves; the currants gleamed like clustered strings of rubies hanging low from the bush; little green apples were swelling on the boughs where blossoms had been. The climbing Gloire de Dijon on the wall of the farm-house was almost one mass of roses. The glorious sun was casting summer radiance over all, ripening the green corn which bent so gracefully under the rippling breeze. Never had the English farm seemed to the outward view more full of delights, but the doubt of her husband weighed on Effie's mind, and the consciousness of the growing power of his liquid tempter was on Robert's mind, and the beauties of life and the peace of their home were lost for them both. Care, disunion, self-reproach, formed a veil over their senses, were as a blight on the corn, a canker in the fruit, or a dark cloud over the sun. Holiness and happiness are closely linked together; it is God Himself who hath joined them, and man cannot put them asunder.

But soon a day came which would forever stand out distinct in the memories of Robert and Effie, like a high rock rising alone on a level plain. Broad was the shadow which it would cast over the present; and it would remain a dark object to be looked back upon through all their future journey of life, even as far as the grave!

And yet never had summer's morning in England looked more fair and bright than it did on that day. Robert, as was his custom, had risen at five, and gone forth to his work. Whatever other faults the farmer might have, no one could justly accuse him of indolence.

If any traveller on that morning had passed the picturesque farm-house, with its rose-covered wall, its little front garden bright with flowers, its poultry-yard at the side, from which came the blithe sound of Mary Hunt's singing as she fed her feathered charges, he would scarcely have thought that the name of "Salem" was ill bestowed on the place.

Nor would his impression have been less pleasing could he have glanced into the kitchen of the farmer's home. The place was in beautiful order, the walls almost as white as milk. The kettle was singing on the hob, the muffins were toasting before the fire under the care of the comely widow, whose plump, well-fed-looking face told no story of trouble.

Fred was playing in the corner with a kitte laughing to see it spring after a cork fastened a string. Effie, employed in laying out the cu and saucers for breakfast, looked, with her swe face and braided hair of satin-like smoothne the very picture of a winsome young Engli wife.

No stranger could have supposed that sorr and suspicion lay at Effie's heart as she arrang her pretty china, her shining teapot, her cryst milk-jug, her frosted butter dish, which had been wedding presents given to "the pet of t village."

"Here comes postman again!" cried Fr who had jumped up to look out of the windo at the sound of the click of the latch of the ga

Effie left the loaf which she was cutting, wi the knife still in it, and went to the door to me the postman, and bring in the letter. Mrs. Cr glanced up from her occupation at the firepla curious, as she always was, to know what t postman had brought.

"Anything for me?" asked the widow.

"No, for Robert," answered Effie. The culiar manner in which she uttered the rep and the sight of the keen inquisitive look whi she cast on the address of the envelope of t letter, roused at once the eager attention Mrs. Cross.

"I'll be bound that's from the same party wrote to the farmer before," exclaimed t lodger, hurrying to Effie's side.

"I think it is," said Effie slowly; "the H Holland is written in the same peculiar way."

"Is the post-mark Guildford?" inquired t curious widow, examining the envelope m closely.

"No, it is Southampton," said Effie, who tained the letter still in her hand, and had turn it to see if any stamped impression of initials the flap could afford some clue to the name the writer, but there was nothing of the sort.

The envelope was one of those called self-se ing, and, like many of its kind, could scarcely said to be fastened at all, so slightly and ca lessly had it been gummed. Mrs. Cross was slow in pointing this out to Effie.

"Look you, it could be opened and shut again without showing a bit," said the lodg with a sidelong glance towards Fred, to ma sure that he was not attending. "If I were y Effie, I'd have a peep at what is in this let before your husband comes in."

Effie drew back and looked startled at suc suggestion.

"As a wife you've a right to open the far er's letters; you never keep any of your o from him," continued the lodger.

"It would make Robert so angry," said Ef

"He need never know any thing about matter," suggested the tempter.

"That would be wrong," murmured Effie, a low tone of voice.

"Wrong! oh! fiddlety-dee! where's harm?" said the smiling Mrs. Cross; "you frightened at shadows, my dear. Why, I sho think no more of lifting up that little flap t is fastened so badly than I should do of crackin filbert to get at the kernel! And the kerne this nut would be something worth havi Don't you want to get at the secret of wh your husband sent that registered letter? D you want to know why he makes such a myst of the affair? You have been worriting your out for weeks to find out a clue, and now put into your hand, and you can know all truth in a minute."

The forbidden fruit was indeed within Ef reach in the shape of a letter; the explanat of the mystery might be had by a little m ment of the hand. The tempter was beside the temptation was great! With a tremb hand the weak, erring daughter of Eve un ened the envelope, drew out the letter whic enclosed, and, with Jemima Cross eagerly l ing over her shoulder, read the first page of note.

"No, dearest Robert, I can never retur Ashley; our parting last year was a parting er in this world. Your kindness has enabled e to go as steerage passenger in the "May Queen," hich sails from this place the day after to-mor- w. You have, I am sure, kept your promise ver to tell my dreadful secret; but were I to visit y native village it would certainly ooze out that have been in jail, most cruelly—most unjustly— nt there as guilty of the crime of robbing the rpse of my poor mistress of a diamond ring! ! my generous brother—"

Effie had only read thus far, and was about to rn over the leaf, when both she and Mrs. Cross ere startled, as by a sudden explosion, by the und of a step. Effie, in her terror, dropped the tter. It was picked up by Robert Holland!

Effie's blood seemed to turn cold in her veins; r heart appeared to stop its beating, so terri- e, so awful to her was the stillness which fol- wed. Had Robert stamped and stormed she uld better have borne it. But that gloomy lence, what did it mean?

Effie dared not look at Robert, nor could she ter a word. Even Mrs. Cross, caught as she d been in the act of meanly prying into a se- et, knew not at first what to say. Robert read s sister's letter to himself, then stood for a nsiderable time staring fixedly out of the win- w, till Fred, the only person present who felt his ease, plucked the farmer by the sleeve and ked him to come to breakfast.

All the party sat down at the table. Fred's esence was a relief to both the women, though knocked over and broke one of Effie's nice ina cups. Effie got down on her knees to k up the fragments. She hardly knew what ed had been doing. She only felt glad of me excuse for hiding her face, though it was for a minute, under the table.

Mrs. Cross recovered her composure much oner than did the young wife. The lodger d no delicacy of feeling, so that she suffered s from a sense of shame; and she was not aid of offending Robert, who would be the eater sufferer, she knew, if a quarrel should arise tween them. Jemima's curiosity was not per- tly satisfied by the glimpse which she had had the letter now in the farmer's pocket.

"I did not know that a sister of yours had er got into trouble," she began; but the al- st savage expression on Robert's face warned e meddler not to touch such an open wound.

Robert ate his breakfast of porridge with lfish rapidity, scarcely conscious of what he s doing, and seemingly buried in painful ought. Effie, so nervous that she could hardly ur out the tea, would have forgotten altogether do so had not Fred thrust forward his cup d asked her to put in plenty of sugar. Such uncomfortable breakfast had never been par- ken of in Salem before. Robert's share of the al was very soon taken; he then strode up e stairs, and his heavy tramp was heard over- ad.

'I'm glad that he has gone, anyhow," ob- ved Mrs. Cross, slowly stirring her tea. "I ver saw a man turn so ghastly pale in a min- e. I had rather far had seen him flush up red anger, as he did yesterday, when I spoke of the ter from Lady Ethel. Well, dear, all is out w, and it is a good thing that you know the rst. Holland's widowed sister, Ellen Morris, s, as we all know well, the servant of the at philosopher's wife, and attended her at the t. As the lady did not die at her home, but some watering-place down south, no one eabouts had chanced to hear of this scrape o which she got on account of a diamond g. Indeed—"

'I must desire you to speak no more on the ject, above all before that child," exclaimed ie, who could not control her emotion. She derstood but too well the keen anguish which would inflict on her husband to find that his er's disgrace was talked over by a woman e Jemima Cross.

Mrs. Cross dropped the subject for a while, without the slightest intention of keeping farmer's secret.

THE CHRISTIAN IN THE WORLD.

S. S. Lesson for September 14th. (1 Tim. 6 : 6–21.) Golden Text, John 17 : 66. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Our golden text for to-day is perhaps the truest text for our subject which could be found. "They (the disciples) are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." By birth, because they are "born from above" (John 3 : 3 Marg.); by position, for they sit with Christ "in heavenly places" (Eph. 2 : 6); by their calling, for they are "saved and called with a holy calling" (2 Tim. 1 : 9); by experience, for as "He was in the world, and the world was made by Him, and the world knew Him not" (John 1 : 10), so also "the world knoweth us not, because it knew Him not" (John 3 : 1). Again, the world's power is in its own vaunted efforts and wisdom; but as Christ said, "I can of mine own self do nothing" (John 5 : 30), so He says of his own disciples, "Without me ye can do nothing" (John 15 : 5). His power as man was by faith in His Father. "I live by the Father" (John 6 : 57), and the life which we live in the flesh is by the faith of the Son of God, if we believe that we are crucified with Him (Gal. 2 : 20).

The world, the prince of the world, found nothing in Christ (John 14 : 30), and if we live Christ (Phil. 1 : 21) they will find nothing in us, but will despise and reject us as they did Him. The world is God's rival. All its customs, all its maxims, are in distinct opposition to His written word. Do good unto thyself; it says, seek thine own (Ps. 49 : 18; Phil. 2 : 21). Love seeketh not her own, says the Word. Look not every man on his own things, but every man on the things of others (1 Cor. 13 : 8 Phil. 2 : 4). The world's "inward thought is that their houses shall continue for ever, and their dwelling place to all generations; they call the lands after their own names" (Ps. 49 : 11). The Word of God calls us "strangers and pilgrims" (1 Pet. 2 : 11).

But then we must maintain our position in society, I hear some one say. Oh, my reader, are you living for God and for eternity, and yet you are claiming a position down here? It was beneath your Lord to receive honor from men; how comes it that you are covetous of it? But, you argue, it may give me so much more influence in working for God. Oh, dear friend, it is not worldly influence, but the Spirit of the living God, which is the power for His work. God will care for your position if you cease to care for it, and for your interests if you leave them to Him. Having food and raiment, let us be therewith content. But they that will be rich (i.e., who are trying to make a fortune, and who have expectations to take a better position in the world), these "fall into temptation and a snare, and into many grievous and hurtful lusts which drown men in destruction and perdition."

But that is a message (ver. 17-19), not to them that will be rich, but to "them that are rich;" such as are born into a position of power, wealth, influence, without having sought after it. "Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, nor trust in uncertain riches (the uncertainty of riches, margin), but in the living God, who giveth us all things richly to enjoy." God's all things are not our all things. He giveth us much more than earthly corruptible riches, for He giveth us incorruptible and eternal things. And this comprehends what He means by all things—"That they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate, laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life." No comment can render these words more distinct in their meaning.

We will return now to the 11th verse, where, after having spoken so strongly the many foolish and hurtful lusts of "them that will be rich," Paul says, But turn, O man of God, flee these things; but follow after righteousness, nobleness, faith, love, patience, meekness. These things are the true riches of a man of God, that he may pursue with his whole heart. Although Paul hath no man like-minded with Timothy, yet he does not look upon him as perfected in these things. And as the light of God becomes more intense upon our souls we become conscious of the smallest interior deviation from Christ in these things, so that while no word, no gesture contrary to love, patience, meekness, is suffered to escape us, we can detect with pain and confusion that they are still within our hearts contrary currents.

"Fight the good fight of faith." A good fight cannot be an easy one. "So fight, and not as one who beateth the air," says Paul (1 Cor. 9 : 26). He knew well which way the battle was going. Now, when we fight the bad fight of resolutions, efforts, plans of our own, etc., there is never any lasting conquest of our great foe. But when it is the good fight of faith, and we place the shield of faith in what God is and what He has said between us and our temptations, when we take the position He gives us, as crucified with Christ, and the power He is to us, for "unto them which are called, Christ is the power of God and the wisdom of God," then there is certain victory.

"Lay hold of eternal life." But have we not eternal life the moment we believe (John 3 : 36; 5 : 24, etc.)? How then can we lay hold of what we have? We read (1 John 1 : 1, 2) of the word of life, for "the life was manifested, and we have seen it and been witness and shew unto you that eternal life which was with the Father and was manifested unto us." This is none other than God manifest in the flesh, and it would seem that Paul, in calling upon Timothy to renounce and to flee all which is life in the world's sense would lead him to grasp with a firmer hold that life of Christ which was already his, and to live it in more power than ever. There is the same exhortation to "them that are rich," that they may lay hold on eternal life. While their trust is in the uncertainty of riches, eternal things are lightly held and lightly lost, but in the case of Timothy he adds, "Whereunto thou art also called and hath professed a good profession before many witnesses."

These are thoughts inspired with an intense solemnity. "I give thee charge in the sight of God, who quickeneth all things, and before Jesus Christ, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good profession, that thou keep this (e.g., the) commandment without spot, unrebukable, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ." The limit which the apostle sets to all these exhortations was not death, but the Lord's coming; death did not seem to occupy them. They must have seen many of their number die; how is it the thought of their own deaths struck them so little? It may be they lived so fully in the life of the whole body of Christ that their personal death or taking away was much less present to their minds than the hope of the whole Church, "which in His times He shall shew," says the aged Paul, not moved from his faith because he himself had waited so long for Him, "who is the blessed and only potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords, who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto, whom no man hath seen or can see, to whom be honor and power everlasting, amen." It was as though he saw within the veil.

Once more before closing his letter he returns to the charge. "O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science, falsely so-called." Avoid, i.e., don't enter into discussion about these things. Opposition of science to that which God's Christ has dictated must be profane; what is profane must be vain. "Which some professing have erred concerning the faith." The subtlety of human knowledge is always the exact contrary to all which is of faith. To enter into an argument with its professors is to admit that the ground of faith on which we stand is no higher than their own. The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God—neither can he because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2 : 14).

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The English War in Zululand has Not Yet reached a satisfactory termination. The London Daily Telegraph of August 29th states that Sir Garnet Wolseley arrived at Ulundi on August 10th, and telegraphed from that place, "The country is quiet. The enemy's army have dispersed to their homes. I am in communication with the principal chiefs, who say that they will come in and submit. King Cetywayo is not far off, and there is a prospect of an early and peaceable settlement." But newspaper correspondents say that, notwithstanding General Wolseley's hopeful tone, it is reported authoritatively that the Swazie tribe have at the last moment refused to join in operations for the capture of Cetywayo. Oham, King Cetywayo's brother, has refused to return to his own district, declaring that a large Zulu army was waiting to destroy him.

General Wolseley has been trying the policy of setting the tribes of natives one against another, but as yet without much success. Lord Chelmsford, the late commander at the Cape, has returned to England, and has been rewarded for his services with the order of the Bath.

The Simplicity of Life which Characterizes the present head of the French nation stands out in marked contrast to the magnificence of her former rulers. Madame Grévy, the wife of the French President, always travels in the simplest manner. She takes great pains to pass unperceived, notwithstanding the trouble taken to do her a rather ostentatious homage. She recently arrived with her daughter at Eaux-Bonnes, and the manager of the hotel, after serving her with a bottle of his choicest wine, was astonished to hear her say that she was accustomed to a frugal life, and did not require to drink at Eaux-Bonnes richer wines than in Paris. The honors which have fallen to her lot do not seem to have affected her in the least.

Lord Beaconsfield, the English Premier, and the Hong Kong Merchant.—Some time ago Mr. Belilos, a wealthy opium merchant in Hong Kong, intimated that he would hand over £1000 to the Governor of the colony for the erection of a statue there to Lord Beaconsfield. "The proposal has been declined by the Premier with appropriate acknowledgments. The money will be devoted instead to the establishment of four scholarships in Hong Kong, an annual income of $400 being available from the fund. Two are medical scholarships for boys of the Central School, one is for the best English and Chinese translator in the Central School, and the other for the best general scholar at St. Joseph's College, all tenable for three years."

An Extraordinary Memory.—A Chinese Boy belonging to one of the Mission schools at Peking at a recent examination repeated the entire New Testament without missing a single word or making a single mistake. He is now committing to memory Dr. Martin's "Evidences of Christianity." He united with the Church last year, and he has dedicated his extraordinary talent to the service of God.

The English Weather.—Dr. Talmage, Writing to the New York Independent, relates the following incident as having occurred recently in connection with the prayers now being offered in English churches for fair weather:

"One minister in North Wales, a few Sabbaths ago, got the wrong place in the Prayer Book, and, to the horror of his congregation, prayed for more rain, not finding out his mistake till it was too late to correct it. But it is a consolation to believe that such a prayer as that will have no effect on the weather. If a man is not enough in earnest to know what he is praying about, his petition is harmless to every one but himself.

"I would have more faith in the downright, upright prayer of the Orkney minister, who, wanting improved climate, said, 'Lord, send us braw weather, and a bit sough of breeze that will dree the stra' and winna harm the heads; but if ye blaw us a tearin', rivin', bletherin' gale, like what we've been ha'ing, ye'll play the vara mischief wi' the aits and fairly spoil a'.' That supplication was not rhetorical, but was earnest, and to the point; and to it thousands of Englishmen could this summer respond with hearty 'Amen.'

"The subject of the weather is a dull subject; but how much we have all been affected by it we will not find out till we get to the next world. We can all serve God better when the wind is from the south-west than when it is from the north-east. Many Christians chide themselves for bad feelings which are ascribable to climatic changes. The Devil—called in Scripture the 'Prince of the Power of the Air'—never rides on the west wind. He generally mounts from an iceberg. Our best feelings come in on a wave of sunshine. God give us more of that in our disposition, our faces, and our theology. The chief difference between earth and heaven is that the sunshine of this world sometimes gets beclouded; but heaven is everlasting sunshine."

Mr. Spurgeon, at the Close of his Sermon published in another page of this journal, requested his congregation to sing the Doxology, in praise to God for recent answer to prayer. He announced that the £4000 needed to complete the purchase of land for the site of the Girls' Orphanage, for which many earnest prayers had been offered, was all subscribed. And in addition he had received promises for the building fund.

An India Orphanage.—The Rev. Mr. Ward, of the Methodist South India Mission, while traversing his railway circuit near the Telugu country at the beginning of the year, took twenty orphans, made so by the famine, without knowing how he should provide for their wants. An engineer at Goolburga volunteered to superintend their care. Thirty more orphans were added in May, and now this South India Orphanage, dependent, like George Muller's, on faith, has fifty children.

The Sunday-School is Rapidly Growing in favor in Continental countries. It has made great advances in Germany, and in France there are no less than 1100 schools belonging to the French Sunday-School Society. These schools are found in all parts of the country.

Dr. Livingstone and Mr. Spurgeon's Sermon.—Dr. Blaikie recently wrote to Mr. Spurgeon: "I had in my hands the other day one of your sermons, very yellow. It lay embedded in one of Dr. Livingstone's journals—had probably been all over Africa—and had in Livingstone's neat hand the simple words, 'Very good.'" Mr. Spurgeon expressed a desire for the possession of so interesting a relic of the great African explorer. It was an evidence of the tie that binds together all the lovers of Christ, however widely they may be separated.

Sir Rowland Hill, the Eminent Englishman who introduced and developed the system of cheap postage, died at Hampstead, England, on Wednesday, August 27th, at the age of 84. He was the son of a Yorkshire schoolmaster, and in early life was tutor in a school near Birmingham. His attention was attracted to the defects in the English Postal System, and in 1837 he published a pamphlet advocating reform, especially in the matter of price. His exertions in this cause were continued, and were ultimately crowned with success. Like the popular and eccentric preacher of the same name, his life was a singularly noble and unselfish one.

A Jewish Convention at Paris is called for a early day in September. The assembly will include representatives of the Jewish nation from every country in the world, and it is expecte will have an important influence on the future o the race. It is remarkable that at this time when the condition of Eastern affairs is givin rise to so much anxiety and speculation on th part of prominent men in all countries, an when the permanent settlement of Palestine an adjacent countries is felt to be a vital necessit in politics, the Jews should be holding a nation convention which will tend to make any futur action of the nation more united and concer trated. The proceedings of these represent tives of the ancient people will be watched wit intense interest.

The Rev. Narayan Sheshadree, a Converte Brahman, and one of the most successful nativ missionaries in India, whose visit to this count at the time of the meeting of the Evangelic Alliance in New York in 1873, will be remen bered by many, has caused a church to be bui on a hill near Jalna by native Christian maso and carpenters, who originally were thieves profession. Since becoming Christians they ha learned their trades.

Receipts of London Theatres.—Hard Tim and scarcity of money is the general complai in England. But Mr. Henry Irving, the trag dian, states that during the past seven mont of this year no less than thirty-six thousa pounds ($174,600) have been received for adm sion to his dramatic performances at the L ceum Theatre. Also twenty thousand poun ($97,000) have been received by the Come Française dramatic company at the Gaiety Th atre of which Sara Bernhardt was the star, du ing their visit of three months to London. T plays performed by the French company we considered to be of an immoral tendency, li most French plays.

THE successful pursuit of knowledge under difficulties has had few more brilliant illustrations than that of the late Elihu Burritt, the distinguished American citizen, who attained a world-wide celebrity as "the learned blacksmith." An occupation so laborious as the blacksmith's is generally supposed to preclude by its exhausting effects on the physical powers, any useful employment of leisure hours. But Elihu Burritt worked at his calling, and boasted that he could "hold his own" with any of his fellow-craftsmen, and yet was able, in the intervals of labor, to study to such good purpose, that he thoroughly mastered ten languages and acquired an extensive acquaintance with more than twenty others.

An achievement so extraordinary indicates a mind of no common order. It shows how strong a power of will the man must have had, and what patience and perseverance must have been included in the composition of his character.

Nor did the mere knowledge of words exhaust the record which made Elihu Burritt famous He was no common bookworm who, speaking many languages uttered nonsense in them all. Burritt thought as well as learned, and knew how to express in vigorous words soul-stirring thoughts which have done their share in moulding national thought and national life. The Cause of Peace, the cause of Religion, any cause which had for its object the amelioration of society and the benefit of his fellow-men, commanded the sympathy and enthusiastic support of Elihu Burritt's pen.

In the early years of the present century there was living at New Britain, Ct.,

A POOR SHOEMAKER,

who had in his youth fought side by side with his father in his country's battles under Washington. He was of Scotch descent, and possessed many characteristics of that hardy race. In the shoemaker's home, on December 8th, 1810, was born the child who in after years became famous as the great linguist, philologist, and philanthropist—Elihu Burritt. He was the shoemaker's tenth child, and though we are assured by the Psalmist (Ps. 127 : 4) that "children are like arrows in the hand of a mighty man, and happy is he who has his quiver full of them" yet we may be certain the battle of life was a fierce one for the poor shoemaker. He was, however, exceptionally blessed in his wife, whose Christian character was the light of his humble home. A quiet, unobtrusive, gentle woman was Mrs. Burritt, a good wife and an excellent mother. "Her children have risen up to call her blessed" (Prov. 31 : 28). Long after her earthly course was run, Elihu her youngest son wrote of her : "She was the best friend her children had on this side of Jesus Christ." Happy is the woman of whom such an expression could be used, and thrice happy the man whose experience prompted him to use it.

The following instance of her solicitude for her children's welfare was given by Mr. Burritt in an address in Birmingham, England :

A MISFORTUNE.

Elihu and his elder brother Elijah were sent to the river to gather clams for sale ; but one day, while the boys were trying to back their old horse and cart down close to the river to facilitate their work, they went a little too near, and over went the cart into the river, dragging the horse over too, and the poor and feeble animal not having strength to help himself out, was drowned in spite of the strenuous exertions of the boys to save him.

With very heavy hearts at what seemed to them a most terrible calamity, and fearing the anger of their father, the boys hastened home to unburden their troubles in the ear of their kind and ever sympathetic mother. It was late in the afternoon. She comforted them as best she could, and, promising to do all she could to soften matters to their father when he should return, gave them their supper and sent them to their bed in the loft over the kitchen, reached by a ladder, for their plain home was little more than a hut.

Only half comforted, the boys lay trembling in bed, dreading the return of their father, who presently returned, much the worse for liquor. Missing the horse and cart, and learning the truth from his wife in reply to his inquiries, he took the axe, and, in spite of his wife's entreaties, began to ascend the ladder to the loft where the boys lay, axe in hand, saying as he went, with the idiotic stupidity of a drunken man, "Elijah, my son, I shall have to kill you. I feel it my duty to kill you after what has happened."

In dreadful terror the boys sprang from their bed and quickly let themselves down from the window to the ground (no great height), and, taking advantage of the darkness, made their escape. Elijah never returned to his native town until by his industry and talent he came back as the famous astronomer and author, to set up his telescope near the scene of his early struggles, and take observations upon the heavens—a man known, honored, and respected.

Elihu received the ordinary education of the village school, but at his father's death it became necessary for him to work for a livelihood. He was therefore removed from school, and apprenticed to

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH.

With many youths the change of life would have closed the period of education, but of Elihu Burritt it might be said that he went to school all his life, for he was always learning.

His mother had found time to implant in the minds of her sons a deep love for the Bible, and an earnest desire to know and understand its teachings. Elihu was intensely desirous to read the book in its original languages, and having by dint of careful economy saved a small sum of money, he procured the necessary books and commenced the study. It was an odd sight, that of the blackened walls of the old smithy turned into a book on which were inscribed Greek and Hebrew characters, the exercises Elihu did in the intervals of his forging. Not that in his studies he neglected his work, for his mother had inculcated the duty of being diligent in business. He worked, as he studied, with all his might ; and as the result he became not only an accomplished linguist, but the most expert blacksmith in the State of Connecticut.

Elijah Burritt, the eldest son of the shoemaker's family, had also made good use of his time, and had acquired a profound knowledge of mathematics and astronomy, and was at this period at work writing a book which afterwards became a college text-book under the title of Geography of the Heavens. He opened a school at New Britain while Elihu was serving his apprenticeship, and there Elihu spent his evenings drawing freely on his brother's stores of learning.

At the close of his apprenticeship, Elihu Burritt determined to devote more attention to study, and took a short course at his brother's school, and then moved to New Haven, to enjoy the advantages of Yale College.

He would not, however, ask assistance from any professor, and when twenty-two years of age undertook as an experiment to read the Iliad without note or comment, and with only a Greek-Latin dictionary. Beginning with fifteen lines a day, he soon made rapid progress and completed the book. He then abandoned his trade, for a time becoming a school-teacher, and subsequently embarked in mercantile business. Losing his small accumulations in the financial crisis of 1837, he went to Worcester, Mass.,

WITHOUT A DOLLAR IN THE WORLD, and resumed his mechanical avocation. Becoming acquainted with the linguistic treasures of the Library of the American Antiquarian Society, he soon mastered German and other kindred languages, as well as those of the Latin and Semitic groups, and turned his attention to the old Norse or Icelandic tongue. Rafu's work on the discovery of America by the Norsemen had recently appeared, and was exciting much attention. Burritt translated from the Icelandic the passages relating to America, and first became known beyond a limited circle by that achievement.

It was in 1840, when above twenty-eight years of age that his name first attracted public attention. He wrote to William S. Lincoln, of Worcester, a letter soliciting his aid in obtaining work as a translator from the German, at the same time mentioning his occupation, and the considerable list of languages of which he had gained some knowledge. The letter was communicated to Edward Everett, then Governor o Massachusetts, and by him read to a meeting o workingmen as an example of successful self help. He was promptly named "the learned blacksmith."

While at Worcester he toiled with arm and brain, making such entries in his diary as the following : "Monday, June 18th, headache ; fort pages Cuvier's Theory of the Earth, sixty-fou pages of French, eleven hours forging. Tuesday, sixty-five lines of Hebrew, thirty pages o French, ten pages Cuvier's Theory, eight line Syriac, ten ditto Danish, ten ditto Bohemian, nine ditto Polish, fifteen names of stars ten hours forging." When headache came o all this study, he worked it off by a few hours o extra labor in the shop. The way would hav been made easy for him through the interest o Governor Everett to pursue his studies at Ha vard College, but he still preferred the forg He found time, however, to edit a monthly magazine, the object of which was to facilitate th acquisition of the French language, and to whic he gave the name of "The Literary Gemini. This was published in 1839, and continued for year.

He soon became known as a linguist throug all the States of the Union, and even in Europ his name was getting into notice. This reput tion brought him at intervals tasks which he pe formed with delight.

On one occasion an inscription was found, du ing some archæological researches, which pu zled the brains of the great scholars of the da It was sent to Professor Andrews (whose Lat Grammar and other text-books are well know to be translated, but even he was so puzzled to be unable to translate it. He sent it to h friend Elihu Burritt, who, in a short time, r turned the correct translation, so explaining as to delight all the linguists and scholars of tl day. For this Elihu only charged the modest su of five dollars.

A sister of Mr. Burritt, who lives in Chicag tells this anecdote of one of his linguist achievements :

THE DANISH WILL.

"Some years ago a will was sent to this count from the West Indies written in Danish. Tl manuscript was one of the most difficult to d cipher that could well be imagined, and it we the round of several of the leading colleges wit out meeting with anybody who could interpr it. Finally it was referred to Mr. Burritt. I was then working at the forge, but, with h usual determination, made up his mind that would master it. He was acquainted with t Danish tongue, but that was only half the tas The badly written manuscript must be decip ered. He worked at it for two weeks in his spa time, and succeeded. When he sent the w back, translated with absolute correctness, said he would only charge what he would ha earned at the forge."

To most persons the acquisition even of a si gle new language after youth is past is one of t most irksome and troublesome of tasks. E ng young student went on to study erman, Syriac and Polish, and astron- it, no wonder that his young head ached. The most important of his later s—two or three volumes in all—was ite Talks on All Sorts of Topics." 70 Mr. Burritt, who was never married, resided in New Britain, where he had a most comfortable home with a widowed sister and two nieces, and much of his time was devoted to educational and religious affairs. He took several days in each month visiting the schools of the place in his capacity of School Visitor, and organized a series of church-fellowship meetings which have been held in various parts of the State for four or five years. In early manhood Mr. Burritt possessed great bodily strength and power, but for a few years past he suffered from consumption, and it was noticed was gradually failing. In February of 1879 it was not expected that he could live more than a few days, but he began to improve, and on his last evening, only two or three hours before his death, he was about the house. He died very suddenly at last (March 7th, 1879), but was conscious of his going, and passed away in perfect peace.

His example was in many ways a salutary one, but his knowledge of languages was perhaps not that part of it which was most valuable, except as an instance of hard work and successful attainment of the end worked for. He was under God, his own best work—a self-made man. His example of brave industry; of hungering and thirsting after knowledge, and finding it; of not only knocking at the door of knowledge, but knocking open the door—is of vastly more worth to the youth of this and any age than all his philological acquisitions. He has shown young men what they can do and become if they have the will and the heart to move the will. Brave, industrious, kindly man, living for others, his life one long prayer for universal peace, he has left behind him an honorable name, and a story which succeeding generations will cherish as a precious legacy. And above all it is satisfactory to know that he was an earnest believer in the Lord Jesus Christ. In all his public utterances more was heard of the life than of faith; this, however, was not that he overlooked faith, but as he viewed it as the foundation for good works toward our fellow-man, he emphasized the fruit, admitting the root of the matter.

The following extract will show Mr. Burritt's style of writing and illustrate the extreme kindliness of his disposition.

ADVICE TO PARENTS.

"Be ever gentle with the children God has given you; watch over them constantly; reprove them earnestly, but not in anger. In the forcible language of Scripture, be not bitter against them. 'Yes, they are good boys,' I once heard a kind father say; 'I talk to them very much, but do not like to beat my children—the world will beat them!' It was a beautiful thought if not elegantly expressed. Yes, there is not one child in the circle round the table, healthful and happy as they look now, on whose head, if long enough spared, the storm will not beat. Adversity may wither them, sickness may fade, a cold world may frown on them, but amidst all let memory carry them back to a home where the law of kindness reigned, where the mother s reproving eye was moistened with a tear, and the father frowned more in sorrow than in anger."

The Kremlin at Moscow.—A Fortified Royal palace was set on fire in broad daylight on July 19th, a wooden staircase having been saturated with petroleum. In five hours the flames were extinguished, but the damage was considerable. Red flags were displayed on the church towers, the tocsin was sounded, and the whole population hurried to the rescue, but the palace was only saved by great exertions. The Kremlin is supposed to have been erected by the Grand Duke Demetri about the year 1376. It was burnt down in great part in the year 1812, but soon after rebuilt. In a vault beneath the structure are kept, under guard night and day, the sixteen crowns of the Czar. It is regarded by the Russians with almost superstitious reverence, and its destruction would have been regarded as an evil omen to the empire.

A CLERGYMAN A HUNDRED YEARS OLD.

THE Rev. Canon Beadon, who died lately at the age of 102, was born in the year 1777, and succeeded his father in the living of Stoneham, England, in 1812, the living having been held by the two for more than 100 years. His father died at 80 and his mother at 86. Canon Beadon was probably the last person living who remembered the Lord George Gordon riots. At that time (1780) he was three years of age, and he distinctly recollected having been held up to the window by his nurse to see the soldiers in the streets. His good health was almost uninterrupted; in early manhood he had a slight illness in the year 1798. He was about 5 feet 9 inches in height, broad-shouldered and deep-chested, with very long arms and large hands. In early life he possessed great muscular power, which was well indicated by his frame. Even when long past 70 his strength of wrist was remarkable. He was found of shooting and fishing; the former amusement he kept up till 94, the latter till 88. When middle-aged he could walk out shooting from morning till night, exposed to any amount of cold and wet, and completely knock up many younger men. He seemed quite impervious to the ailments to which ordinary men are subject. He never knew what a headache or rheumatism was.

His digestion appeared perfect, and he could eat any thing with impunity. He not only ate heartily at every meal, but used often to eat biscuits, etc., between meals. As he grew older his step became slower, but he never tottered in his gait. To the last his complexion was ruddy in tint, never showing the parchment-like appearance so often an accompaniment of extreme old age. His condition remained as in middle age up to his death, neither stouter nor thinner. At 97 he had his first severe illness—an attack of bronchitis, contracted through going out on a very cold day. The late severe winter tried him very much, and he had several colds and slight attacks of bronchitis, from all of which he recovered, and he died at last, peaceably and painlessly, from mere "decay of nature." One of his nephews is now living, aged 86; two died last year, aged 85 and 88, respectively, and at the time of his death Canon Beadon had great-great-great nephews and nieces living.

An Idiot's Dying Vision.—It is Related by Miss Martineau that an idiot she knew, who lost his mother when he was only two years old, grew to manhood with less intelligence than that ordinarily possessed by idiots. He fell ill, and when dying, suddenly turned his head, looked bright and sensible, and exclaimed, in a tone never heard from him before, "O my mother! how beautiful!" and sank down again—dead. Who can doubt that at that last trying moment of his troubled pilgrimage the veil was lifted, and he actually saw his mother, whose face he had not beheld since the days of his infancy, long years gone by! Yet there are men who say there is no life beyond the grave?

A Gift from Queen Victoria.—Some Time Ago the English Admiral commanding the Pacific station sent home a report from Pitcairn's Island describing its inhabitants, the descendants of the Bounty mutineers. In that report the gallant officer expressed a hope that the needs of the isolated and interesting little community would not be overlooked by their fellow-subjects at home. We are not sure whether among their wants he numbered an organ; but no less a personage than the Queen of England herself undertook to provide a musical instrument for use at the religious services.

The organ, it appears, has been purchased in the Californian capital, and was shipped on board a British war-vessel some weeks ago, so that in all probability it has by this time reached its destination. The case bears an inscription testifying that it is a present "from Victoria to her loyal and loving subjects in Pitcairn's Island," and we can readily imagine with what gratitude and pride the gift will be or has been received.

TAKING UP THE CROSS.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple."—LUKE 14: 27.

A Forest of Crosses—Universal Attention to One Cross—Why Christ died so Quickly—Weak from Scourging—A Picture at Antwerp—The Journey to Execution—The Cap of Thorns—Three Absences, Water, Light, Nursing Attendants—The Last Moments—Why He Died—A Test of Earnestness—Take up the Cross—Avowed Discipleship—In the Church, the Store, at Home—A Christian Wife's Work—A Great Cross-bearing Procession—The Martyred Architect—Within one Step of the Kingdom.

A CROSS was a gibbet on which criminals were put to death. Sometimes it was the shape of the letter "T;" sometimes it was the shape of the letter "X;" sometimes it was the shape of the letter "I"—a simple upright; but always disgraceful and always agonizing. When Darius took Babylon, he put two hundred of the captives on the cross. When Alexander conquered Tyre, he put two thousand on the cross. So that you see it was a common mode of punishment.

Yet I have to tell you that in the great forest of crosses that stand on the hills and valleys of the earth, there is one cross that attracts the attention of all nations. It was not any higher than the others. The wood was not different. There was nothing peculiar about the notch at which the two pieces joined; and as to the scene itself, they saw such things every few weeks. So that I see a reckless man walking about that spot, kicking aside a skull, and wondering what villain had so flat and so unshapely a head. And here is another skull, and there is another. Indeed, the Bible says it was "a place of skulls." And yet, in regard to one of the crosses in that place, all ages cry out, "Who is He? Was He a man? Was He a God? Was He both man and God?"

I come up through the darkness of that gloomy day so closely that I can see the face of the victim, and I find who it is. It is Jesus! How did He come there? Had He sauntered out, some afternoon, with His friends to stand on that hill, and gain a fine prospect, and see a brilliant sunset? Oh, no! He was ill and exhausted before He came there. We hear people wondering why Christ died so quickly, when other victims lasted forty-eight hours on the cross. Christ lasted only six or seven hours. I will tell you the reason. He was sick and exhausted before He came there. He had been scourged. We cry out against the old-time whipping-post as though it were very cruel; but that was mercy compared with the scourging of Christ.

I saw in the cathedral at Antwerp, Belgium, a picture of the scourging of Christ. It was the most over-mastering picture I ever saw, or ever expect to see. The long-frocked official opened a door that hid this picture from our view, and there was Jesus! His back bared and bent; the flagellator with his teeth clenched over the under lip, as if to give more violence to the blow; the swollen shoulders of Christ; the black and blue marks that were denied even the relief of bleeding; the flesh adhering to the whips as they were lifted, the marks where the knots of the whip gouged out the flesh; the persecutor standing with the left foot on the calf of the leg of the Saviour, balancing himself; such furious, such fiendish looks from those men grinning vengeance. Oh, the picture seized me—exhausted me! And yet Christ had not started for Calvary. It was only the whipping.

Are you ready for

THE JOURNEY TO THE CROSS?

The carpenters have cut and split the timber into two pieces. They are very heavy and very long beside, for one of the pieces must go far down into the earth, lest the struggles of the victim upset the structure. They bring out Christ weeping, and wan, and bleeding from that awful whipping; and then they lift this timber, and then they let it down gradually on Him, to see whether He can carry it; and He sustains it. Forward, now to Calvary! He moves on, the hooting, yelling crowd following after. He moves on, but He is very weary and very feeble, and He falls flat; and then they jerk at His robe and ask Him what He means by that stumbling.

And then I see Jesus getting up, one hand on the cross, the other hand on the ground, as He rises and looks in the face of Mary, His mother, for sympathy; but the ruffians tell her to stand back—she must not stand there crying. Jesus moves on again, a boy by His side with a mallet and some nails. I wonder what they are for? Christ moves on, until, after a while, unable any longer to bear the load, He staggers and falls again, and faints dead away; and then a ruffian comes up and puts his foot on Him, and shakes Him as he would a dead dog; and then another looks down at Him to see whether He has really fainted, or whether He is pretending to faint, and says, "Fainted, have you?"

And then Jesus resuscitates, and they say, "Get up! get up! Go on!" And now we are at the foot of the hill. Off with His clothes! What! shall that loathsome and unclean mob look on the unrobed body of Christ? Yes. The commanding officer says, "Off with the girdle! Off with the coat! Strip Him!" The work is done. Bring back the coat! The gamblers are tossing up coin on the grass to see who shall have that coat. "It is mine." cries a ruffian, as he rolls it up and puts it under his arm, or puts his hands through it. Then they put the cross flat on the ground, and they put Jesus on it, and three or four men hold Him down while the others drive home the nails. At every thump a groan.

He has now only one article of apparel, and that is a cap—and it is a cap of thorns. No danger that it fall off, for the sharp ends have punctured the temples, and it is sure and fast. Now, lift that cross. One man at the end of the horizontal piece, another man at the other end of the horizontal piece, another soldier puts his arm around the waist of Christ, and another soldier takes hold of the foot of the long beam, and they lift it together, and with awful plunge it jars down with its burden of woe. There He is, not the picture of a Christ, not the statue of a Christ as in Roman Catholic cathedral, but the body of a living, dying Redeemer.

Some say that Christ had five wounds. Oh, they counted wrong! They counted two for the hands, and two for the feet, and one for the side; and they make out five wounds. But they forgot to count the worst of the wounds, and the most of the wounds. Do you know any thing about the strength of that cap of thorns? I saw a man on the ferry-boat the other day with a specimen bramble brought from a far country. It was just such a bramble as Christ's crown of thorns was made of. How sharp and cruel and stubborn that bramble. When it was put upon Christ do you say that He had only five wounds? Aye, ten wounds, twenty wounds, thirty wounds; I cannot count them.

There were two or

at that time that made the scene worse. In the first place there was the absence of water. The climate was hot; the fever, the inflammation, the nervous prostration, the gangrene had set in, and He terribly wanted water. These wounds of Christ were worse than any gunshot fracture; and He wanted water and could not get it. In the thirteenth century a Turk was crucified on the banks of a river so that the water might tantalize his eyes. And oh, how the thirst of Christ must have been tantalized when He thought He had made the Euphrates, and the Amazon, and all the fountains of earth and heaven! No water! It is said, in one place, that they offered him wine and myrrh—an intoxicating draught—which He refused. He wanted to die sober. Absence of water!

There was the absence of light also. You know that darkness exasperates any kind of trouble. I never shall forget the summer in 1873, when I was on board the stea Greece, mid-Atlantic, and it seemed about down, and all the lights in the cabins had blown out. The captain came in, crawling the steamer tossed, and said, "Light up! up!" The steward said, "We can't; th dles are gone, and the holders are gone." replied, "I can't help that—light up!" by almost superhuman effort lights were ki Darkness exasperates any kind of trouble. how it added to the gloom of Christ's last when the lamp of the noonday sun had out, and left Him in darkness!

Yes there was the absence also of nurs. tendants. When you are in suffering, how ant it is to have the head bathed or the or the feet rubbed! Look at Christ's han feet! Look at His face! Did He hav such attendance? There were women the knew how to take care of the sick, bu could not come up. Christ's mother cou come up. The chief priests and the s must have it their own way. hey have not done that. They have king around the kingdom of God, hoping in when no one was looking, forgetful of the fact that Christ has said, "Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and follow Me, cannot be My disciple."

An officer of a neighboring church said to me a few days ago, that he was in a large store where there were many young men, and a gentleman came in and said to one of the young men, "Ah, you are one of those who arose in the prayer-meeting and asked for prayers." "Yes," said he; "I am. I have been a very bad man. I was a bad man before that; but since that I don't think I have been so bad as I was." And he said it in that way that indicated that he was not ashamed of Christ. I have not heard the subsequent history of that young man, but I trust he is a Christian. God never casts off any one who takes a brave step ahead like that.

I am preaching this sermon to-night to show you what a light cross you have to carry compared with that Christ carried for you. Yours has not torn off the flesh; Christ's made him faint dead away. Yours has not fetched the blood; under His there was a pool of carnage that plashed the horse's fetlocks. Your cross you only have to carry a little while; but into Christ's there was compressed an eternity of anguish. There are many to sympathize with you in your cross-bearing; but Jesus, with His cross upon His back, trod the wine-press of the wrath of Almighty God alone? He lifted a Himalaya for you, and you cannot lift an ounce for Him.

There has Some one come here to-night that you have not seen. You did not see Him come in that door. Nor through any of these aisles did you see Him come; but He is here. He started in the East—the far East. He comes in wan and weary, His feet blistered with the way, His garments draggled with the dust, His eyes dim with tears, His cheeks red, not with health, but with the blood from the temples. I take hold of His coat, and I say, "It does not fit Thee?" and He replies, "It is borrowed. For My vesture did they cast lots." And then I say, "Thine eyes are red, as if from lack of sleep;" and He answers, "Yes, the Son of Man hath not where to lay His head.'

Then I look at the log on His back, and I say, "What is this?" and He says, "It is the cross I carried for thee and the world of sin. Let all these people take a cross and follow Me." And He marches on, and

THE PROCESSION IS FORMING TO-NIGHT

—the Great Cross-bearer going ahead, we, who have smaller crosses, coming on after in this great march to heaven; and, as some of the people halt and say, "We will not join a procession where we have to carry a burden or suffer shame," Jesus turns upon them with a majesty and omnipotence that makes the very earth tremble as He says, "Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and follow Me, cannot be My disciple."

Who here to-night is anxious for God and heaven? Who is ready to start forth and say, "Let others do as they may, I will take Christ, in the presence of heaven, and earth, and hell. In the strength of God I now take the first step forward. Farewell, my sins! Farewell, inconstant world! Farewell, every thing that would hinder me from going forward! Welcome, Jesus! Welcome, Him of the torn foot, and the bleeding brow, and the broken heart! Welcome, Jesus! What thou commandest me to do I will do. What thou commandest me to bear I will bear. Only lead the way, Thou Great Cross-bearer, and I will follow with my own burden."

Are you willing to take a cross so that you can get a crown? Who is on the Lord's side? I wish to-night we might divide off. Who is ashamed of Christ? Who will turn his back upon the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world?

Many years ago

A ROMAN EMPEROR

said to a Greek architect, "Build me a Colosseum, and when it is done I will crown you, and I will make your name famous through all the world, if you will only build me a grand Colosseum." The work was done. The emperor said, "Now we will crown that architect. We will have a grand celebration."

The Colosseum was crowded with a great host. The emperor was there and the Greek architect who was to be crowned for putting up this building. And then they brought out some Christians, who were ready to die for the truth, and from the doors underneath were let out the lions, hungry, three-fourths starved; the emperor arose amid the shouting assemblage and said, "The Colosseum is done, and we have come to celebrate it to-day by the putting to death of Christians at the mouth of these lions, and we have come here to honor the architect who has constructed this wonderful building. The time has come for me to honor him, and we further celebrate his triumph by the slaying of these Christians."

Whereupon the Greek architect sprang to his feet and shouted: "I also am a Christian." And they flung him to the wild beasts, and his body, bleeding and dead, was tumbled into the dust of the amphitheatre. Could you have done that for Christ? Could you have stood up there in the presence of that great audience, who hated Christ, and hated every thing about Him, and said, "I, too, am a Christian?" Could you have done it? Can you, to-night, stand up in the presence of this audience and say, "I want to be on the Lord's side?" Have you the ten-thousandth part of the courage and enthusiasm for Christ that that Greek architect had?

Are you willing to avow just now the position you occupy in regard to Christ? Are you willing to let the world know, as it looks on, that—let others do as they may—come sickness or health, come applause or abuse, come life or death—you are for Christ now, and Christ forever?

I have wondered if now, in the midst of this sermon, before prayer is offered, there might be any here who desire an interest in that prayer, and I have wondered if I should ask those who desire an interest in this closing prayer to rise up. I wondered if they would do it. And the Holy Spirit tells me that now is the time; that there are eternal destinies trembling in the balance; that there are hundreds of souls here within one step of the kingdom; and the Spirit of God says to me, "Ask them now to take up the cross and follow Jesus, and in the presence of this great assemblage to make announcement of the fact that they mean now to start for heaven, and show that they have earnest desire to be remembered in the prayer about to be offered."

So I ask now that all those in this audience—whether on the main floor, or in the boxes, or in the first gallery, or in the second gallery—that all such unsaved ones who desire now to take up the cross and follow Jesus, I ask that where they are, this moment, they rise up. [The people arose in many parts of the church.] Many! many! many, as clouds and as doves to their windows. Many in all the galleries. Will any more have Christ to-night? Another person rises. Many more arise. The Lord bless you. Are there any more? Time is passing. Hear the clock tolling away the time. Now is the time. Are there any more? Another rises. Another! Are there any more? Another, and still more. Oh, it seems to me as if the last day had come, and we had gathered for the reckoning. I ask you once more, Stand up for Jesus! another soul rises; and there is joy in churches, militant and triumphant! Let us pray!

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

He Invents a Diabolical Charge against Percival—He would Sign his Statement if he were a Scholar—He is not Ashamed of His Name—Dismissal of Haley with a Golden Blessing—Decision to Arrest Percival—Mr. Lemaire's Terror at the News—He Hastens to the Chief of Police—Out of Consideration for his Daughter he Hesitates to Sign the Warrant to Apprehend Percival.

HALEY'S account of the circumstance which had fixed in his memory the date of Arnold's treasonable speech made an impression on the chief of Police. He thought it a very trifling and ridiculous event.

"But then," he said, "it's one, for all that, well fitted to impress itself on the remembrance of this man. You say that you heard this Mr. Montaigne on the occasion you mention address the persons present?" observed the chief. "I do," calmly answered Haley.

"Can you tell me some of his words?" "Oh, indade I can," was the answer. "What were they, my man?" "Why, thin, he said yer honor, that the Queen—God bless her!—ought to be put to death, and the Lord Lieftinant piked off-hand or shot. Yis, thim war his very words, piked or shot. That, fur his part, sooner nor stand any more Englishman's nonsense, he'd willingly see the sthreets o' Dublin run blood. Yis, that was the word, run blood, and ivry house in it burnt to ashes—yis, that was it, burnt to ashes." "Anything else?" inquired the chief.

Haley had come to the end of his tether, and his inventive powers were exhausted; but luckily, as he thought, a remarkable sentence he had lately heard came to his mind, relieving his mental vacuum. He therefore continued: "A good manny o' thim at the meetin' I'm talkin' of war for quiet and ordherly manes, yer honor, and wouldn't hear tell o' murdherin' methods, fur bekase they had no arms, they said; but the dacent Mr. Montaigne shouted out, 'Fools! idiots! Can't yees rush into the constabulary armoreys?' siz he. 'Can't yees break into the gunsmiths' shops and git what yees want?' siz he. 'Does yees mane to wait till muskits are showered down from heaven, and angels'—Did yees ever hear the loike?" asked Haley—"'and angels are sent to pull the thriggers?'"

"Did he say that?" asked the chief. "Och, thin, in truth he did," responded Haley; "thim's his very idintical words—God save and presarve uz!—wid me own two ears I hard him, and siz I to meself, 'Yer a wicked awful man, it's as plain as tundher; and the town,' siz I, 'isn't safe while yer loose in it.' And it was thin, yer honor, that I cum to settle it in me mind that I'd see yer honor's honor some day about it, and in me simple, honest way would make known to ye all the words and ways o' this owdacious and murdherin' villain."

Haley's statements were so extreme, and his desire to exaggerate was so palpable, that it is more than probable at another time, when public affairs were in a more tranquil condition, his information would have been set aside as not worthy of credence, or even of a moment's consideration. There was, however, something of panic abroad, and the police had of late made some startling discoveries, and most unlikely persons were found to have had a part in the confederate plot; so his words were received as, upon the whole, likely to be true, and, if so, very important.

When he had concluded, all his deposition was slowly and carefully read over to him, and he was asked was it taken down correctly. "Yis, ivry single word," he answered; "that's me affidavy." "Then sign it, my man," said the chief, pushing towards him the document. "I wud with all me heart, yer honor, if I war a scholar," said the informer. "Dinny O'Hara, the teacher, whin I war a gossoon, thried his best to make me wan, but, an' shure he had to give it up as a bad job, and cudn't. But put, yer honor, Mickey Haley, litherary man, and wanst a piper, Bridget's Alley (that's where I live, yer honor), at the fut, and it's meself that'll soon place the sign o' the cross to it." "Very well, my man. There, touch the pen," said the chief. "You acknowledge that's your name and address, do you—Mickey Haley, Bridget's Alley?" "Yes, before the Vargin and the saints, shure enough, that's me name, not a word o' lie in it," said the astute fellow; "and as I'm a thruth-telling man, I'm not ashamed uv it."

Haley, at the close of his examination, was dismissed. "Shurely not widout your blessin', yer honor?" said the piper. "'Pon me conshense, it's thirsty work, yer honor," he added, with a leer, and putting his hand to his forehead. "It's thirsty work, yer honor, givin' such valuable, nobil, and unsalfish sarvice as I have been a-doin' this blessed mornin', yer honor, fur me counthry; purtectin' the Queen; and, you know, yer honor, I'm only a poor man, and such as uz expicts some compensashun."

The chief did not seem to like this pushing of his claims by the informer. He replied, however, "Very well, Haley, you will get an acknowledgment. Here, Mr.——," he said, addressing one of his clerks, "let this man, for the present, have a sovereign."

When this was placed in his hand Haley left the office, saying to himself, as he went down the steps before the door, "Arrah! but arn't they fools about here, 'Castle' though it be. A sov'reign for a quarter of an hour's talk. Jolly! I've piped, busy as a nailor, for tin blessid hours for less nor a quarter uv it. Hurroo! I niver expict to airn a pound aisier."

After Haley left the office it was resolved that a warrant should be taken out for Percival, and Haley's depositions to this end, with other necessary papers, were therefore sent up to another office, and that office was the one over which presided the father of Lucie Lemaire.

It would be quite impossible to describe the bewildered surprise and agitation of Mr. Lemaire when he read over the statements made by Haley. He looked three or four times at the name of the individual charged with attempt at murder and treason in the document before him. "Percival Montaigne—no—Rathmines," he repeated to himself again, and yet again, before he would accept the conviction that the individual mentioned was his intended son-in-law. But yes, there it was; about that there could be no question. It might be most distressing news, but the person indicted was, without the shadow of a doubt, the accepted lover of his Lucie, and he grew pale with emotion. He then read over in detail, and very slowly, the informer's deposition, taking it in bit by bit, which process he found demanded from him an unusual effort, for he was actually stunned by the recorded assertion of Haley.

Percival Montaigne for years a Ribbonman, a murderer, a concealed Papist, a preacher of sedition, a firebrand conspirator in the confederate clubs, and advocate of wholesale massacre! In mental agony he exclaimed, "Help me to bear the tidings; it's horrible!" and his whole frame shuddered. "But it cannot be true," he said, excitedly, still speaking to himself. "This man must have made some outrageous mistake. Percival Montaigne cannot be what this man says; it's too dreadful to think it, and I cannot and will not believe it." Taking up the papers before him, he left his office, and hurried down to the chief before whom Haley had sworn his affidavit.

When he left the room one of his clerks said to a coadjutor near him, "What in the world has happened to Mr. Lemaire? I felt afraid he was taking leave of his reason. Did you not notice him? He trembled like a leaf, turned pale as death, and seemed as if he did not know what he was doing."

Mr. Lemaire found the gentlemen he wished to see at the same post where Haley had left

As the chief, in calm and measured accents, oke thus, and made known Detective Fox's ormation, while Mr. Lemaire's agitation in- ased, persuasion gradually dawned and gath- d force in his mind that Percival had been, adventure, a deceiver and a cheat, and had n carrying on a courtship in his domestic cir- under false pretences. He had admired and n loved the young man, and considered him most eligible match for his daughter, but he s now conscious of a serious revulsion of feel- i. Nothing more angers a government offi- l than to be proved destitute of acuteness and crimination; besides this, Montaigne's con- tion with him and his, he felt, would tend to npromise his social and Dublin Castle posi- n.

ome unamiable and over-zealous loyalists, it s likely, would even go the length of saying t he himself was, in all probability, not too stworthy. And others, jealous of the so- led "catch" his daughter had made, would stefully assert he had encouraged this young n's visits to his house not for family consid- tions, but because he sympathized with his itical doctrines; and, by the bye, could not servants tell to inquiring bachelor policemen Rathgar—and it was a thing certain to be e—that Confederate songs were sung in his se, and that when he was present? At this ught resentment rose up warm in Mr. Le- ire's bosom, and while subject to its heat, he he could have the warrant that was required Mr. Katcham issued even with some measure satisfaction.

ANECDOTES OF ECCENTRIC PREACHERS.

By Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

wland Hill's Story of the Beans—Orator enley—Wesley and the Virago—A Reporter's istakes—William Dawson, etc.

DUTCHMAN who, from the orderly style of handwriting and the precision of his phrases, uld be a very exemplary individual, once te me a sternly admonitory letter. From ing read my printed discourses with much asure he had come to consider me as a godly ister; and therefore being in London, he availed himself of the opportunity to hear . This, however, he deeply regretted, as he l now lost the power to read my sermons with asure any more. What, think you, had I said done to deprive me of the good opinion of so ellent a Hollander? I will relieve your mind saying that he considered that I preached ex- dingly well, and he did not charge me with extravagances of action, but it was my per- al appearance which shocked him. I wore a rd which was bad enough, but, worse than , he observed upon my lip a moustache! His at guy of a minister, with ruff and bands and n, and a woman's chin, was not eccentric, because I allowed my hair to grow as nature nt it should, I was eccentric and frivolous carnal and worldly-minded.

. ROWLAND HILL'S STORY OF THE BEANS.

young man was about to go to India, and a us friend was very anxious that he should not ve the country in an unconverted state. He uced this young man to stay a week with him ondon, and took him to hear a minister of ch repute—a very able man—a man of sound argument and solid thought—in the hope that perhaps something which he said would lead to his friend's conversion. The youth listened to the sermon, pronounced it an excellent discourse, and there was an end of it.

He was taken to hear another earnest preacher, but no result came of the service. When the last night came, the godly friend, in a sort of desperation, ventured with much trembling to lead his companion to Surrey Chapel, to hear Mr. Rowland Hill, praying earnestly that he might not say any funny things; that he might, in fact, preach a very solemn sermon, and not say any thing whatever that might cause a titter. To his horror, Mr. Hill that night seemed to be more than ever lively, and he said many quaint things.

Among the rest he said that he had seen a number of pigs following a butcher in the street, at which he marvelled, inasmuch as swine have usually a will of their own, and that will is not often according to their driver's mind. Mr. Hill, upon inquiring, found that the aforesaid pigs followed the leader because he had beans in his pocket, and every now and then he dropped a few before them, thus overcoming their scruples and propensities. Even so, said Mr. Hill, does the devil lead ungodly men captives to his will, and conduct them into the slaughter-house of everlasting destruction, by indulging them in the pleasures of the world.

The sober gentleman who had brought his friend to the chapel was greatly shocked at such a grovelling simile, and grieved to think of the mirth which his young friend would find in such a dreadful observation. They reached the door, and to his surprise the youth observed, "I shall never forget this service. That story about the pigs has deeply impressed me, for I fear it is my case." A happy conversion followed, and the critic could only retract his criticism in the silence of his own grateful heart. Well, then, let each servant of God tell his message in his own way. To his own Master he shall stand or fall.

ORATOR HENLEY'S PLEASANTRY.

A certain preacher, finding himself in Northamptonshire, among the shoemakers, in order to draw a congregation, gave notice in the morning that he would in the evening tell them the quickest way to make a pair of shoes. When they crowded the place, he bade them take a pair of boots and cut the tops off. If this was really done, then, I say, let this wit among cobblers live and die at his trade, but let him not again go beyond his last. I am sorry that I have met with an advertisement by Orator Henley (who flourished 130 years ago) which proves that he actually did this, not in Northamptonshire, but in London, and headed his announcement with a Latin sentence signifying that the greater includes the less.

JOHN WESLEY AND THE VIRAGO.

Dr. Campbell once told me the following story: "On one occasion when Mr. Wesley was preaching he said, 'I have been falsely charged with every crime of which a human being is capable except that of drunkenness.' He had scarcely uttered these words before a wretched woman started up and screamed out at the top of her voice, 'You old villain, and will you deny it? Did you not pledge your bands last night for a noggin of whiskey, and did not the woman sell them to our parson's wife?' Having delivered herself of this abominable calumny, the virago sat down amid a thunderstruck assembly, whereupon Mr. Wesley lifted his hands to heaven, and thanked God that his cup was now full, for they had said all manner of evil against him falsely for Christ's namesake. After this we feel reconciled to the idle tales which buzz about us, annoying us for a small moment, but doing no great damage."

A REPORTER'S MISTAKES.

A reporter's omission of a single sentence may make a speaker appear very absurd and eccentric. Of this we have a notable instance in a newspaper report of a speaker at our College meeting. He is reported to have said of us, "May every hair of your head be a wax candle to light you into glory, and may you be in heaven ten minutes before the devil knows you are dead." Assuredly this looks outrageous as it stands; but let me personally vouch for its connection. Our friend said that he wished that he was able to express his love to us, and his hearty desires for us, and that he envied the enthusiastic ingenuity of a poor Irish woman who in thanking her benefactor exclaimed, "May, etc." Now the reporter in this case was a friend to us all, but probably the exigencies of the printing office knocked out the previous sentences, and there stood the Catholic benediction in all its exuberance, as if it was his own utterance.

Larwood, in his book of "Clerical Anecdotes," states that "Samuel Roe, a Bedfordshire clergyman in the last century, and vicar of Stotfold, signalized himself by a proposal for preventing the further growth of Methodism—a proposal as full of genius as it was of humanity. But this amiable and benevolent man shall be heard in his own words: 'I humbly propose to the legislative powers, when it shall seem meet, to make an example of the tabernacle preachers, by enacting a law to cut out their tongues, as well as the tongues of all field teachers, and others who preach in houses, barns, or elsewhere, without apostolical ordination or legal authority.'"

WILLIAM DAWSON'S DRAMATIC POWER.

William Dawson, the Yorkshire farmer and Methodist preacher, was distinguished for his wonderful dramatic power. In a sermon on Rev. 6:7, 8, he said:

"Every step the sinner takes is deeper in sin; every moment takes him further from heaven and nearer hell. Onward, onward he is going—death and hell are after him quickly, untiringly they pursue him—with swift but noiseless hoof the pale horse and his pale rider are tracking the godless wretch. See! see! they are getting nearer, they are overtaking him."

At this moment the stillness of the congregation was so complete that the ticking of the clock could be distinctly heard in every part of the chapel. Leaning over the pulpit in the attitude of attention and fixing his keen eye upon those who sat immediately before him, he continued, in an almost supernatural whisper, "Hark! hark! that swift rider is coming, and judgment is following him. That is his untiring footstep! Hark!"—and then imitating for a moment or two the beat of the pendulum, he exclaimed, in the highest pitch of his voice, "Lord, save the sinner! save him! Death is upon him, and hell follows! See, the long arm is raised! The final dart is poised! Oh, my God, save him—save him—for if the rider overtakes that poor sinner, unpardoned and unsaved, and strikes his blow, down he falls, and backward he drops—hell behind him, and as he falls backward, he looks upward, and shrieks, 'Lost! lost! lost! Time lost, Sabbaths lost, means lost, soul lost, heaven lost! All lost, and lost forever!' Backward he drops; all his sins seem to hang around his neck like so many millstones as he plunges into the burning abyss. 'Come and see.' 'Lord, save him! Oh, my God, save him!' 'Come and see.' Blessed be God! The rider has not overtaken him yet; there is time and space yet for that poor sinner.

"The horse and the rider have not overtaken you yet; there is, therefore, an 'accepted time,' there is a 'day of salvation!' 'Come and see.' There is God the Father inviting you; God the Father commanding you; God the Father swearing He has no pleasure in your death, but in your life. There is Jesus Christ come to seek you. He has travelled thirty years to save you. He is dying on the cross. With His outstretched arms He says, 'Come unto Me, and I will give you rest.' 'He that believeth in Me shall never die!'" The effect was so overwhelming that two of the congregation fainted, and it required all the preacher's tact and self-command to ride through the storm which his own vivid imagination had aroused.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Republican Convention at Saratoga has been the principal topic of interest in political circles during the past week. In spite of positive predictions to the contrary, Senator Conkling has succeeded in carrying the convention, and, by the sagacious speech he made as chairman, demonstrated his capacity as a leader of the party.

Mr. Alonzo B. Cornell was nominated for Governor on the first ballot, and a platform was adopted pledging the party anew to national supremacy, equal rights, free elections, and honest money, thanking President Hayes and the Republicans in Congress for their recent attitude, and denouncing the present Democratic policy.

The opposition of Tammany to the Tilden branch of the Democratic party has excited a hopeful feeling in the Republican ranks as to the prospects for November.

General Grant is Expected to Arrive at San Francisco September 21st. He sailed from Japan September 3d. His arrival is anticipated with considerable interest, and it is expected it will finally set at rest the question whether a nomination will be accepted by the General if it should be offered.

The Yellow Fever Still Continues Its Dread work. One of the most prominent of the victims is General John B. Hood, who fought General Thomas at Franklin, Tenn., and who died of yellow fever, at New Orleans, on the morning of the 30th. He leaves eleven children.

Only four days before he died his wife, whom he dearly loved, also died of the same disease, and General Hood was deeply affected by her loss. On his deathbed his mind ran to his camp life, for, fancying, after the manner of all yellow fever patients, that his symptoms were more favorable, although dissolution was really near at hand, he said to Dr. Bemiss, "Doctor, we may yet dislodge the enemy."

The total number of deaths from fever in Memphis during July was 56; number of cases reported, 197. The total number up to August 9th, when the fever was declared epidemic, was: deaths, 95; cases, 358. For the week ending August 16th the number of deaths was 57, and new cases 170. For the week ending August 23d there were 148 new cases and 53 deaths.

Honor to an American.—The Cross of the Legion of Honor, a French order much coveted in that country, has been conferred on Dr. Edward Warren, an American physician who is at present practising in Paris. The majority of the wearers of the cross are military men who have earned the distinction by destroying life, but it will increase the gratification Americans will feel at the award in question when they learn that the services which have procured the honor for Dr. Warren are "his unfailing kindness and sympathy toward the poor."

The Emigration from England to the United States which the depressed state of English trade led us to expect this fall has already begun. Our latest advices state that a large body of farmers are assembled in Manchester ready to start. They are not entirely penniless, having capitals of $2000 to $3000. They are from Yorkshire, and their intention is to colonize, if possible, together.

Yorkshire farmers have the reputation of being industrious, thrifty men. Many of them are Wesleyan Methodists. Such men will be a gain to this country, and will act as a check to infidels Socialists, and Roman Catholics, who are gaining a dangerous predominance in the population.

Iron, a scientific English journal, states that the whole mining population are turning their eyes to America and Australia. Mr. Bryson, President of the Northumberland Miners' Association, urged all the unemployed laborers to give up the struggle at once and forever in Old England, and to emigrate. Three hundred men of the Bradford Iron and Machine Works are on their way now to Philadelphia, where employment is promised them. A cutlery firm in Sheffield with all of its capital and full staff of workmen is moving bodily to this country. Iron states that "it is the best and most trustworthy workmen who have hived off first."

The Work Now in Progress at the Gospel Tent, Forty-third Street, New York, is deserving the attention of all Christian people. Three years ago the Rev. Dr. Tyng, Jr., realizing that there was a positive decadence of church-going among the people of this city, and that the pulpit was not affecting the mind or heart of the middle class of our citizens to any great extent, erected the first Gospel Tent in Thirty-fourth Street, near Sixth Avenue. Its design was to give the Gospel to the people irrespective of class, color, or condition. That tent was the means of doing a great work, an account of which was published in a book called "Under Canvas." That tent being destroyed by fire, the present one was bought, and placed on its present site.

The number and character of its services are varied. Twenty services are held during the week. These are Preaching, Gospel Temperance, Praise and Prayer, Inquiry, and Children's meetings. The last has been in operation since June 15th. About 200 meetings have been held. The attendance has reached nearly 80,000. O this number it may safely be estimated that one third belong to the class who do not attend or belong to any church. About 300 have asked fo prayer and remained for conversation, and 15 persons have professed their faith in the Saviour

Many marked conversions* have occurred Poor drunkards and outcasts and men of birt and culture have alike found redemption beneath that canvas roof. The character of thes services is solemn, decorous, and impressive Its entire weekly expenditure is under seventy five dollars. This pays the salaries of superi tendent, assistants, music, two watchmen, ga printing, advertising, and other incidentals.

eneral Custer and his Staff Officer.—The nguished general whose statue was unveiled est Point August 30th was well known as a e, skilful soldier, but few knew how sin- and earnest was his Christian life. The wing incident, related by a brother officer, is ly interesting :

One of the most delightful memories I have ne period when I had the honor of serving eneral Custer's staff is of the night follow- the fight at Waynesboro. About eleven ock in the evening an orderly came to me said the General wanted to see me. When nt to his room he greeted me cordially, and , 'I've thought we should both sleep better e read a chapter from the Bible, and had a yer together.' I read a Psalm, and we knelt ether to thank God for the victory, and com- d to His care ourselves and our dear ones. H said he had resolved, by God's help, to live ristian life, and expressed such purpose to friends at home."

Peculiar Anniversary was Celebrated in em, Mass., on Saturday, August 16. It was that day two hundred and fifty years since organization of the first Protestant church ned in America. Salem was planted in Sep- ber, 1628. Messrs. Skelton and Higginson, arrived in June following, were the first tor and first teacher of the Salem church. organization of the church was completed gust 6th, old style, corresponding with August h, new style. The simple platform upon ich the church was founded was the follow- : "We covenant with the Lord, and one with other, and do bind ourselves in the presence God, to walk together in all His ways, ac- ding as He is pleased to reveal Himself to us His blessed Word."

Sinking City.—The Populace of Mill Hol- , a part of the city of Wilkesbarre, Pa., was t own into excitement on August 27th by rming subterranean sounds. For some nths past the tenants of some of the houses e been conscious of peril by reason of signs of a ing in of the surface. On the night of Au- st 26th, at about eleven o'clock, the surface of ground began to sink. At about three lock the next morning some two acres of gar- ns and nurseries went down about eight feet, cking the houses, and alarming the community t such an extent as to drive all in the vicinity m their homes. The ground around the ken pit for acres is cracked, and it is be- ved that the entire surface of the land under- ned must go down, destroying many private d public buildings.

Another Minister Drowned.—Among the Sad ses of drowning this season is that of the Rev. nry O. Finch, whose body was found in the ter at Sachem's Head, Long Island Sound, on ednesday, August 27th. He had been preach- in the First Congregational church of Guil- d for a year, and at the time of his death was ending a few days at the house of a friend ar the shore, preparatory to his ordination as stor of the church, which was to have taken ace on Sunday last. He rose at an early hour Wednesday, went to the shore to gather oss, but did not return to breakfast, and noth- was seen of him until 10.30 A.M., when his dy was found upon the beach. No bruises or arks of violence were found, and it was sup- sed that he had accidentally fallen into the ater. Mr. Finch was the son of a prominent tizen in Keeseville, N. Y.

Jerry McAuley, the Founder of the Water reet Mission, delivered an address in the mis- on room on Sunday, August 24th, in the course which he said : "A meeting like this is a etty warm place for sinners. I know it would ave been for me when I was a bad man ; they'd ave to tie me to the benches to keep me in. It not the smart or nice or eloquent things that e said that bring people to the Mission, but e Spirit of God who does the work. He uses uman agencies. He used a lady to bring me— good, holy, Christian woman. It was at the me of the John Allen excitement ; the papers said it wouldn't amount to anything. It did amount to something. It ketched me."

Jerry then told the story of how, while on his knees at the Mission, only wishing those praying would get through, he saw a lady praying for him with tears streaming down her face. This roused him to pray on his own account. "I had been a poor drunken sot," he said, "sleeping on the docks, and ashamed to come up on the street on Sunday, I was so ragged. They turned me out of the rum shops. I'm glad they did, and I wish they'd turn out more. Now I am a citizen, and of no mean city—that above."

Saved by a Pin.—The following Remarkable narrative is related by Mr. O. W. Holmes : "A lady was observed to treasure a common black pin of which there was a history. Her husband had been confined in prison for some political offence. He was left alone with his thoughts to torture him. No voice, no book, no implement —silence, darkness, misery, sleepless self torment ; and soon it must be madness. All at once he thought of something to occupy these terrible unsleeping faculties. He took a pin from his neckcloth and threw it upon the floor. Then he groped for it. It was a little object, and the search was a long and laborious one, and it took him a great while to find the little object he was in search of. At last he found it, and felt a certain sense of satisfaction in difficulty overcome. But he had found a great deal more than the pin—he had found an occupation, and every day he would fling it from him and lose it, hunt for it, and at last find it, and so he saved himself from going mad ; and you will not wonder that when he was set free and gave the little object to which he owed his reason, and perhaps his life, to his wife, she had it set round with pearls and wore it next her heart."

Church Lotteries in Boston.—Rev. Henry Morgan gives the following public announcement : "Here I give warning, and declare before the audience, that the first church in Boston, of whatever sect or creed, that advertises, sets up, and promotes a lottery this season, shall be prosecuted to the full extent of the law." An example which may be copied with advantage in other cities.

Dr. Seiss and his Unknown Visitor.—A Contemporary relates the following incident : An American travelling by himself in the Holy Land was taken ill of malarial fever at Jerusalem. As he lay on his lonely couch, nearly hopeless of recovery, a stranger called to see him, and was admitted. Without giving his name, he proposed reading a passage from the Scriptures. He selected a short, beautiful Psalm, and, having finished the reading, retired in the same quiet way he had entered. But the effect on the sufferer was powerful. Light broke through the gloom, and there arose in his soul a calm trust in Israel's Keeper. From that time the force of his disease abated, and his restoration was finally complete. The Psalm chosen by the unknown visitor was the 121st, and the name of the traveller Dr. J. A. Seiss, Lutheran minister of Philadelphia.

Killed by Hornets.—A Boy Aged Ten Years named Tellson Jewell, son of a New York policeman, has been spending his vacation with his grandmother at Hyde Park, Duchess County, N. Y. On Wednesday morning, while the men were pressing hay in the barn, he climbed a small tree in the yard to pick apples. He had been in the tree only a few moments when he was heard to utter a terrible cry, and was seen to jump to the ground and run toward the house, holding both hands on the top of his head, and uttering piercing shrieks. His grandfather hurried from the barn, and catching him, asked what the matter was. His shrieks could be heard a long distance, and between them he shouted, in a most agonizing manner, "Oh ! I'm stung ! I'm stung !" The boy was taken into the house and laid upon a lounge. His attendants had much trouble in tearing his hands from his head, but they finally succeeded, when it was discovered that he had been terribly stung by hornets. He died in half an hour.

THE PLAGUE OF THE HEART.

A Sermon Delivered on Lord's Day Evening, August 10th, 1879, by C. H. Spurgeon.

(When the regular congregation unanimously left their seats to be occupied by strangers, who crowded the building to its utmost capacity).

> "What prayer and supplication soever be made by any man, or by all thy people Israel, which shall know every man the plague of his own heart, and spread forth his hands towards this house : then hear thou in heaven thy dwelling place, and forgive, and do, and give to every man according to his ways, whose heart thou knowest (for thou, even thou only, knowest the hearts of all the children of men) ; that they may fear thee all the days that they live in the land which thou gavest unto our fathers."—1 KINGS 8 : 38-40.

One Priest and One Temple—Heart-Plagues—I. Their Forms—A Troubled Memory—Unrest – Some inveterate Sins—Indecision—Hardness – Faintness—Dread of the Future—Story of the French Monarch and Death—II. Their Treatment—Study the Case—Look Toward God—Spread the Trouble before Him—Plead the Blood of Jesus—III. Helps to Expect—Luther and the Fiend—Receipted Bills—The Old Man and his Little Child.

YOU all know that the temple at Jerusalem was the one place of sacrifice throughout all the holy land, for thus had the Lord spoken, "Whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers which sojourn among you, that offereth a burnt offering or sacrifice, and bringeth it not unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, to offer it unto the Lord ; even that man shall be cut off from among his people." According to God's law there was one altar, and it was counted a high crime when the tribes which dwelt beyond Jordan built another, and their brethren besought them, saying, "Rebel not against the Lord in building you an altar beside the altar of the Lord our God" (Josh. 22 : 19). As there was only one high priest, so there was only one altar ; and sacrifice might not be offered anywhere else but on that altar at Jerusalem.

Hence when a man wished to present his offerings to God he went up to the one temple which Solomon dedicated by the prayer in which our text occurs. The people did afterward build altars on high hills and in green groves, but these places, and the sacrifices offered there, were contrary to the mind of God. There was but one altar and one sacrifice, and that was at the temple. Hence when the godly Israelite prayed he looked toward the one place of sacrifice, not in superstition, but in believing remembrance of the one sacrifice, and the one altar, and the one glorious token of the divine presence which shone over the mercy-seat within the veil. He knew that God could only accept him through the one sacrifice, and therefore he looked that way.

The people especially looked toward the temple in prayer in times of national calamity. In drought, or when the crops were consumed by locusts or by caterpillars, or when blast and mildew destroyed the hope of harvest, or in time of war, or pestilence, their supplications were presented unto the one Jehovah, all eyes looking toward his one sacred shrine where the one sacrifice smoked upon the altar. But, although there were those special opportunities, and God heard his people's cry, as a nation, it is very pleasant to observe that he regarded the griefs of individuals. Every man, says the text, that knew the plague of his own heart was to spread forth his hands toward that one place of sacrifice and pray, and God would forgive him and deliver him. That is my subject to-night. The Lord will hear whatsoever prayer and supplication is made by any man in reference to his own personal affliction, if his heart is turned toward God's own temple.

But

WHAT IS THAT TEMPLE?

and where is it? There are now no material temples beneath the whole heaven, unless the bodies of believers may be so called, and no one thinks of looking to them. No, "The Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands." No one place is more sacred than another.

" Where'er we seek him he is found,
And every place is hallowed ground."

There remains one temple, however, and that is the body of the Lord Jesus Christ. He is temple, altar, and sacrifice ; and if you would look the right way in prayer, and if you desire your prayers to speed, you must look to him by the eye of faith. See, there he sits at the right hand of God. Having finished the one sacrifice, and made atonement for sin for ever, there he sits—priest, altar, offering, temple ; and every true supplicant must enter into the holiest by his blood, " by a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us, through the veil—that is to say, his flesh."

Whoever beneath the wide heavens is conscious of the plague of his own heart, or has any thing that plagues him or aught that troubles him, may turn his eyes towards Christ, the true temple, with a certainty that God will hear his prayer and answer his request, and send to him deliverance. " We have an altar," and that altar is our Lord's own blessed person ; we have but one, and we tremble for those who set up another, but to that one we look with confident hope, being assured that the sacrifice once offered there has made our peace with God, and procured acceptance for our supplications.

" We rear no altar—thou hast died ;
We deck no priestly shrine ;
What need have we of creature-aid ?
The power to save is thine."

But now I must come nearer to the point in hand. The text speaks of " every man which shall know the plague of his own heart." I am going to talk to you about that knowledge, and the plague with which it deals.

These are home affairs that we shall speak of to-night ; not matters beyond our line, and unpractical, but our own personal concerns—" Every man the plague of his own heart." A great many men think they know the plague of other people's hearts, and there is a great deal of talk in the world about this family, and that person, and the other. I pray you let the scandals of the hour alone, and think of your own evils. This night let each man consider his own home affairs, and not other people's business. He would be a bad farmer who ploughed other people's lands, and left his own untilled. He would be a poor gardener who used his hoe on other men's weeds, and not on his own.

To-night I pray you let each man think of home affairs. Yes, and let him think of heart affairs ; for, whatever may be wrong about us, the worst place to have any thing wrong is the heart. Out of it are the issues of life. We can endure the burdens of life, but " a wounded spirit who can bear?" A plague in the body is not half so bad as a plague in the heart—a plague in the soul : of all plagues the plague of the heart is the sorest. It is not the plague of another man's heart which I have to think of to-night, but the plague of my own heart, for the text speaks of knowing, " Every man the plague of his own heart."

To come to close quarters. Our first point will be forms of this plague, the next will be mode of treatment, and the third will be help to be expected.

I. First, let us mention various of the heart. They are very many—perhaps almost as many as the hearts themselves. Some have this plague of the heart in the form of a terrible memory. With blood-red line remorse has scored their memories in an ineffaceable manner. We need not go into particulars—a secret something known scarcely to any one but themselves hides away in the tenderest part of their nature and eats out their vitals. They sinned—sinned terribly, and the sin haunts them. They could be happy if they could forget, but that one sin is ever before them as though a blood spot were painted on their very eyeballs.

They are reminded of it by the simplest events, for it seems as though God had put an accusing tongue into the stones they tread upon and the walls which surround them. Even their beds refuse them repose ; they wake in the darkness and sit in speechless horror, or if they fall asleep the visions of the night scare them. Few know of their fault, and yet they imagine that they are universally suspected. Nobody has cried shame upon them, but they cry shame upon themselves. It may not be one sin alone, but perhaps all their sins in one pack bay at them and pursue them like bloodhounds eager to devour.

They can hear the voice of their sins above all notes of music or shouts of laughter. When they would be quiet and at rest they cannot be, for they are tossed to and fro like ocean in a storm. They have the plague of remembered sin upon them, and see no remedy for it : to-night it is my gladsome message that there is a cure for this form of heart-plague, an effectual cure. Transgression can be blotted out, even the greatest trespass can be altogether forgiven. Sin can be put away so that it shall not be mentioned against you any more for ever. Blessed be God for this. If this be the plague of your heart, have confidence and embrace the cure to-night.

With others it takes another shape. Their heart-plague has assumed the form of dissatisfaction and unrest. They cannot be quiet. They are like the troubled sea, which cannot rest. They were a little pleased at one time when they had a new scheme on hand to divert their thoughts and amuse their minds. The scheme has prospered, but that prosperity has brought them no contentment ; they must now be at something else, and while the new plan is in full swing they will a little forget, but when that also is accomplished they will sit down and cry, " What next? I am sick of all things, and most of all of myself. Life is worry and disappointment. I cannot be quiet. I crave a something, I know not what."

There are hundreds and thousands of men who have all that heart can wish, and yet are miserable. On the other hand, I could point you to many hundreds who have but little in this world, and yet are almost as happy as the angels, in full contentment rejoicing in their God. The plague in the heart rages fiercely in those who lack for nothing except the power to enjoy what they have. They have succeeded in their learning, and gained their degree, but increased learning has only enlarged the sphere of their disquietude. They have succeeded in business and have retired, but retirement is a weariness to them. They have prospered in every thing, and this has become their adversity.

Like the wise man of old, they cry, " Vanity of vanities! All is vanity." They mourn over all earthly good, saying, " There is nothing in it. It is an empty thing. Woe is me! Where is rest for my soul?" Again it is my glad errand to-night to tell you where perfect rest and sweet contentment can be found ; where your soul shall dwell at ease and possess the earth, and inherit worlds to come, and your peace shall be like a river, and your righteousness like the waves of the sea. The Lord God, the Holy Spirit, help you to avail yourselves of the blessed peace stored up in the one great Sacrifice which every unresting heart may have, if it will come to him.

This plague takes another shape, and I mention several, that I may come home to many hearts, and depict many experiences ; in many it is a wretched tendency to some one sin, which, nevertheless, the man in his better moments does not wish to commit. Some are horribly plagued by their passions. They stand out against them occasionally, and come to a pause, and resolve, " It shall not be. In the name of every thing that is good, it shall not be." They hate and despise themselves for it, and yet they yield to overwhelming lust, and are hurried forward by their passions like sear leaves in the tempest, or spray dashed aloft by the storm.

Many individuals are plagued with the temptation to strong drink. They vow that they abstain, but the serpent stings and they th for the fire-water, and will have it, though it grades their manhood below the level of swine. With others wantonness and chaml ing have gained the mastery, and the plagu foul indeed. With another class it is ungove able anger, quickness of wrath, or that sl burning, smouldering fire called malice, wh is nearest akin to the fire of hell. Better b with a lifelong fever than be the prey of th fierce heats. To such also I have the to proclaim, in the name of God, the all-me ful, that from this they can be redeemed : t can be delivered from the bondage of corr tion, and brought into the glorious liberty the children of God.

In others, this plague of the heart is a wre ed indecision—a perpetual vacillation. They resolved at times, but their resolve ends in no ing. To-day they are in earnest ; to-mor they are careless. To-day they are almost p suaded to be Christians ; to-morrow they quite persuaded to find pleasure in sin. F as the waves and fickle as the winds, they never long enough in one stay to take root a where. Unstable as water, they shall not ex

Th is One who can throw the weight of his sw love into the quivering balance, and mak turn in the right direction. O hesitating m tal, if you have grace to look to-night tow the one Sacrifice, the Holy Spirit will root and ground you in love, Jesus will make a ste fast man of you, and you shall yet say, " O G my heart is fixed, my heart is fixed ; I will and give praise."

I have known this plague of the heart some to take the form of a mournful hard so that they cry, " I would, but cannot, rep I would feel, but I cannot feel. I seem to given up, seared as with a hot iron, and inse ble." This is a fearful plague, perhaps wo than all I have previously mentioned beca more fatal. Is there, then, no hope? there is one who can make the dead to live, can take away the heart of stone and giv heart of flesh, and it is his name we preach night, the name of Jesus, who shall save people from their sins.

There are others whom I meet pretty stantly who have a faintness of heart, a spondency of spirit, and this is their plag They cannot believe that there is mercy them. They cannot hope that they could li new life. At times they feel a desire to unto the Lord, but they think it is impossil and that grim impossibility drives them from Christ, and forward to yet grosser Many a man has said, " Because there is hope, therefore will I sin to the very lengt my tether. I cannot be saved, and so I ma well have the pleasures of sin to the full."

I pray thee, dear hearer, let not despair saddle thee and ride thee, for there is no ca for it. There is salvation where Jesus com and he comes here to-night. No man need he is denied a hope since Christ came into world to seek and to save that which is l Oh, my hearer, hope as long as you live. the very confines of death's dominions, and the borders of hell-shade, let this word of m fly, " There is hope : there is hope." For most hopeless there is still hope. " Let wicked forsake his way, and the unrighte man his thoughts : and let him return unto Lord, and he will have mercy upon him ; and our God, for he will abundantly pardon."

One other form of heart-plague is a cons dread of the future. Multitudes of persons always under apprehension, and especially der apprehension of death. You must not mention death in some places; the very word is horrible. Some would like, I dare say, that the etiquette of the age should respect their coward fears and be as daintily absurd as that of the French monarch who would not allow death to be mentioned in his presence, and when his secretary read the words, "the death of the king of Spain," he sharply asked, "What is that? what is that?" in anger that such a thing should be mentioned in his sacred presence. The secretary was obliged to say that it was a circumstance which occasionally happened to kings in Spain.

Scores of people would like us to be just as delicate as that upon the subject of their end. But, O sirs, ye must die. The youngest among us who is in best health will die—may die soon; but where the snows of winter lie upon your heads, and where already the tenement begins to crumble through old age, death must come. Are you not prepared, my friend? Are you not prepared? Then I do not wonder that you tremble at the very thought of being summoned before your Maker's bar. But be not as the ostrich, which hides its silly head from the hunter, and then dreams of being secure. Learn to look death in the face, for it will soon stare you out of countenance. Do you call yourself a Christian, and are you afraid to die? Oh! if God had made you such a man as you ought to be you would not dread to die, for death is a mere undressing to the true believer, and undressing which leads to his being arrayed in glory.

Have I, in any of these descriptions, picked you out, my dear friend, to-night? Have you a heart-plague like to any of these? Or is it some other form of the great spiritual pestilence? I cannot tarry to describe it, for now I want to speak upon the mode of treatment. May the Holy Ghost help you to feel the plague, and accept the remedy upon the spot.

II. You desire to get rid of this heart-plague—effectually rid of it; let us then consider the

which will work a cure. I hope you are not so foolish as to say, "I shall not think about the matter, for it would only plague me more." That is a very bad habit, and only such as a frivolous or a wicked person would follow. A man is in trade, and he says to his clerk, "Don't bring me the books; I do not want to know any thing about my accounts. Don't let me see day-book or ledger; I had rather not be troubled with them." The confidential clerk replies, "Sir, I think you ought to see your account at the bank." "No," answers the silly one "I should not like to be perplexed with figures and balances and losses and deficits. I should not enjoy my dinner if I attended to these matters; let us drive dull care away and enjoy life while we may. Don't worry me, but keep those wretched books away."

I do not think it needs a prophet to foretell that this tradesman will soon be in his creditors' hands, with very small assets. By such avoidance of knowing his position he will be ruined as sure as doomsday. And whenever a man dares not look into the state of his own soul and dreads a half an hour alone, he may conclude that there is something rotten in the state of Denmark—something far, far gone with regard to his soul's estate. He need not question that, I think. But let us not be so unwise, for the first mode of treatment we prescribe to-night, in order to the remedy, is that every man should know the plague of his own heart; that is to say, he should endeavor to get a true and accurate knowledge of his spiritual condition as in the sight of God.

What is this sin that troubles you? Honestly look at it. What is this fear that haunts you? Do you know what it is? I would advise you to write it down and see it in black and white. What is this tendency to sin that enslaves you? What is this wretched indecision. Get a diagnosis of the disease, and be sure it is a correct one. Look your own case through and through. It very much helps toward salvation when a man knows something of his need of it, and he will be very much helped to a sense of his need if he will impartially examine his own state. Might I ask such a thing, I fear it would not be granted, but I am sure good would come of it if I could get it—that every person to-night on his going home would sit down in his chamber, look into the state of his heart before God, and then write on a piece of paper one of two words—"saved" or "lost?"

My friend, do not write that word "saved" unless you can honestly and sincerely say, "I have looked to the Saviour, and he has saved me." But suppose you are forced in honesty to your own conscience to write down the word "lost" as your true description, it will be both manly and useful to do so. I have known this to be done in cases in which, before the morning light, that piece of paper has been burned and another word has been written in its stead, even the bright consoling word "saved." Only foolish people object to inquiry as to their state: be not one of them. Write down the condition of your soul. Take stock, and make sure. Write down "impenitent," if you are so, put it before you in black and white. Write "unbelieving," if you are so. It cannot hurt you to know the truth, and it may be of lasting benefit to you. We prescribe that to begin with.

Then, next, as Solomon bade those who knew the plague of their own heart turn their eyes to the great sacrifice at the temple, so the next thing to do is to turn your eye to God. You cannot help yourself, and nobody on earth can help you. Your case, apart from divine grace, is desperate. This heart-plague will not die out of its own accord, nor will any change of your outward condition eradicate it. Turn, then, to the great Physician and cry to him thus, "Lord God, thou didst make me, thou canst mend me. Thou didst make me, thou canst make me over again. I am lost. Creator, Redeemer, Sanctifier, thou canst save me." Look heavenward and Christward. Look to the bleeding Lamb, to the risen Redeemer. To look within will breed despair, but to look to Christ on the cross, nay, to Christ, now at the right hand of God, will beget lively hope. Jesus is "able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them"—to look to him is the main part of the cure. Look that way, I pray you. Look and live.

And when you have looked that way, the next thing to do is to spread the trouble before God. Some do not know how to pray. When you cannot pray begin your attempt in this manner: "Lord, I cannot pray; I cannot pray; oh, teach me to pray." But you say you do not feel: then I would urge you to confess, "Lord, I do not feel. My heart is hard; Lord, cause me to feel." Oh, but you say you are so disquieted, and so unrestful. Go, and tell him, "Lord, I am so disquieted: I cannot rest. Help me; help me." Tell it all to Jesus without reserve. I am persuaded that if you will confess the plague to God you will soon find help from that act of confession. The Lord Jesus will speedily relieve your conscience in a very special and effectual manner. Tell it unto no man; tell it unto God alone.

After confession is made, with your eye to the sacrifice, pray with your eye still upon the Lord Jesus. Pleading the blood of Jesus, be importunate for pardon. No man has truly sought God in prayer, looking to Jesus Christ, and has been refused, and there never shall be such a man. I remember how I was struck with what my mother said to me when she was pleading with me to lay hold on Christ, and I was despairing. She said, "There was never yet a man so wicked as to say that he had sincerely sought the Lord and asked mercy at his hands through Christ, and yet had been denied."

Now, I thought that I had done so, and I felt sure that the Lord had refused me, and I half resolved in my mind that I would say as much; but I have never said it, for this reason, that I sought him again and found him to the joy of my spirit. So shall it be with you, poor, weary seeker. You shall find him soon if you seek him with your whole heart. Eternity shall not reveal a single instance in which Christ Jesus cast away a sinner that came to him. All hell shall be searched through, and they shall ask them, "Is there one here that can say that Christ rejected him when he came to him?" and though glad enough to blaspheme, there shall not be found among the damned a single tongue that shall dare to utter such a baseless slander against the Friend of sinners. My hearer, if you repentingly believe and yet are rejected, you will be the first. Come, then—ay, come to-night—and tell out the plague of your heart with your eye to Christ, and then plead with God, "Lord, save me."

III. I close, lest I weary you, by mentioning, in the third place, which we may expect to receive if we follow the treatment which I have tried to describe.

The first help we shall get, according to our text, is, "Then hear thou in heaven, thy dwelling place, and forgive." In answer to your confession and your prayer and your looking to the great altar and the great sacrifice, there shall come a free pardon from the court of heaven. What a splendid word that is, "forgive!" when you know God's sense of it. It is to cast into the depths of the sea all memory of sin, to blot it out as a paid debt, to drive it away as a cloud, to cover it so that it is out of sight for ever, to cast it behind his back, yea, even to cause it to cease to be as though it had never been. I know one who differed from his friend, and spoke, under a misunderstanding, more sharply than the case required. His friend was quite able to fight his own battles, and say sharp things too.

The case was cleared up, and misapprehension removed, and he who had been first offended said in all heartiness, "Let us take the sponge and clean the slate and begin anew, as if the past had never been." The other was a good man and true, but he paused so much in his reply that the first brother did not feel that he had healed the wound, and felt tempted to say, "Say straight out that you do not mean to forgive, and then I shall know where you are." A limping reconciliation is half a feud. But when God forgives he means it, and the offence is gone forever. He cleans off the record. It is all gone, every trace of it. I think I see that slate with your sins written thereon to-night, a long and heavy score; but if you go to the Lord as I have described, he will wipe it all out. As far as the east is from the west he will remove your transgressions from you.

Do you remember the story of Martin Luther when Satan came to him, as he thought, with a long black roll of his sins, which truly might make a swaddling-band for the round world? To the arch-enemy Luther said, "Yes, I must own to them all. Have you any more?" So the foul fiend went his way and brought another longer roll, and Martin Luther said "Yes, yes, I must own to them all. Have you any more?" The accuser of the brethren, being expert at the business, soon supplied him with a further length of charges, till there seemed to be no end to it. Martin waited till no more were forthcoming, and then he cried, "Have you any more?" "Were not these enough?" Ay, that they were. "But," said Martin Luther, "write at the bottom of the whole account, 'The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin.'"

Brethren, this was a receipt in full, stamped in such a manner that even Satan could not question the correctness of it. However many or however few, all our sins are gone when the atoning blood comes in. I have an ugly thing in my study; it is a piece of iron, with a sharp point to it at the top, and the bottom is formed of a rounded piece of wood. It is not an ornamental object, especially as it holds impaled upon it a fine selection of bills, which are inclined to go yellow and dusty. Bills are horrible things, but though I have a file of them they never horrify me in the least, for though they are very many, and some of them are for large amounts, yet there is not one of them but what has Her Majesty's head in the corner, with the name of the creditor to whom I have paid it.

I have no fear of these records either day or night; in fact, it is a comfort to keep them now that they are discharged. When I look at the old file I think of my old sins, pierced through by my Lord, and kept in my penitent memory as a witness to the value of his blood which has set me free from sin's tremendous debt. Here is the receipt for them all—"The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." Some of you, I dare say, can look to-night at many a file of your transgressions. Are the bills all receipted? Are your sins all blotted out? Then you can bless the name of the Lord that the plague of your heart is gone.

Did you notice in my text a little word which follows pardon—"and do." Now when the Lord forgives a man's sins he then begins to do for him many wonderful things. For instance, that hardness of the heart he melts down; that uneasiness he quiets; that tendency to sin he destroys by imparting a new tendency—a tendency to holiness. The Lord can make the old sinner to become a babe in grace, so that he shall be just as if he were born again—nay, he shall be born again. An old man who had lived a vicious life sat down in his cottage a sad remnant of humanity, a worn-out waster of life, and when his little grandchild came with curly locks, and clambered up his knee, he patted his cheeks, and murmured to himself, "O God, if I could be a little child again and begin anew!"

That wish of many shall be fulfilled to all who look to Jesus. "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven." "Ye must be born again." The mercy is that ye may be born again. New life shall enter old hearts, or old hearts shall be made new and filled with the life eternal which for ever has the dew of its youth. Turning your eye to the great sacrifice, altar, temple, priest, even Jesus Christ, and crying to him the prayer of faith, his Spirit will come upon you, and working miracles upon you, will make you a new creature in Christ Jesus. Old things shall pass away, and all things shall become new.

After that the Lord will continue to do great things for you. He will keep you to the end; he will lead you from strength to strength and from joy to joy. He will make you useful, and that is what you never dreamed you could be: the thorny waste shall bear fruit a hundredfold. He will take you from among sinners, and put you among saints; and putting you among the saints, he will make your very experience of sin to be instrumental for good. As none make better gamekeepers than old poachers when they are reclaimed, so none seem better able to bring others to Christ than those who know what sin and salvation mean by actual experience. Such persons talk of what they have felt in their own case, and when they are saved they speak of a salvation which is manifest to everybody, for they are such changed men that no one can deny the power of grace upon them.

How eagerly do I hope that my Lord Jesus will quarter on the enemy to-night. O Lord, come in and capture some out of this crowd. Say to many who throng this building, "To-night I must abide in thy house." O my brother, live no longer an indifferent life, but begin to care for your soul's eternal interests. No longer oppose your Saviour. Become one of his disciples. He has many such as you are, and he does not despise them because they once rioted in sin; on the contrary, he binds them to himself by the greatness of their former guilt. They love him much because they have had much forgiven, and they serve him all the more earnestly because of what he has done for them. The Lord grant that the like may happen in your case, for Jesus Christ's sake, and he shall have all the glory. Amen and Amen.

THE EXPERIENCE OF MRS. AMANDA SMITH.

Mrs. Amanda Smith, a negress, with whose name our readers are acquainted, and who has been in England for some months past, being called upon recently by Mr. Cowper Temple, nephew of the late Lord Palmerston, told her thrilling story with the strange pathos which long years of oppression have wrought into the negro's voice.

I was very definitely converted to God in 1856. I was very ignorant, but I had been taught that God would save me the moment I believed. I lived in the country in a family of "Friends," and went to town only once a fortnight. When I was convicted of sin I prayed, fasted, wept, read my Bible, but the more I read the more confused I got. I used to think my one trouble was disobedience, and it seemed to me I needed some one that had not sinned to intercede with Jesus for me.

Therefore I cried to the wind, the sun, and moon, and stars, to carry my sorrow to the Lord: "O wind! you never sinned like me; tell Jesus I'm a poor sinner." When the sun got up and lightened the world I said, "O sun! you never sinned like me; tell Jesus I'm a poor sinner." At night, when the moon and stars were shining, I cried in my distress, "O moon and stars! you've never sinned like me, but kept your place as God made you; tell Jesus I'm a poor sinner." Thus I pleaded second handedly with Jesus through the heavenly bodies; but, oh! the wonderful forbearance of God! I can't understand it.

I sat down one day almost in despair. The suggestion came—"You've been sincere; you've fasted, wept, prayed, read your Bible. You've been three months like this. God does His work quick: if He'd meant to convert you He'd have done it long ago. Give it up!" But it seemed as if the Holy Spirit said, "Pray once more." "Yes," I said, "and I'll be converted this afternoon, if there's any such thing as conversion."

It was March 17th, a bright and beautiful day. I got all my work as forward as I could, and then went down into the cellar and began to pray, "O Lord, convert my soul." The suggestion followed, "That's just what you've said many times before. It's no use." I began again, "O Lord, please convert my soul. If you'll only do it I'll love and obey you all my life: O Lord, if not. I've come down here to die. Salvation or death! I'll never leave this cellar alive unless I have that which I've been praying for so long."

Well, I did die; but I came to life again very quick. I said, "O Lord, I will BELIEVE." The darkness that had filled my heart so long all passed as before the noon-day sun. When I got a glimpse of Christ my Saviour, my bonds were loosed, and I cried, "Why, Lord, I do believe; this is just what I've been asking for.

Why didn't they tell me it was like this? Why didn't they tell me it was only by believing God? I was a new creature. I was all new—my flesh, my head, my whole being. I rubbed my hands together and said, "Oh! I'm new!" You know what color they are; but there seemed a halo over them. I made but two springs out of the cellar. The glory of God filled my heart. I wanted to tell some one, and I thought, Must I wait a fortnight before I can tell out my joy?

How many times I had prayed for hours in that kitchen after they had all gone to bed! Now I struck the table at which I had so often knelt, and cried, "I'm saved!" and the table seemed to bound with delight. I wanted to see if I was the same. I might have been as green as grass or as black as the ace of spades, but I felt new. There was a large mirror in the parlor, and I went in there to see if I was the same, or if some wonderful change had come upon me.

When I told about it, some of my people said, "There'll be a vacillation. Wait till the devil fires a few bomb-shells, and you won't be as happy as you are now." Not being taught that God would sanctify and keep me, I was sometimes on the mountain, sometimes in the valley; but in reading my Bible and praying very much I began to see that God had more of the same kind to follow, and being so much more it really was better than the beginning.

I had now begun to seek entire sanctification. I asked an elder what was meant by being "pure in heart." "O child," he said, "that means you must come as near to it as you can." I went home, but oh, this hunger and thirst after righteousness was not satisfied. When I was convicted for holiness I was in a clearly justified state. I had no doubt about my acceptance with God. When I was converted it was conviction of guilt; now it was conviction of want.

As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so my soul panted after God, the living God. "That comes to what I want," I said, "it's God!" The elder said, "You must come to it as near as you can. What is the use of fretting yourself. Do all you can. Visit the sick, sing, pray!" But the hunger went on, and when I read, "Rejoice when men persecute you," I felt that was not my experience; there was a feeling of retaliation. And when they spoke about me and blamed me, I wanted to justify myself instead of leaving it all with God.

Then I read, "This is the will of God, even your sanctification." I went to the old deacon and asked, "What's the meaning of this?" "Oh," he said, "that's the blessing people get just before they die." Well, I didn't want to die: I wanted to live and work for God; and when they told me, "You'll never live this life till you die," I wanted to live, and not to die.

In 1868 it pleased God to let me hear a sermon from Rev. J. S. Inskip, from the words, "Put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness" (Eph. 4: 23, 24). I had never read a book or a tract or definite testimony, but now, as the preacher went on, I followed like a child with its hand in its father's, and as he made point after point, I said, "Yes, that's plain." But I thought, if I got it, how shall I keep it? I didn't remember it was Christ keeping me.

Mr. Inskip said, "When you are tired and go to bed you don't think of asking how you're to breathe; and so if you get God dwelling in you, He'll live Himself in you." "Yes," I said, "I see it." Just then a mighty baptism—I don't know what else to call it—came down on me. Every nerve in body, soul, and spirit seemed to feel it. A joy and power welled up in my heart to overflowing.

The next point was, that this blessing was instantaneously received; but the development would be continuous. "How long is a dark room dark after you take a light into it?" "Yes, Lord, I see it," I said, and down came this wonderful inexpressible something, bringing every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ. The preacher went on: "If Jesus is able in the twinkling of an eye to change this vile body, and make it like unto His own glorious body, how long does it take Him to sanctify a soul?" Quicker than the sparks fly from the steel, I touched God—God touched me. Hallelujah!

The first result was the establishment of my faith in all God said. I believed all the Bible. At Keswick, last year, I looked out on that great mountain Skiddaw; a few weeks ago I saw it again. We have had a hard winter, but the mountain is not changed. I said, O Lord, make me like Skiddaw. The storms were real that beat upon Skiddaw, and it has been so in my experience—real fights and real victories. I don't see any apologies in the Bible for speaking about what the Lord has done for our souls. Oh, it's God! Glory to His name. The half has not been told.

"Of peace I only knew the name,
Nor found my soul its rest,
Until the sweet-voiced angel came,
To soothe my weary breast.
The half was never told,
The half was never told,
Of peace divine so wonderful,
The half was never told."

IS ANTICHRIST A SYSTEM OR A PERSON?

By the Rev. George A. Sparks.

The Personality of Antichrist the Ancient Doctrine of the Church—I. Opinions of the Early Fathers—II. Teaching of the Old Testament—A Haughty King—The Prince of the Host—A Daring Blasphemer—A Great Dominion—A Disastrous Overthrow—III. Teaching of the New Testament—The Wicked One—The Antichrist—The Man of Sin—A Beast Speaking Blasphemies—A Despotic Ruler—Taken in Battle—Cast into Hell.

FROM the days of the Reformation until the past few years it has been almost universally taken for granted that "the son of perdition" represented by the little horn of Daniel's vision, the beast of the Apocalypse, and other symbols representing the character, career, and doom of Antichrist, referred only to, and would have their fulfilment in, the system of Papacy; and that the name "Antichrist" was but another name for the head of the Roman Hierarchy. Recent careful investigations of the teachings of the Scriptures have led a few modern expositors to believe that these symbols and predictions refer to a man, and not to a system or power.

I. This view of "Antichrist" is in harmony with the teachings of the early Fathers of the "Church," although our inquiry is not as to what is new or old, but as to what the Scriptures actually teach regarding that mysterious personage who occupies so prominent a place in the prophecies relating to the last time.

The precise meaning of the term Antichrist is of the utmost importance in this investigation, as that will go very far to determine whether the prophecies relate to a person or a system. And here we would acknowledge our obligations to the researches of others for some of the conclusions set forth in this article.

Mr. Greswell has collected a number of instances in which the Greek preposition anti is compounded with other substantives, and then says: "The result of these examples is to show that the word Antichrist signifies neither more nor less than another Christ; a pro-Christ; a vice Christ; an alter Christus; a pretender to the name of Christ, who, in every circumstance or characteristic of personal distinction that can contribute to determine the individuality of the real Christ, appears to be, and sets himself up as, the counterpart of the true."

Irenæus, who in his early youth had listened to the teachings of two disciples of the Apostle John, and who may be considered a fair exponent of the views held in the early ages of the Church, says: "By Antichrist we understand a single individual whom Satan shall use pre-eminently as his instrument, just in the same way as he did the serpent when tempting our first parents to rebel against God." He also styles him "the abomination of desolation," which, the prophet Daniel affirmed, should stand in the holy place; and he calls him an impious and unjust person, without law, an apostate, a robber, a wicked man, and a homicide.

Cyril, Bishop of Jerusalem in the fourth century, says: "This Antichrist comes when the times of the sovereignty of the Romans shall be fulfilled, and the concluding events of the world draw nigh. At first he assumes a character of gentleness, pretending both to moderation and philanthropy; deceiving, both by lying miracles and prodigies which come from his magical deceptions, the Jews, as if he were the expected Messiah. Afterward he will addict himself to every kind of evil, cruelty, and excess, so as to surpass all who have been unjust and impious before him, having a bloody and relentless and pitiless mind, and full of wily devices against all, and especially against Christians."

Jerome speaks of Antichrist as "a person whose works are works of Satan," as uniting in himself all powers and signs and wonders, but all of them lying ones.

John Damascene, who lived in the end of the seventh and beginning of the eighth century, says: "We ought to know that the Antichrist must come. It is true indeed that every one that doth not acknowledge that the Son of God hath come in the flesh, and is perfect God, and hath become perfect man, is an Antichrist; nevertheless, in a peculiar and special manner, he is called Antichrist who is to come at the conclusion of the age. He will come not on behalf of Christ, but against Christ and those who are Christ's; therefore he is called Antichrist."

Justin Martyr applies to Antichrist Paul's description of the Man of Sin, and Daniel's description of the little horn and the wilful king, recognizing him as a blasphemer who makes himself equal with God, and usurps the honor due to God only. Most of the early Fathers regarded him as something more than a man, though appearing in human form. Many of them believed that he would be an incarnation of the prince of the powers of darkness himself. Many of the later Fathers asserted that Antichrist would claim to be Christ, and that by these professions he would deceive the Jews, who have always looked forward with intense desire to the coming of Messiah. Augustine represents him as saying: "I am Christ promised to you, and I have come for your salvation."

We might multiply to almost any extent quotations illustrating the absolute belief of the early Fathers that Antichrist was to be a person, and not a system or power, a king begotten by an evil spirit, a prophet of lies, having power given him to do signs and wonders, and who would falsely give out that he was the Christ; but as we must come, each for himself, to the Word of God, without any intervention of human authority, if we would obtain the real truth, we purpose now to bring this view of

to the only standard of truth, and search the Scriptures if these things be so.

II. We will begin with the Old Testament. Very soon after the Jews were carried into captivity, Nebuchadnezzar, their despoiler, was exalted to the sovereignty of the nations of the earth; and "the times of the Gentiles" began, and to human eyes Israel's nationality seemed to have been completely extinguished, and all prospect of Israel's glory and predicted blessedness to the world entirely cut off. For the comfort of the faithful few, who looked with weeping eyes upon all that dishonored the name of Israel, God graciously showed by His prophets the limits of the times of the Gentiles, the restoration of the Jewish nationality, and the final overthrow of all earthly power when the God of heaven would set up a kingdom which would never be destroyed. (Dan. 2:44.)

In the vision of the metallic image and its interpretation, recorded in the second chapter of Daniel, it was revealed to Nebuchadnezzar, the first great head of empire, that his kingdom should speedily be transferred to a conqueror; and then, in turn, four, and only four, successive monarchies should sway the world. In the seventh chapter of Daniel the character and history of the four monarchies are presented to the prophet in the vision of four beasts; and the course of events in the closing period of the history of the last monarchy is more particularly described under the symbol of ten horns, among which "came up another little horn, before whom three of the first horns were plucked up by the roots."

These symbols are thus interpreted: "And the ten horns out of this (fourth) kingdom are ten kings that shall arise; and another shall rise after them; and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings; and he shall speak great words against the Most High, and think to change times and laws: and they shall be given into his hand until a time, and times, and the dividing of time: but the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end, and the kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom; and all dominions shall serve and obey Him." (Dan. 7: 24–27).

We can with absolute certainty recognize in this king, symbolized by "the little horn," and "the wicked one," the Antichrist as already set forth. His insolent and blasphemous pride, his exaltation of himself above all that is called God, and the impious and cruel war which he wages against the people of God, fully identify him as the very king "whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming." (2 Thess. 2:8.)

Let us now turn to the vision of the Ram and the He Goat, in Dan., chap. 8. This vision being given under the reign of the last Chaldean king, it did not, like the former visions, embrace that kingdom, but commenced with that which was to follow. Accordingly, after glancing at the Macedonian conquest of Persia, the death of Alexander the Great, and the division of his kingdom among his four generals, forming four kingdoms, of which Assyria was one, the present ages of its oblivion are passed over, and the revival of these four kingdoms set forth; then out of these four kingdoms, represented by the four horns of the goat, another is represented as arising: "Out of one of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land. It waxed great even to the host of heaven, and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them. Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of the host, and by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down."

The identity of this with the little horn of the preceding vision is made apparent in the interpretation, where he is set forth as "a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences; and his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power, and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper and practice, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people. He shall also stand up against the Prince of princes, but he shall be broken without hand.' Surely this can be no other than the king whose career and doom are described in Dan. 7: 25, 26.

In Dan. 11 we have in more minute detail who "shall do according to his will," who also "speaks marvellous things against the God of gods." His armies "shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall plan the abomination that maketh desolate." He shall prosper "till the indignation be accomplished, for that that is determined shall be done;" and at last he meets the same sudden and complete overthrow described in the other prophecies, resulting in the deliverance of the Jews, and the glorious issue of the overthrow of the confederate nations under their impious leader, and the ushering in of the everlasting kingdom. "The kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heavens, shall be given to the people of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey Him."

III. Turning from the Old to the New Testament, we find this same mysterious person connected with the closing scenes of the earth's history, and mentioned in such terms as clearly to identify him as "the wicked one" of the prophecies of Daniel. And here, perhaps, it is proper to mention that the word Antichrist occurs nowhere else in Scripture but in the First and Second Epistles of John. But notwithstanding this infrequent mention of him by the name Antichrist, we are able to fully recognize him in all the New Testament prophecies. Our Lord Himself not only predicts to the Jews his coming, but also their acknowledgment of the blasphemous pretender, when He says, "I am come in My Father's name, and ye receive Me not; if another shall come in his own name, him will ye receive." In 2 Thess. 2: 3–12 the character and course of the Man of Sin are briefly but graphically sketched. His career of awful wickedness is set forth in the closing days of this world's history; and, under Him as their leader, all the hosts of ungodliness are to be mustered to meet their doom.

Turning to the Apocalypse we find the same strong proofs of his personality. Rev. 13 : 4–6 sets forth his unexampled blasphemy and impiety. "And they worshipped the beast. And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies. And he opened his mouth in blasphemies against God, to blaspheme his name and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven. And he had power to cause as many as would not worship the image of the beast to be put to death."

In chap. 13 : 2, 7, 8, we are told the source and character of his power. "And the dragon gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority." "And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them: and power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations." "And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world."

In chap. 19 : 19, 20 is given the manner of his overthrow and destruction. "And I saw the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies, gathered together against him that sat on the horse, and against his army. And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. These both were also cast into a lake of fire burning with brimstone."

Without further reference or remark we leave these proofs, only repeating that it can scarcely be disputed that the "little horn" of Daniel 7 : 8, the "king of fierce countenance" of Daniel 8, the "prince that shall come" of Daniel 9, the "king who shall do according to his will" of Daniel 11, and the "ten-horned beast" of Rev. 13, are one and the same with the Man of Sin, the Son of Perdition, that Wicked One, of Paul, and the Antichrist of the Apostle John.

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

[For the benefit of readers who may not have seen the previous numbers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD containing this story, we give the following outline of the narrative up to the point where the present chapter opens:

Effie Holland, the wife of a young English farmer, had before her marriage been maid to Lady Ethel. When she became the wife of Robert Holland, she childishly anticipated a life of unalloyed happiness, and altered the name of their new home to "Salem," as showing the peace she hoped to enjoy there. Living at Salem with the young couple was a widow named Mrs. Cross and her nephew Fred. Mrs. Cross had been mistress of the farm, and Robert had undertaken to board her and her nephew for a time as part payment for the farming stock. The widow proved a disagreeable inmate of the farm, and Effie found her presence a constraint and a source of annoyance. She had also proved a bad mentor for Effie, and among other bad effects stimulated her curiosity in a matter which had seriously annoyed her husband. Robert had received a letter the contents of which he wished to keep secret, even from his wife. He sent away a considerable sum of money afterwards, and refused to say where it was sent. Prompted by the widow Effie opened the next letter that came from the same correspondent, and found it was written by Ellen Morris, a widowed sister of Robert's, and it thanked him for sending money to enable her to emigrate. Effie also learned from the letter that the writer had only lately been released from jail, where she had been sent on a charge of having stolen a diamond ring from her late mistress, a Mrs. Vernon, who had died while Ellen was waiting upon her at a distant watering place.

Connected with the story of the life at Salem, is an account of a family residing at Eureka House, the principal residence of the village. This family consisted of a philosopher named Mr. Vernon, who believed he had discovered an antidode for snake-bites, and who was a materialist and an atheist. Managing his house, and acting as his amanuensis, was his niece Miss Edith Temple, a gentle Christian lady whose feelings were continually being hurt by her uncle's sneers and scoffs at religion. Alec Stewart, an eccentric Scotchman, Mr. Vernon's confidential servant, was Effie Holland's uncle.]

A SHELTER NEEDED.

ROBERT had been too deeply wounded by Effie's conduct in opening his sister's letter to say any thing, and Mrs. Cross's inquisitiveness irritated him still more. After abruptly leaving the breakfast table, he had gone to his bedroom and remained there a long time.

Mrs. Cross finished her breakfast, and with Fred left the kitchen before Robert Holland came downstairs.

Effie stood trembling by the fire awaiting in dread the coming of her husband, and the terrible words of reproach which she expected to hear from his lips when he found her alone. She heard him enter the kitchen; she knew that he walked close up to her; she felt that his eyes were upon her; and though she did not venture to look up, their long steadfast gaze seemed to scorch her.

"Oh! Robert, can you forgive me?" faltered Effie, for his silence she no longer could bear.

To her surprise her husband's only answer was taking her into his arms, and for a moment pressing her closely to his heart with an almost convulsive movement. Then, with what sounded like a smothered groan, Robert turned and strode out of the dwelling.

"How good he is! Oh! how much, much kinder than I have deserved!" exclaimed Effie, bursting into tears. "Never, never shall I give my own love such cause for anger again."

Effie could not, as a lady might have done, sit down and give way to her sorrow, for the wife of a farmer whose means are small, and who keeps no maid-servant, has many duties to perform both within the house and without it. Perhaps the necessity for active occupation was rather a comfort to Effie, for it a little diverted her mind. Nevertheless, while she washed her cups, dusted her furniture, or shelled her peas, her thoughts almost constantly reverted to the theme of the opened letter.

After all, it was no small satisfaction to Effie to know the worst, and to find that her Robert had only acted nobly and generously toward an unhappy sister. Effie felt proud of her husband, and not even on the day of their wedding had she loved him more dearly than she did now. How grieved was Effie to have grieved one who could so quickly forgive; how vexed was she that the gossiping Jemima should know Robert's secret, and all through the fault of his wife!

No prince could be more jealous for the character of a member of his family than was the English farmer. No one who had borne the name of Holland had ever been accused of theft before this unhappy affair of Ellen Morris, his widowed sister. Effie knew how intolerable it would be to Robert to have the village gossips talking about her imprisonment. Effie sympathized most keenly with her husband in this his family trouble. She would have done or endured any thing to have spared him the grief and the shame.

"Oh! how I shall try to make up to my Robert for the pain which my folly has caused him. How ungratefully, how foolishly, how wickedly I have behaved!" Such were the reflections of the penitent wife.

Shortly before noon Effie saw the well-known figure of Miss Temple coming up the road which skirted Salem. She was walking slowly, as one who was very weary. Never had Effie been more glad to welcome her former teacher. The presence of the lady would be as oil upon troubled waters. Effie hoped that Miss Temple would stop till Robert should come in for dinner, that her conversation might prevent a recurrence of the gloomy silence which had made the morning meal so painful.

But Edith herself was in trouble, and Effie could not but notice this when she ran to open the gate. The lady's face bore traces of recent tears, and she was even more pallid than usual. The tones of Miss Temple betrayed her inward emotion when, pausing in the little garden before entering the house, she thus addressed her former Sunday-class scholar:

"I have come, dear Effie, to ask if you could manage to let me have a little room in your home, it may be for one or two weeks, perhaps but for one or two days."

Effie was a good deal surprised at such an inquiry being made by the mistress of Eureka House.

"I should be so glad—so proud," she replied, "to have Miss Temple as my lodger; but I could not make a lady like you as comfortable as I could wish." Effie saw that Miss Temple was not aware that the spare room was occupied by Mrs. Cross, and she was puzzling her brain to find out in what corner of her house she could possibly accommodate another lodger.

"The smallest room will suit me; I am easily pleased," said the lady; "I shall be well contented to fare just as you fare;" and Edith mentioned the amount of remuneration which she was able to offer. The sum was not large, but quite sufficient to satisfy a reasonable landlady, from whom so little was required.

"If you will kindly step into my parlor, Miss Temple, I will see what can be done," said Effie, showing the lady into the pretty little apartment, and relieved to find that the widow was not within it. The room looked to Edith the abode of comfort and peace. The flowers, the pictures, the little china ornaments, the view from the latticed window, all combined to make the place attractive.

Edith, who was very weary after her long walk in the heat of the day, and who had scarcely recovered from the agitation caused by the trial which had brought her to take refuge in Effie's home, sat quietly down by the window, resting her aching head on her hand, while Effie went, as the lady naturally supposed, to consult her husband before coming to any arrangement.

Effie was not afraid of any difficulty being made by Robert, who, she doubted not, would be well pleased to have such a lodger as Miss Temple for a short time under his roof. Her difficulty was of a different kind—Effie's house was already full. Effie ran upstairs to consult Mrs. Cross, whom she found in her pink room arranging her widow's cap.

"Oh! Mrs. Cross, what am I to do!" cried Effie; "here is dear Miss Temple, who wants to lodge here, perhaps for one or two weeks, and she looks so weary and sad that I cannot bear to tell her that I have not a corner to spare."

"Do you mean that Miss Temple wants a lodging in this farm-house!" cried Mrs. Cross, with surprise. "What on earth can have made her leave Eureka House? She must have quarrelled with her uncle! What has happened? What did she say?"

"Miss Temple says nothing about the cause of her leaving her uncle's home," replied Effie; "I only know that she looks very ill, and as if she had lately been crying."

Here was a new mystery, a fresh subject for gossip, to delight the low, inquisitive mind of Jemima Cross.

"What payment would the lady give for a room?" asked the widow.

Effie mentioned the sum, then added with a sigh, "But I have not a room to offer, not even a small one."

Mrs. Cross smiled; she had caught the idea of possible profit to herself to be drawn out of Effie's evident anxiety to accommodate Miss Temple. "Perhaps something might be managed, my dear," said the widow, in her easy, good-humored way; "I could take Fred into my room for a time, and you could make his little one nice for the lady."

"What a bright thought!" cried Effie. "I could make that little room so pretty! and you—only for a little while you know—you could let Miss Temple consider my parlor as her own private sitting-room. You won't mind keeping me company in the kitchen while the lady stops er'' Effie was very anxious and eager that rrangement should be concluded.

s. Cross made many objections to the plan, hogh it was exactly the arrangement which he ad already formed in her own mind. "The of cooking," she said, "was the one which she never could bear, and the fire must be lighted in a kitchen, however hot veather might be, would make her ill in ima's design in making all these objections ained. Effie was so desirous to have Miss ple as her lodger that she actually consent- let Mrs. Cross pocket all the profits of the gement, taking on herself the trouble and ise. Effie was not, like Jemima Cross, at making a bargain.

"iss Temple will be like an angel in my lit- alem," thought Effie; "and oh! how I one to guide and to cheer me!"

hing remained now to be done but to ob- he consent of Robert and to make needful tions in the pretty little room which had to been occupied by the child.

e was so sure that her husband would not to her little arrangement that she did ait for his coming in for dinner before ac- setting to work. Toys were hastily car- out of the small apartment, ornaments, candlesticks, and Effie's own looking-glass d in. The floor was swept, the stains re- d, a snow-white coverlet was spread over d, and jars of fresh flowers on the window- lded brightness and fragrance to all.

e was so pleasantly occupied in making little arrangements for the comfort and ure of so welcome a guest that her thoughts while were diverted from the painful event morning.

It was her love for her Saviour which equired her to seek a new home, but, like ints of old, she went out cheerfully, sure God whom she served would provide for Heb. 11 : 10).

THE CHRISTIAN CITIZEN.

S. S. Lesson for Sep. 21st. Tit. 2 : 11 ; 3 : 9. Golden Text, Matt. 22 : 21. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR golden text for to-day—words of wisdom from the lips of our beloved Lord—forms a fitting introduction to our subject. "Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's; and unto God the things that are God's." Or as Paulputs it (Rom. 13 : 7): "Render therefore to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honor to whom honor." To carry out this principle, no compromise of conscience is required, and yet how many, even of God's children are there, who render to the world what is not its due, in deference to its opinion and its spirit, and who fail to render that which is its due and which would make them independent of it, in money payments, and great exactitude in the discharge of duty.

There are men, even professedly Christian men, who, losing a position of some hundreds a year through depression in trade, would yet be unwilling to take a clerks' place at $500 or $600 a year, rather remaining idle than to be occupied in a position which the world's spirit says is beneath them though God has not said so. This is rendering to Cæsar more than is Cæsar's.

The King of kings and Lord of lords was not ashamed to take His place among us as a carpenter, and the great apostle of the Gentiles was neither a professional man nor a great manufacturer, but a plain mechanic. O let Christians know that work does not dishonor a Christian, and while unconverted people may remain under this delusion, let God's children at least be free and happy to adapt themselves to any circumstances to which their loving heavenly Father calls them.

"For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world." Here is the appeal of God. His wondrous grace which has delivered us from going down into the pit, and which has found a ransom (Job 33 : 24) which shields us from our past, ("not imputing their trespasses unto them" 2 Cor. 5 : 19), which stands between us and present temptation; ("Ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God." Col. 3 : 3), this grace also teacheth us.

By the grace of God we are risen with Christ, and as such, under an obligation to deny ungodliness. Our very position as only condemned in ourselves, forbids any intercourse between ungodliness and us; "how shall we that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?" (Rom. 6 : 2.) And so with "worldly lusts;" the world is crucified unto us and we unto the world. Now it is a worldly lust to retain this unholy pride of position of which we have been speaking. If God gives us a position, let us hold it to His glory; if He takes it from us, let us bow and praise Him.

Our subject tells us that the Christian citizen should be "looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." In the light of His coming, a man who was once master need not be ashamed to be found in the position of a servant, but one who is found with an unpaid debt, an unsettled dispute, or an unforgiven injury, may well be "ashamed before Him at His coming." Every thing becomes so real which we place in the light of His appearing. It is utter slavedom to bow to what people think and what the world will say. Let our eyes look right on, and let our eyelids look straight before us. Let us look neither to the right hand nor to the left, but on to His coming (Prov. 4 : 25–27).

"Who gave Himself for us." Not His life only, not only His great salvation, but Himself, all He was, "that He might redeem us from all iniquity and purify to Himself a peculiar people." Now is the object attained in us, for which He gave Himself? Are we redeemed from all iniquity and purified? This includes not forgiveness only, but a radical separation and purification from habits of sin, from evil tempers, jealousy, heart-burnings, unkind words, impatience, etc.

Our beloved Lord seeks to make us a peculiar people, not an eccentric people, but like enough to Him to be unlike all others. He made Himself of no reputation; (Phil. 2 : 7) this was peculiar to Him, let us follow after Him. He sought not His own glory and received not honor from men, this is most unlike others. He loved those who despised and injured Him, loved His enemies, this is not the common disposition of men. All through His life there was the abnegation of Himself, and He died to make us like Him. "And zealous of good works." This epistle is full of good works; they are mentioned in it six times, and they are but the natural and legitimate point of a real faith in Christ.

Paul writes on: "Put them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates, etc." Here is again the rendering to Cæsar the things which are Cæsars. We must obey without respect to the person, because of the office which he holds. Then, "ready to every good work," ready with money, time, influence, interest, sympathy, in the measure God has given us, and as ready to the good works of others as our own. Then "to speak evil of no man" not even to repeat what we know against another, to keep quiet about it. "No brawlers, but gentle; showing all meekness unto all men." Meekness but not weakness. Ready at all times to receive a rebuke with humility and gratitude, but not succumbing to the worldly influence of others.

We have such blessed examples of God's children in the world, but not partaking of its spirit, in the old Testament Scriptures, that it may be well to mention some of them. We have Noah a shipbuilder, but he "walked with God." Joseph a servant, but the Lord was with him, and "his master saw that the Lord was with him." (Gen. 39 : 3.) Then we have Moses the lawgiver, whose face shone with the glory of God; Joshua the warrior, who could say: "as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." (Jos. 24 : 15.) Then David the shepherd who would bless the Lord at all times (Ps. 34 : 1). Daniel the politician who prayed three times a day. Ezra the scribe, Nehemiah the governor, both such men of prayer. In each one of these holy men of God we see an unlikeness to the generation in which they lived. And if so with them, how much more are we called and empowered by the indwelling of Jesus to be peculiar unto Him. Who can say amongst such witnesses that a man of business cannot be holy? It is true indeed that a close eye to God's glory is required to live in such an age, a life contrary to the spirit of the age, but with God all things are possible.

Paul reminds Titus of the past, of the life of misery and sin, "foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another." What a picture! and it is a true portrait of the unconverted life of each one of us, and of all who are yet without Christ. But O how blessed is the contrast, "After that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appeared, not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us, by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost; which He shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour; that being justified by His grace we should be made heirs, etc.

After this most blessed declaration of His free and full grace, the apostle adds yet again an exhortation to good works, and continues: "But avoid foolish questions, etc., for they are unprofitable and vain. O what a generation of citizens should we have were these exhortations of the apostle put in practice. How would infidelity be put to the blush if this holy integrity and divine peculiarity stamped every Christian citizen with His mark; the children of light would stand out in splendid contrast to the children of this world, and all men would recognize them.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Cetewayo, the King of Zululand, appears to be in a desperate condition. A dispatch from Cape Town, dated August 19th, by way of Madeira, says King Cetewayo's new kraal was burned on August 13th. The British cavalry on the same day started in pursuit of Cetewayo, and at 7 o'clock on the morning of the 15th they arrived at the kraal where he had passed the night before, but ascertained that he had fled to the bush early in the morning. Lord Gifford, with a party of mounted natives, was, according to the latest advices, continuing the pursuit.

Sir Garnet Wolseley telegraphs that Cetewayo has only two or three followers with him.

Tewfik, the New Viceroy of Egypt, Proves to be as unmanageable as his father. He has dismissed the ministry provided for him by England and France, and appointed a native ministry of his own. The London Times says it is now evident that Tewfik Pasha is determined to govern on the same system as that of his father, namely, through native ministers. As these are notoriously corrupt, there seems little hope that foreign bondholders will be benefited by the change of rulers.

The ex-Khedive is going to sell off his dinnerware. He has one gold service worth two million dollars, and thirteen silver services which altogether aggregate two millions and thirteen hundred thousand. He will still have a service in carved ruolz for one hundred persons, and another in rose crystal, to stock his cottage home.

The London Missionary Society has Received a telegram from Aden announcing that Dr. Mullins, formerly the foreign secretary of that society, died July 10th. Dr. Mullins, who spent an ordinary lifetime as a laborious, successful, and honored missionary in India, was called to Britain by the London Missionary Society to manage its affairs, and when its new mission to Central Africa was sent forth, he insisted on going there in person to decide on the spot what was best to be done. This eminent man died of the climate or the fatigues of the journey.

Mr. Dodgshun, another member of the same mission, is also reported dead. He had arrived at Ujiji and died there. A brief telegram, giving no details, reports the sad loss.

Ouida, the Celebrated English Novelist, has recently received a medal from the Paris Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals in recognition of her energetic protests against the practice of vivisection. The evil she has wrought to the human family by her writings is in deplorable contrast with her efforts for the good of animals. Her novels are more injurious in their tone and influence than any literary works of this century.

British Trouble in India.—Advices from Mandalay state that the situation in Burmah is again very critical. King Thebaw claims sovereignty over Eastern Karrenee, which the British have repeatedly recognized as independent. The Viceroy will demand prompt withdrawal of King Thebaw, and will declare war if refused. It is rumored that the British Resident has already quitted Mandalay.

"General" Booth's Salvation Army in England, regarding which we gave some information two or three weeks ago, is thus spoken of by a London preacher:

"Being in Nottingham last week, I attended the services held by some of the Army's lieutenants, and was surprised and rejoiced to see the mass of people of the lowest class congregated together, listening and drinking in 'the good-news' as preached. About 200 stayed to the after-meeting, and the sight I then witnessed I shall never forget. Big, stalwart men, drunkards, and tramps, came forward upon a general invitation being given, and pleaded to be prayed for and spoken to."

Narrow-minded persons, godly and ungodly, allow themselves to be shocked because the methods of these evangelists are vulgar, and because the Gospel is preached by them without reverence. Want of reverence, we should remember, is only one of many blemishes that may disfigure the Christian character, and is not worse than avarice or selfishness, or indolence, or pride, or envy, or hatred, or quarrelsomeness. The point to be noticed about the "Salvation Army" is that they preach Christ crucified, which is of more importance than all the refinement and good taste in the world.

The Evangelical Alliance at Basle.—The Seventh General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance began its session at the ancient city of Basle, Switzerland, on Sunday. The Daily Witness states that a large number of delegates have already arrived, and more than 1500 visitors have come to attend the session; the hotels and boarding houses are filled with delegations from all Protestant nations, and several prominent Protestant theologians have arrived from Roman Catholic countries. The session, which will continue one week in St. Martin's Cathedral, opened under the temporaty presidency of Herr Vischer Sarazin. Several delegates from the United States will deliver addresses. The proceedings began by addresses on the religious conditions of various countries; the ministry, education, press, missions, and Sunday-schools will be treated in their order. The session will end with a communion service at the cathedral, sermon to be preached by the Rev. Dr. Stockmeyer of Basle, and a brief formal farewell service for delegates will follow.

Rescue by Garibaldi's Daughter.—A Gallant act was performed recently by the daughter of the illustrious Italian patriot, a girl of twelve years of age. She was taking a sea bath at Civita Vecchia, when a young man who could not swim got out of his depth, and at his cry for help the girl swam toward him, caught him as he was sinking, and brought him safe to land.

An Ecumenical Methodist Council is Likely to be held shortly. The English Wesleyans have given their approval to the proposal, and it only remains to select time and place and programme. In an assembly where all the branches of Methodism will be represented it would be interesting to have a comparison of notes on the advantages and disadvantages of the itinerancy. There are other vital questions that ought also to find a place in the programme.

Infanticide is Still Common in India, No withstanding the efforts of a special judicial d partment created to suppress it. A missiona writes: "Only girls are murdered. The infant destroyed in the room where it is born, and the it is buried under the floor of the same room. C the thirteenth day the village priest calls, ar cooks and eats his food in the same room. This considered a burnt offering, and by this act t priest takes all the sin of the murder upon his ov soul, and the family is free from it. As soon the baby is born its mouth is filled with the mi of the shrub a selipias gigantea, and then it plastered over with mud. Respiration is impo sible. When the first girl baby is wrenched aw in this brutal manner the mother cries and moa and grieves a good deal, but after having lo two or three she gets used to it and makes resistance. After the murder and burial a burnt offering the parents again occupy t room and receive guests in it as usual." T requirement of a dowry in order to marry of daughter is the chief reason for the practice.

SIR ROWLAND HILL, K.C.B., D.C.L., F.R.S.

Birth and Parentage—Early Hardships—Character of his Father—Marriage—Old Rates of Postage—Sir Rowland Hill's Scheme—Publishes a Pamphlet on the Subject—Official Opposition—Two Thousand Petitions Presented to Parliament—The Measure Passed—Public Testimonial to Mr. Hill—Appointed Secretary to the Post-Office—Receives £2000 a Year for Life and a Grant of £20,000—The Freedom of the City of London Conferred upon Him—His Gratification at this Honor—Results of his Great Scheme—His Death.

Sir Rowland Hill was the third son of the late Mr. T. W. Hill, a school-master at Kidderminster, England. When it is remembered that he was born December 3, 1795, it will be seen that he had reached the mature age of nearly eighty-four-years at the time of his decease on August 27th, 1879.

It is noticeable that his intellectual faculties did not appear to be greatly affected by advancing years, for in the last year of his life he was able vigorously to contest the right of the managers of a new Small-pox Hospital at Hampstead, London, to build on the ground they had taken. He showed then, too, that he was as ready as ever to stand up for the vindication of public rights.

From his earliest years Rowland was brought up in the stern school of poverty, and, like Garrick, "was bred in a family whose study was to make 4d. do as much as others made 4½*d*. do." His father was a man of great intelligence, of varied but not deep knowledge, and of an eager, inquiring mind. He was as upright and as bold as he was simple-hearted. He was given to mental speculation and never weary of forming theories. His theories, however, he did not always care to test by practice, thus exhibiting a striking contrast in character to his son.

In early life Rowland had a good education, and was a youth of considerable intellectual ability—an ability which was strengthened by the studies in which he took an ardent delight. Having fewer advantages than many of the children who now attend the day schools of the country, he, nevertheless, so profited by his good father's teaching as to be able fairly to anticipate an honorable position in the public service, although, perhaps, he little dreamed of the mighty revolution he was destined to effect in the postal system of his day.

It is to be noticed that from a boy he displayed great aptitude for practical mechanics and organization. He gained some distinction as an amateur surveyor, and also framed a constitution for his father's school, which, by means of a committee elected by the whole body of scholars, proved a help in preserving discipline. Subsequently he turned his attention to printing, and was instrumental in introducing the cylindrical system, on which all rapid printing is now performed.

After living at Birmingham till he was more than thirty, he removed to the neighborhood of London, where, with the aid of one of his brothers, he established a branch school at Bruce Castle, Tottenham. But by this time his health, which had always been delicate, began to give way, and at last broke down. He had certainly tried it ever since childhood by the severest and most prolonged labor. He had often worked fifteen, sixteen, or even seventeen hours a day, and he would keep up such work as this for weeks together.

In 1827 he married Caroline, the eldest daughter of Mr. Joseph Pearson, of Graisley, near Wolverhampton. He first comes before us in connection with the public service in 1835, when he was appointed Secretary to the Commissioners for the Colonization of South Australia. Thus early, however, the great scheme with which his name will ever be connected was beginning to occupy his mind—the establishment of the tion may be said to have fairly begun, and the faculty of letter-writing was being somewhat laboriously developed. There are some in the old country who can yet remember the brilliant array of mail coaches whose nightly departure from St. Martin's-le-Grand was one of the sights of London.

Half a century ago, as we have been recently told, outside the upper classes it was regarded as a labor to write a letter, and an extravagance to send it. Postage was usually paid in cash on delivery, and it was often a question whether the receiver could or would pay for it. The rate of inland postage varied with the distance from 8 cents to 43 cents for a single folded sheet, and the smallest additional scrap enclosed made it liable to be charged as a double letter. If a charge were disputed, the only course was to open the packet in the post-office and count the sheets or slips it contained.

The system required that in every principal post-office there should be a "dark room" supplied at will with strong artificial light, in order that the letters might be "candled" like suspicious eggs, to detect whether more than one sheet was covered by the enclosure. Then came the calculation of distance, the sum was worked out, and the amount of the postage written upon the letter. This was frequently so great as to prevent the delivery of the letter at all. Country folk brought a silver spoon, or some such article, to leave with the village postmaster till the letter could be redeemed.

There were local deliveries in London and a few of the chief towns at a charge of 2d. (i.e., 4 cents), but only trivial matter was supposed to pass by the "twopenny post-bag," the name of which Thomas Moore took for the title of a set of once popular political lampoons. In ordinary households the delivery of a letter used to cause as much excitement as arises on the receipt of a telegram in the present day. Country houses depended on casual communication with the post town at irregular intervals.

Sir Walter Scott has described with his usual felicity the inquisitive prying of the local gossips into letters left for distribution at post-offices in country towns; but if the stories of that date often turn on the miscarriage of a letter, it is not to be supposed that the post-office was chargeable with all the unpunctuality, though delays were caused by circuitous wanderings of the mail-bags which would in these days be considered intolerable.

The fact is that a great part of the correspondence which was carried on among the middle classes never passed through the post-office. Nobody ever went a journey without being charged with letters written by all his neighbors to friends at the place of his destination, or on the way to it. Often it happened that these letters accumulated in the capacious pockets of the traveller's great-coat, and came to light unexpectedly long afterward! Notwithstanding these mishaps, the temptation to evade the post-office charges was irresistible, and another by-way was open to those who had access to a member of either House of Parliament. Nearly a thousand persons had the privilege of sending through the post "franks," or free letters, the number of which was at first unlimited, but had eventually been restricted to ten daily.

The scheme which Rowland Hill had in his mind was not merely to reduce the post-office tariff, and depend on the increase of custom to make good the diminution of charge. He relied also on the simplification of accounts by the prepayment of a uniform charge proportional to the weight of each packet, and not to the number of enclosures contained in it. The chief cost of the post-office is in the collection and distribution of letters, not in the carriage of it to its destination. The actual transit of each letter between London and Edinburgh, even by horse power, was ascertained to be about one ninth of a farthing, and it was thence inferred that difference of distance might fairly be disregarded.

sition of a uniform rate for a certain weigh the prepayment of letters by stamps. Thi gave rise to numerous fears, for it seem some as if the scheme would be fraught wi most injurious effects!

Mr. Hill's proposals excited little en asm; but at length the House of Commo pointed a committee upon the subject. who remembers the time has told us th general feeling was that in a period of fi depression, when the whole public reven under fifty millions, it was most unwise t fice in pursuit of visionary aims a steady of four millions, any deficiency in which replaced by taxation in some more burd form. One strong objection made to it f seat of authority was that it would set p writing too many letters, and that ther not be receiving-houses large enough to or facilities of transport ample enough to them!

However, many persons were so har the delays, the uncertainties, and the loss existing system, that they were eager to new plan a trial.

In 1839 more than two thousand petit presented to Parliament in favor of it, the following year the Penny Postage w into effect with the assistance of Mr. for this purpose received an appointme Treasury. In 1842, in consequence of of government, he was removed from on the alleged ground that his services, of which the government fully ackn were no longer required. The public, justly considered this was bad treatme 1846 he was rewarded by

Now that a new generation has gr customed to all the conveniences of postage system as matters of course cult to realize how great a debt we ov land Hill. "We have found," it ha said, "our system imitated by all t and many of the half-civilized nat earth." International postage has ing cheaper and cheaper. Mr. Elihu Burritt, who died not whose life and portrait we gave i Christian Herald, was at one life an enthusiastic advocate of ar postage. He used to apply all t ments to a cheap and uniform scal letters sent across the ocean tha Hill and those who believed wit apply in the beginning to the ser form they advocated. occurred to other men about the same time, he it was who worked the idea out and made it perfect.

After his work was done, honors came upon him. In 1860 he was made Knight Commander of the Bath, civil service division, in acknowledgment of his services at the post-office, and thus became Sir Rowland Hill; and four years later, his health having suffered seriously from the great labor he had undergone, he retired from the position he had so honorably filled, the Treasury, in a highly complimentary minute, awarding him for life his full salary of £2000 ($9700) a year. He also received a parliamentary grant of £20,000, the first Albert gold medal of the Society of Arts, and the honorary degree from Oxford of D.C.L. He was also a Fellow of the Royal Society, and of the Royal Antiquarian Society.

THE CLOSING YEARS.

From the close of the year 1865 until he peacefully breathed his last he lived in absolute seclusion, and it is probable that when, some couple of years ago, a movement was started for erecting a statue in his honor in his native town of Kidderminster, there were many who for the first time realized the fact that Rowland Hill had not altogether quitted this mortal scene.

In his villa at Hampstead, in the suburbs of London, he lived among surroundings pleasantly reminding him of the successive stages of his work and of the feeling entertained toward him by the great body of his countrymen. In a huge office desk he kept stored in various drawers, all correctly labelled, many curious specimens of the early history of the new postal régime, stamps for which the collectors of those articles would pay many times their weight in gold—to wit, proof-sheets of the early black stamps, obliterated with red, which was the idea in vogue, until a clever man of business pointed out that stamps of a faint red color, sensitive to acids and obliterated with black, would give less opening to fraud.

There were also specimens of the famous Mulready envelope, proposed to Sir Rowland Hill by his vigorous coadjutor, Sir Henry Cole, who, anxious to import art into the post-office, incited a Mr. Mulready to produce a design for envelope, on which Britannia was depicted as postmistress of the universe, with winged messengers delivering letters to expectant beings in every quarter of the globe. Skirmishing round the blank space left for the address were camels and elephants, presumably carrying the mails of the future; and a Laplander in a car driven by reindeer, all engaged in postal operations. To the despair of the artist mind this design never became current. There were difficulties as to obliteration, and in the heat of the post-office struggle the artistic element vanished.

To one interesting relic of the past the possessor attached peculiar value. It was one of the causes of the United States Revolution, found among a collection of old stamps in the vaults of the stamp office. It was a stamp for two shillings and sixpence, and was intended to be struck upon something colonial had not the late Colonel Washington intervened.

Only a few months ago the freedom of the City of London was presented to him. It was said at the time that it was one of the ordinary conditions attending the bestowal of such a compliment that the recipient of it could only be admitted a citizen within the jurisdiction of the city. In the case of Sir Rowland Hill, however, it was agreed that this condition should be dispensed with. The founder of the penny postage system, however, was more than fourscore years of age, and was infirm as well as old. A deputation, therefore, from the city went to his residence at Hampstead, and there presented him with the resolution of the Corporation, and the gold casket containing it. The front panel of the casket was made to represent the elaborate "Mulready envelope,"

In the address which Mr. Scott, the City Chamberlain, delivered on the occasion, eulogistic reference was made to Sir Rowland's services at the post-office. "We congratulate you," said the speaker; "notwithstanding the 'labor and sorrow' inevitable to the weight of eighty-three years, you have been spared to witness the complete triumph of your postal principles; to receive acknowledgments from the State and honors from your Sovereign. Detractors and obstructors you have outlived, or they only survive to swell the ranks of those who applaud. May your remaining days be consoled by the thought that your name and services can never be forgotten, and may the sunset of your life be brightened by the reflection that you have been permitted to become one of the greatest benefactors of mankind."

The old man was deeply touched by this final honor. The tears streamed down his venerable face as the gold box containing the resolution of the Court of Common Council was handed to him, and he was scarcely able to utter a word. His answer to the deputation had to be read by his son, which was as follows:

"The document you hand to me, and the casket in which it is to be enclosed, have an especial value in my eyes, and will have, I am sure, in those of my descendants. In the fulness of time, when those who can still remember the inconveniences of the former postal system shall have passed away, and the public, as years roll on, shall have forgotten, as necessarily they will, every thing connected with myself, and the reform which it has fallen to my lot to effect, my son and my son's sons will be able to point with pride to the permanent and visible token which you have this day placed in our hands, of the full and generous manner in which the Corporation of the greatest city in the world has been pleased to express its approval of my labors for the public welfare."

It is not easy to give any clear notion of

THE RESULTS OF SIR ROWLAND HILL'S GREAT SCHEME.

We can state that 106 millions of chargeable letters and newspapers were sent through the English post-office in 1839, and that 1478 millions were sent last year. But the mind cannot grasp such numbers as these. Something more is understood when we are told that in 1839 the average number of letters per head of the population of Great Britain and Ireland was three, and that last year it was thirty-two. If, however, we would rightly understand all that he did for his fellow-men, we must remember that every civilized country in the world has more or less adopted his plan; that communication has been made so certain, so rapid, and so cheap that the distant traveller, the emigrant—nay, even the exile—feels that those whom he has left behind him in his old home are in one way still very near to him.

Sir Rowland Hill has, indeed, done almost more than any other single man to bind the nations together and to make the whole world kin. Then the extent to which Sir Rowland Hill's reduction of postage has increased the communication of Gospel truth through letters and by religious papers, and thus conduced to the extension of Christ's kingdom and the salvation of souls, eternity alone will reveal.

He died at Hampstead, on Wednesday, August 27th, leaving four children—one son and three daughters. Though preserving to an extraordinary degree his intellectual acuteness and force of will, he had for some years suffered from physical weakness, and had confined himself entirely to one floor, furnished with a balcony.

He and his wife had in their childhood been play fellows together. He was in his old age never weary of owning how much he owed to the tender devotion of his wife during the years of their long and happy wedded life. She survives him, comforted and supported, we trust, in her affliction by the knowledge that her husband conferred a signal benefit on mankind, and will live in the grateful memory of his countrymen.

Sir Rowland Hill was interred in Westminster Abbey, September 5. His funeral was in accordance with his wishes, plain and unostentatious.

RELIGIOUS ADDRESS BY MR. GLADSTONE, EX-PREMIER OF ENGLAND.

ON Thursday, August 21st, upwards of 600 aged inmates of St. Pancras, Workhouse in London sat down to a sumptuous dinner, which included such delicacies as blanc-mange, vanilla and grapes, provided at the expense of Mr. H. Skoines (one of the guardians) and a number of friends.

During dinner the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone made his appearance, amid loud applause, all the inmates standing until he had been escorted to a platform, and he then dined with the paupers, a plate of meat and vegetables being served up to him from the table.

Dinner over, Mr. Gladstone rose and said: "I have been informed that all of you would be persons who either had passed, or else had nearly attained, the limit of seventy years of age. That qualification I myself am possessed of, because in about four months, if I am spared, I shall strike the clock, so to speak, for my seventieth birthday.

"I assure you, as regards daily duties, the demands upon persons in my line of life are greater than the limits of time and human strength allotted us. It is to me therefore a rare and a rich occasion to be allowed to appear before you. You may think that my lot in life has been in some respects a more fortunate lot than yours. There is one respect in which I doubt very much if any of you would altogether like to exchange with me. That is in the quantity of work I have got to do.

"But this I will say, it is very good for those who belong to the wealthier classes to be brought for a moment, and for as many moments and on as many occasions as they can, into contact with you, and to remember how entirely and absolutely we all stand upon one level in the face of One greater than ourselves. For we live in an age when many have forgotten that which He came to preach, in addition to all else that it was, besides scattering blessings over every class of the community, it was above all the Gospel of the poor; that the lot of the poor was that which He chose for Himself; that from the ranks of the poor He selected His apostles, who went forth into the world to found the most glorious kingdom ever exhibited to the eyes of men, and that from His mouth proceeded the words which showed us, in reference to temporal circumstances, that a time will come when many of the first shall be last, and many of the last first. Blessed, no doubt, shall be rich men, if they confront the many and subtle temptations of the life they have to live.

"But blessed also, as we have been told, are the poor who accept with cheerfulness the limited circumstances and conditions in which they have to pass these few fleeting years, now brought nearly to their close for me and for all of you, and who are content to look forward to the hope beyond the grave and to the brightness of the light that shines upon the further shore of the dark river of our death. I desire, at least, to say these words to you in sincerity and in truth. We all of us, no doubt, endeavor to serve our kind and to perform our duties as best we may; we are all of us sensible—none has more cause to be so than I—of many shortcomings; but yet I do assure you I would think it an act of the basest to endeavor to administer to you the slightest word of comfort unless the conviction of the truth and solidity of that word lay at the very root of my understanding and in the very bottom of my heart.

"May the recollection of this day, my friends and contemporaries, as I may call you, serve to cheer many a future day for every one of you, be a source of thankfulness for the past, and an indication that there lies for you in the future, unless it be your own unhappy fault, the hope of things brighter far than these; when your lot will be relieved from every burden laid upon you by adverse circumstances, and when you will, or may hope to be, through the merits of Him who has lived and died for us, brought into the enjoyment of a happiness that shall never again be disturbed. I heartily wish you well, one and all, now in the remainder of your lives, and in that other and more important life that is to follow."

CHRIST THE SONG.

An Evening Sermon by Dr. Talmage. Specially Reported for the "Christian Herald."

"The Lord is my strength and song, and is become my salvation."—Psalm 118 : 14.

All Creation Speaks of Christ—The Bible Full of the Theme—A Regal Word—I. Christ Ought to be the Cradle Song—ACounteracting Influence—II. Christ the Old People's Song—A Tune Remembered Seventy-five Years—"Do you Know Me?"—III. Christ the Night Song—The Night of Trouble—IV. Christ the Everlasting Song—Home Songs—Harvest Songs—Sailors' Songs—Children's Songs—Angels' Songs—The Dying Christian and the Choir—The Julian Concert in New York—Henry V. and his Army.

THE most fascinating sound for a heart properly attuned is the name of the Saviour. There is something in the morning light to suggest Him, and in the evening shadow to speak His praise. The flowers breathe Him, the stars shine Him, the cascade proclaims Him, all the voices of nature chant Him. Indeed there is not a beautiful object in the natural world but in some way may be made a type of Christ. So that if I go forth on a summer day I find a flower, and I say, Rose of Sharon, Lily of the Valley ; and when I behold a lamb on the hill-top, I will say, Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world ; and when the weather is hot, and I rest under the shadow of an overhanging crag, I will say, "Rock of ages, cleft for me !

Let me hide myself in Thee."

In the old-fashioned churches there was a sounding-board over the pulpit, so that when the voice of the preacher rose, it was immediately struck back into the hearing of the people, and the voices of all nations rising find the heavens a sounding-board beating back the name of Christ into the hearing of all the people. The heavens declare the glory of Christ.

The Bible thrills with the story of redemption. On the gloomy day of expulsion from paradise it poured the light of restoration ; it looked upon Abraham from the ram caught in the thicket ; it struck pathos into the speech of the uncouth fishermen ; it lifted Paul into the third heaven, and upon the ears of St. John it broke with a brazen trumpet, in the doxologies of the elders, and the rustling of the wings of the seraphim.

The old Greek orators, when they saw their audience listless, used to utter one word that aroused all their enthusiasm. In the midst of their oration they would sometimes cry out "Marathon," and the sound of that one word aroused all the enthusiasm of the people. Oh, you who are worn out with the cares and anxieties and sorrows and temptations of this life, I utter in your hearing a regal word that ought to arouse all your affection and all your hopes and all your aspirations. It is the name of Jesus. So loving, so kind, so patient, so sympathetic, so glorious is He that I do not wonder that the Psalmist cried out in my text, "The Lord is my song."

I. In the first place I remark to you that Christ ought to be

THE CRADLE SONG.

What your mother sang to you half a century ago is sung yet. You may have forgotten the words of the song, but it went into every fibre of your nature—that song—and you will never lose its power ; one hundred and fifty years from now, and after Old Mortality has dulled his chisel in trying to recut your name on the tombstone, your great-grandchildren will be singing the song which this afternoon you sang to your little ones.

Amid the mountains of Switzerland there is a place where, if a voice is distinctly uttered, there come back a score of echoes, and every Christian song sung in the hearing of the little ones will have a thousand echoes come back from all the gates of heaven. Oh, my friends, Christ ought to be the cradle song in all your dwellings.

Your children step out into the street. There are many temptations ; there are many evils on lips that fall into their hearing—things that will besoil the soul, and yet you cannot keep your children indoors : they must have fresh air, they must go into the street. I know of but one counteracting power—Christ the cradle song.

Gather the story of the Saviour's birth, of the Saviour's purity, of the Saviour's suffering, of the Saviour's death, of the Saviour's resurrection, of the Saviour's triumph, and sing that music into the soul of your little ones. It will be well for them living, and it will be well for them dying.

It may be that the journey of that little one may be short. It may be that Christ has his eye upon it, and he wants it in a better country, and there will be soundless footsteps in your dwelling, and fluttering pulses of the heart, and the cradle will be empty, and the nursery will be empty, and the home empty, and the world empty, and there will be a grave and a broken heart, and bitterness, and loneliness indescribable.

But that little one will surely go into the arms of Christ whether you have done your duty or not ; and will it not be pleasant to hear its lips speak the name of Christ before the moment of departure ? I never read a more beautiful record than the account I saw one day of a little child's departure. It said that the little child folded its hands, said its little prayer, turned its face to the wall, and then died. Jesus the cradle song ! Jesus the cradle song !

II. But I remark that Christ must be

THE OLD PEOPLE'S SONG.

Quick music does not please the aged. The grandchild asks for the schottische or the glee ; grandmother asks for Balerma or the Portuguese Hymn. The keys of the music-board must be solemn in their tread. Grandfather hums the little child to sleep with a song he heard fifty years ago. Some Sunday night the village church choir sang it ; the young people did not recognize it, but grandfather recognizes it, and the tears roll down his cheek as he thinks of the revival days when he heard that song, that very hymn, as the aged minister of Christ with white hair leaned over the pulpit, telling the good tidings of great joy.

On a Thanksgiving Day I had in the pulpit with me the Rev. Daniel Waldeau, who was then ninety-eight years of age. At the close of the service I gave out a hymn. The choir sang it. I said, What a pity that the audience did not know this hymn ; we should not have had a new tune for this hymn to-day, when Daniel Waldeau put his hand on my shoulder and said, This is not a new tune ; bless your heart ; I heard that seventy-five years ago.

There was a song sung to-day that touched the lips of the aged as with holy fire, and kindled a radiance of vision which our younger eyesight knows nothing about ; it was Jesus the old man's song, Jesus who fed him all his long life, Jesus who wiped away all his tears, Jesus the name by which his marriage was consecrated, and the light of whose resurrection had gilded many a grave.

Do you know me ? said a wife to an aged husband in his dying moments, his reason already departed. He responded, No, I do not know you. And the daughter said, Father, do you know me ? and he said, No, I don't know you. And the son said, Father, do you know me ? and he said, No, I don't know you. A minister of the gospel in the room said, Do you know Jesus ? The old man's face was illumined as he said. Yes, yes, I know him ! "Chiefest among ten thousand" and the one "altogether lovely."

Blessed the Bible in which the old man reads the promise, "I will never leave you nor forsake you." Blessed the staff on which the old man leans as he walks on toward the welcome of heaven. Blessed the hymn-book where the feeble eye and the faltering tongue find the song of Christ, the old man's friend.

Take the spectacles your mother used to wear : put them on you. Oh, you say, they are too old for me ; she was seventy or eighty years old. I can't help it ; take those spectacles and put them on you, and look, and look again, and you will be able to look clear back into the days of your childhood, and look forward to that land where the ankles that were stiff with age have become limber again, and the eyes restored to their sight, and the soul in eternal jubilance cries out, "This is heaven."

III. But I remark again that Christ must be

THE NIGHT SONG.

You remember Job spoke of him who giveth songs in the night (ch. 35 : 10). John Welsh, the Scotch minister, used on cold nights to have a Scotch plaid laid across his couch, and some one asked why it was. Oh, he says, sometimes in the night I cannot sleep for thinking of Christ—thinking of Christ my Saviour, and I get up and walk around the room, and I must have that plaid wrapped around me. Songs in the night, Songs in the night !

To some of you, my dear hearers, the night has come. Sickness put out one star, persecution put out another star, bereavement put out another star, financial loss put out another star, and darkness has overlapped darkness, and yet you are cheerful. Why ? It is songs in the night. There are hundreds of people in this house this very hour who can sing,

"Jesus, lover of my soul !
Let me to thy bosom fly,
While the billows near me roll,
While the tempest still is high.

"Hide me, oh ! my Saviour, hide,
Till the storms of life be past ;
Safe into the haven guide,
Oh ! receive my soul at last."

Songs in the night ! Songs in the night !

For the sick, who have no one to turn the hot pillow, and no one to pour out the soothing anodyne, and no one to put the ice upon the burning temple, and no one to utter cheerful words : yet songs in the night !

For the poor, who shiver in the winter's cold, and swelter on the summer's day, and tremble because rent day has come and they cannot pay, and come back from the baker and stand in the midst of their families saying, Oh, my God! flour has gone up : yet songs in the night, songs in the night !

For the wounded soldiers in the field hospital. No one to bathe the gun-shot fracture, no one to brush the flies from the fresh wounds, no one to take a message to the friends at home : yet songs in the night ! "Oh," said a dying soldier during our last war, "tell my mother that last night there was not a cloud between me and Jesus." Songs in the night ! songs in the night ! The shadows of this evening have gathered, and crowds of people go down the streets : they pour into the sanctuaries : the lights have been lit. We must have a sermon, they say, we must have three or four hymns, we must have three or four prayers. If I asked, What shall be the subject of the sermon, the theme of the song, the burden of the prayer ? there would thousands of voices come out this moment right in the midst of this assemblage, coming up from the young and the old, from the rich and from the poor, from the prospered and the troubled—thousands of voices saying, Jesus, Jesus : let it be Jesus.

We sing His birth : of the barn that sheltered Him, of the mother who nursed Him, of the angels who shook light from the midnight hills. We sing of His ministry, of the tears he wiped away from the eyes of the orphan, of the damsel who bound up in the sunlight her locks that had fallen down over her flushed cheek as she anointed the feet of Christ ; the lad with the five loaves and the few fishes who became sutler for a whole army.

We sing of His sorrow, his stone-bruised feet, his aching brow, his broken heart, his mountain loneliness, the ocean torrent that heaved up cares with its wrathful foam, omnipotent surge ; the sun dashed out ; the dead aroused, rushing out of their sepulchres to see what was the matter.

We sing His resurrection, the clouds gathering in pillared splendor on all sides as the shining retinues of angels cry, Upward, hoist the gates; and the shining ones that stand around the entrances of pearl respond, Who is it? Who is the King of glory? And the retinues in front of Christ shout, Upward, the Lord of Hosts, He is the King of glory; hoist the gates! Oh, is there a more appropriate song for a Sabbath night than a Saviour's birth, a Saviour's ministry, a Saviour's death, a Saviour's resurrection, a Saviour's triumph? Songs in the night!

IV. But I remark once more that Christ is to be, and must be,

THE EVERLASTING SONG.

You know there are some songs more appropriate for the home circle. They turn the thoughts in upon ourselves, they arouse some very touching memories; they are home songs: and the song of heaven is to be a home song. It will be all the sweeter because our friends who sang with us in the home on earth will sing with us in the home in heaven.

> " Jerusalem, my happy home,
> Name ever dear to me;
> When shall my labors have an end
> In joy, and peace, and thee?"

You know we have on earth a harvest song, when the grain comes into the garner. The gladdest time on the farm is when the crops come in, and they sing a harvest song. And heaven will be a harvest song. We went forth sowing in tears, and we shall reap in joy. Here they go up the heavenly hills, here they come down, and as they pass each other what is the salutation? " Harvest home! Harvest home!"

On earth we have sailors' songs. I do not know any thing more fascinating than the songs of the sailors far out at sea. I have lain awake hour after hour at night to listen to them as they were pulling the rope and singing their sailor songs. And heaven is to be a song like that. Oh, how long we were voyagers on the beach, the guns of distress sounding across the sea! It seemed to us as if we must go down n the cyclone: but God had mercy upon our souls: we came into the harbor of peace, and we will land in heaven. Shall we not have a sailors' song? Song of the mighty hosts that showed us the way, song of the pilot who came on board, song of the eternal shore on which we shall land!

> " Into the harbor of heaven now we glide,
> We're home at last, home at last.
> Softly we drift on its bright silver tide,
> We're home at last, home at last.
> Glory to God, all our dangers are o'er,
> Glory to God on the glorified shore,
> Glory to God we will shout evermore,
> We're home at last, home at last."

Then we have on earth the children's song. ou know the vast majority of our race die in fancy. I have seen it estimated that there are ixteen thousand millions of children in heaven. They come up; these once played in the streets f Babylon and Thebes; these were thrown to e crocodiles or into the fire; these came up out f royal families; and these were foundlings on e common. Children all over heaven, children the temples, children in the towers, children the battlements.

You have sometimes heard a thousand chilren in an earthly concert, and when their oices rose your soul was overwhelmed with usic; but who can tell the harmony when the xteen thousand million children now in heaven ill be augmented by ten times that number, d the doxologies shall rise before the throne? h, the harmony of that day!

It will be an angels' song. In that great song the redeemed will be the mightiest singers of rth, and the mightiest players upon instruents. Lowell Mason will be there; Thomas astings will be there; Haydn and Mozart ill be there; the forty thousand singers at the

I was reading of a Christian woman who was dying in a parsonage near an old church in the country, and every Saturday night it was the custom of the choir to come to that old church and rehearse for the next day's service. When the Christian woman was about to depart for the better country she said, How sweetly the choir rehearses to-night! Oh, said some one, it is not Saturday night, the choir is not rehearsing to-night. "Yes," she says, "they are." I hear them distinctly; I never heard them sing so sweetly as they sing now." It was the choir, but not the choir of that old village church; it was the choir of the redeemed before the throne.

Oh, the question surges over my soul to-night, and it must come to every heart in this audience. Shall we join in that heavenly anthem? If we do not sing the praise of Christ on earth we shall never sing it in heaven. A man who has never touched a cornet or an organ might as well come to some great oratorio expecting to play beautiful and astounding music as a soul go up among the redeemed on earth never having made any preparation for the great anthem.

Oh, I remember—I can never forget it—that great concert which Julian gave in the Crystal Palace in New York; it was the first large concert I had ever attended. I remember how Julian stood before that great multitude of singers and players upon instruments, and I remember how he controlled that great harmony with his hand and with his foot. I was overwhelmed with the singing.

But oh! the vaster occasion, when they shall come from the East, and from the West, and from the North, and from the South, a great multitude that no man can number, and shall enter into the heavenly temple, rank above rank, host beyond host, gallery above gallery, and that great audience will rise to sing, and Jesus will conduct the harmony with His wounded hand and His wounded foot; like the voice of many waters," like the voice of mighty thunderings, " Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive blessing, riches, and honor, and glory and power, world without end, amen." Oh, if I hear no other sweet sounds, may I hear that! If I join no other assembly, may I join that!

And so to-night I invite you all to have Christ in your home as a cradle song, Christ in the home the old man's song, Christ in the home as a song in the night, that you may have Christ at last for your eternal song.

HENRY V. AND HIS ARMY.

It is said that Henry V. went out to battle, and won a very great victory, and after he had won the victory he wanted to record his sense of dependence on God, and his appreciation of Divine interference in behalf of himself and the country, and so he asked the chaplain to read a Psalm of David to the army; and when the chaplain came to the passage, "Not unto us, O Lord, but unto thy name, be the praise," Henry V. got off his horse, and all the cavalry dismounted, and the entire army fell on their faces, crying, "Not unto us, not unto us, O Lord, but unto thy name, be the glory." Oh, if to-night the armies of salvation might get the victory for your soul, it would be no honor to me, and no honor to you; but all the church of God on earth, and all the hosts of heaven, might well come down on their faces to celebrate the victories of the grace which has redeemed you, crying, "Not unto us, not unto us, O Lord, but unto thy name, be the glory."

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

Mr. Lemaire relieved by a Suggestion of the Chief—He Goes Home to Break the News to his Family—The Officers Search Percival's Lodgings—The Police Search Percival's Rooms—Jemmy Mehaffy Resists them—Sergeant Holder Explains Matters—Jemmy Suggests the Search is made for the Queen's Thimble—He is Seized and Handcuffed.

Mr, Lemaire's distress at the apparently conclusive proof of Percival's complicity with the conspirators was painful to witness. It was necessary for the warrant to be signed, and under other circumstances the chief would have asked Mr. Lemaire to sign it as a matter of course. But despite his position and duties, which naturally tended to blunt the finer feelings of his nature, he was a kind-hearted man, reluctant to cause unnecessary pain to any one. He therefore cast about to find some plan of sparing Mr. Lemaire the pain of signing the warrant. Mr. Lemaire meanwhile stood regarding him with a face full of anxiety and distress.

But then, again, he reflected, his daughter, his fair and gentle and beloved Lucie, was tenderly and devotedly attached to this erring young man; and would not his arrest, he asked himself, fill her with anguish, and perhaps be fatal to her life? At this thought poor Mr. Lemaire's whole heart overflowed with trouble, and, quite unmanned, he nearly broke forth into a bitter cry in Mr. Katcham's private office.

"I see how it is, my dear sir," said Mr. Katcham to him, "and I do not wonder in the least at your emotion. I should feel, my dear sir, just as you do under similar circumstances; but let me relieve you, my dear sir, so far as I can, from a painful duty. Upon the plea of pressing private business, which in truth, my dear sir, you can fairly urge—for this deplorable affair must be communicated to your household, and it ought to be done by no one but yourself, for you will know, my dear sir, how best to do it, a stranger would not so carefully seek to spare the feelings of your family as yourself—I say, my dear sir, on the plea of pressing private business, leave your office, and I myself will do what is necessary to get the warrant for Mr. Montaigne's apprehension put into due form."

Mr. Lemaire, thanking his Castle friend for his kind suggestion, consented to act upon it; for, though a good deal incensed against Percival, he shrank from furthering the arrest of one toward whom he had so long borne trustful and even affectionate relations. He therefore returned to his office, and, to their great surprise, at such a time of unbroken attendance upon official duties, told his clerks that he was going home, and would not return that day. He then took his departure from the Castle Square, and left the coast clear for Mr. Katcham's proposed fulfilment of "his lack of service."

He usually rode to his home in Rathgar, but this afternoon he elected to walk. He was reluctant to carry to his dear ones, and especially to the one who was most concerned, the sad news of which he was the bearer. He desired also to get full time to think out the best method of breaking his distressing tidings. With a slow, sad step, therefore, he made his way along the streets—perhaps as pitiable a man that hour as any in Dublin city.

We shall leave him to pursue his dilatory and downcast walk, while we accompany the constables—there are three of them—who, with a search-warrant, are now at the small iron gate which forms the entrance of the garden before Percival's lodgings. Having knocked at the door of Mrs. Spencer's house, when it was opened they were informed by the servant-maid that Mr. Montaigne was not at home, but that the mistress was, and they asked to see her. That lady, taking the police, who were not in with one of her blandest smiles, and invited them into the front sitting-room. When they entered, she thought it a little strange that two of the gentlemen carefully closed the door, and stood with their backs close to it, while the third advanced toward her, holding in his hand some document.

This conduct somewhat alarmed her, not that she supposed she was about to be arrested for debt, for, whether it was in obedience to the apostle's injunction or not, "she owed no man any thing." For a moment an apprehension crossed her mind that the three seeming gentlemen were in reality burglars, who had planned "to chloroform her" and then rob both her person and the premises; but this alarming suspicion was quickly dispelled by Sergeant Holder's address: "Don't be alarmed, ma'am, but we are police, and this is a warrant authorizing us to search your house, ma'am."

Mrs. Spencer, however, was very much alarmed; she even almost fainted with fright, and had to lean upon a chair to keep herself from falling. She was about to protest hysterically, and demand in her sharpest tones the cause of such a contemplated outrage, when Sergeant Holder interrupted her by saying, in the calm and self-possessed way in which he had begun the interview, "If I mistake not, ma'am, there is a Mr. Percival Montaigne who has rooms in your house?" Mrs. Spencer assented, and with a certain amount of relief, since the inquiry, at all events, removed the venue from herself personally.

"Hah, I thought so!" continued Mr. Holder. "Then me and my brother policemen here, ma'am"—and he pointed to them—"have not been in any error in coming, ma'am, to your house?" "But what in the world," asked Mrs. Spencer, "can you want with Mr. Montaigne? One of the nicest, quietest, and I will say the most well-behaved, gentlemen I have ever known in all my existence, and I've been for years now keeping lodgers. You don't mean to say he has committed murder, do you?"

"No, not quite that," replied Mr. Holder; "at least, ma'am, not just yet; but, you now, ma'am, these is bad violent times, when there is many, ma'am, that talks of doing that same on a large scale, ma'am, especially on policemen. And Mr. Montaigne, I'm sorry to say, ma'am, has connected himself with such desperate and unloyal men—in fact, we have reason to know, ma'am, he is a foremost man among them, and has somewhere in concealment in your house seditious and treasonous documents."

"Goodness gracious!" exclaimed Mrs. Spencer, "what a dreadful thing! And only think of it, I have known nothing in the world about it—nothing whatever about it, I assure you," repeated Mrs. Spencer, in order to free herself completely from any suspicion of complicity. "I would not, sir"—she deemed it politic to be civil—"allow such a thing in my house—no, indeed, sir—if I had known it;" and she concluded her statement with a very positively pronounced "never." And then, changing completely her good opinion of Percival, and that in a moment, she added, "He's a wicked man to put any respectable widow lady's house to such a vile use. You have my full permission, gentlemen to search his rooms how and when you will, and I will myself, indeed, take you, gentlemen, to them, and at once, I assure you," she said. "Finally, you have my best wishes that you may get possession of every improper paper, however hidden away, that may serve the object of your search, and, I will say, the ends of justice."

So saying, she very willingly led the way up to the second floor, where Percival's rooms were, opened the door of his sitting-room, and then, retiring downstairs, left the police in possession.

They at once commenced a diligent search over the whole apartment—the locks of cabinet, escritoire, tea-caddy, writing-desk, and every opened and read. The seats of the chairs and of the sofa, all the pillows and cushions, were ripped up and industriously examined. What would Mrs. Spencer have said had she witnessed it? The carpet was taken up, and all the boards of the floor were tried, whether any of them would spring, and reveal beneath a hidden recess; all the panelling and all the mouldings round the room were scrutinized, if peradventure they might in some part have been cunningly arranged to cover a secret shelf for the safe hiding of dangerous papers.

All Percival's books—and he had a large collection—were taken down from the bookcase, to make sure that no volume in front concealed a treasonous writing behind it. More than this, each one of the books was tested as to whether it was not, under the guise of a book, in reality a wooden case to hold documents. Even Percival's violin was taken from where it hung, and its interior looked into, as was his flute and his accordion. The whole business of search was done most actively, systematically, and exhaustively, and the policemen proved themselves perfect masters at their work, but the fruits of their toil were provokingly inadequate.

The only things discovered that could at all be deemed compromising were the music and words of three or four "Young Ireland" patriotic songs, and half a dozen copies of the Nation newspaper, especially the one which contained the ode entitled "The Men of Ninety-eight," whose terse and ringing words, as is well known, were written by a Fellow of Trinity College, and produced quite a sensation at the time it appeared over the kingdom.

"Well, well," said Mr. Holder to his colleagues as he looked at the miserable haul which at so much toil they had made, "comrades, this is but a mighty poor return for our labor. 'Pon my word, it isn't at all fair. This Montaigne, so far, has been too much for us, and he's plainly a right clever fellow, for none but such, you know, could baffle such knowing boys as us. But no matter: the bedroom is to be searched yet, and, if I mistake not, that'll prove a more profitable and sport-giving cover."

Having thus spoken, he turned the handle of the bedroom door, which opened from the sitting-room, and was about to enter, but he had reckoned without his host.

Jemmy Mehaffy stood a little back from the doorway, with a horse-pistol in his hand, and boldly declared he would guard the room from all intrusion. The policeman drew suddenly back, while Jemmy thus addressed him: "Aye, be me conshence, ye do right. Stand back, you vagabones, or shure! I'll put the contints o' this in yees!" exclaimed Jemmy, in a white heat of anger. "I've been watchin' yees this half hour, ye rogues," he continued. "Yis, takin' yer diminshuns through the keyhole, and ye may thank yerselves that I didn't shoot the whole three o' yees in wan slap wid me pistol."

How Jemmy Mehaffy could have done this—namely, shot at once three men in different parts of the room with a one-barrelled pistol, and that not loaded—he did not explain; but his words very much excited Sergeant Holder and his comrades, for, drawing from their pockets their revolvers, they pointed them at Jemmy, told him sternly they were Her Majesty's police, and were only doing their duty, and that if he did not put down his weapon they would shoot him without mercy. "Yees poliss!" cried Jemmy, with a contemptuous grin. "Tell that, me buccos, to the horse marines—p'raps they'll believe ye—but yer not goin' to get Jemmy Mehaffy to do it. Where's yer polissman's dhress, I want to know?" (He had only a knowledge of the country constabulary.) "Where's yer caps, yer belts, yer bayonets, yer poudher boxes, and yer guns? Shure any wan knows, barrin' a fool, that he's no polissman that's widout them. Polissman indeed!—that's a good wan! Yees are nothin' but robbers and vagabones, as I've said afore; and, purshuin' to the bit will wan o' purshuin' to yees!—purty well as it is to the masther's things—a-cuttin' and a-rippin' and a-tarin' o' thim to thatthers—bad loock to yees! It's hard I found it to keep me sweet revinge fur it from off yees: and if ye'll take my advice yee'll make yerselves scarce, and be off out o' that wid yees, and in no time. Whatever is the world comin' to at all at all, that a gintleman's house can in the blaze o' daylight be thrated in this way; and that, too, of all places, in sweet Dublin City? Oh, wid all their brag about it, if yees had only thried down whar I cum from what yees have done here, ye villains, yees wouldn't have got a second chance, I can till yees, o' doin' it, for by this time ye'd have had daylight, with good lead, let into every wan o' yees. Be off with yees out o' that, I till yees, or yee'll thry me timper beyant the barin'."

THE DAY-STAR SOON TO ARISE.

By Rev. A. Faussett.

Light the Universal Need—Christ the Day-star to His people—The Day-star appears before the Sun—Indications of the Nearness of the Day-star—Infidelity, Lawlessness, Spiritualism—The Espousals on High—The Bride's Descent with her Lord—The Conflict—The Deliverance of Jerusalem—Christ as the Sun to the Jews—Antitypes of the Passover and Feast of Weeks already Fulfilled—The Feast of Tabernacles yet to Receive its Antitype—Anecdote of Mr. Simeon—The Jews as Missionaries—The Blessed Exchange.

It is said of an eminent scholar of bygone days that on his death-bed his last cry was "Light! more light!" The same, I feel sure, is the cry of every believing heart—"More light!" But we differ from the worldly philosophers in this they know not where to seek their light, but we know to whom to go—to the Father of lights with whom there is no variableness, and with whom there is no shadow of turning.

Peter gives us this exhortation: "Ye do wel to take heed to the more sure word of prophecy as a light shining in a dark place until the da dawn and the Day-star arise in your hearts. The Day-star will arise to those who are not lik the foolish virgins—without oil in their vessel with their lamps.

The Day-star will arise to those who are livir in earnest expectation, who are looking with ou stretched neck, as that most expressive word the Greek means, "waiting for the manifest tion of the sons of God," or, as in the origin "waiting for the apocalypse"—the taking off the veil from the people of God. The veil part has already been taken off spiritually fro the hearts of God's believing people; but t veil of sin and wickedness and sickness and s row and temptation, and the rule of the prii of the power of the air, the prince of this wor that has so long ruled in the hearts of the peo still remains, and therefore we look for the D-star.

I distinguish the Day-star, or Morning-s from the sun. This Morning-star comes bef the sun to announce, to forerun the dawn of sun; and so for those who are waiting for Chri appearing, with the oil in their vessels, as as in their lamps, He shall come as the day-s as we read in 1 Thess. 4: "We shall be cau up together with them in the clouds to meet Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with Lord."

And now, if I may presume to do so, I with all modesty, venture to suggest that, certain degree, the time of the Lord's comin the Day-star or the Morning-star for His pe is indicated to be near at hand. In 16: 13–15 the word of God is this: "And I three unclean spirits like frogs come out o mouth of the dragon, and out of the mou the beast, and out of the mouth of the prophet. For they are the spirits of devils, ing miracles, which go forth unto the kin the earth and of the whole world, to gather out of the dragon, or Satan. I venture to think that this is Infidelity in its various forms —rationalism, pantheism, atheism, scepticism, and the different "isms" which deny the Word of the living God. Satan's lie, from the first, has been to deny the Word of the living God. God's Word said, "Ye shall die;" Satan's word said, Ye shall not die."

Next, we have the spirit out of the mouth of the beast, or Antichrist, and, as I conceive, this represents the world in its alienation from and opposition to God. I take this to represent lawlessness, the tendency to which already appears in the sad and awful developments of Socialism in the present day.

And then the third unclean spirit is that which comes out of the mouth of the false prophet, or two-horned beast (Rev. 13). Observe, the false prophet does not appear until after the scarlet woman, the apostate Church of Rome, has been judged (Rev. 16). Man cannot do without a religion of some kind, and if he will not have real religion, he will have some false religion. And here I take it that the third spirit, which comes out of the mouth of the false prophet, is the false religion of Spiritualism, which is one of the most remarkable signs of these last days.

These three unclean spirits are the spirits of devils working miracles. And what will they do? Why, they will seduce the ten kings leagued under Antichrist to choose in the battle of the great day of God Almighty. But observe what is stated in Rev. 16:15, before the battle actually takes place in verse 16: "Behold, I come as a thief"—not expected by the world, but by God's believing people who are looking for the Day-star and the Morning-star. "Blessed is he that warned and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked and they see his shame." And not until after Christ has come to his believing people does the actual battle of Armageddon take place. In verse 16 he gathers them together in a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon. Therefore observe that, as the saints are first of all caught up in the air in verse 15, the espousals take place in the heavenly places, and they are to dwell and reign with Christ as the bride, according to Rev. 19. "The marriage of the Lamb is come, and His wife hath made herself ready. And to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen clean and white, for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints."

Then those glorified saints will descend with Christ as the armies of heaven to the last great conflict to inflict the decisive blow which is to settle the question, at least for a long time, between the prince of this world and the Prince of the Kingdom to whom of right the reign belonged. He comes then as the Sun of Righteousness, his people accompanying Him; according to the language of Malachi 4, "Behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble. But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing in his wings; and ye shall go forth and grow up as calves of the stall. And ye shall tread down the wicked, for they shall be ashes under the soles of your feet."

Observe the mutual reciprocity between the blessed Saviour and His people. You will notice that in Isa. 28 the Lord of Hosts is said to be a crown of glory, and for a diadem of beauty to the remnant of His people; so, correspondingly, in chapter 62, it is said of His people, Thou shalt also be a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God." And then again, as He is the Morning-star, so, when He comes, they who have turned many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever. Then, again, as is written in Psa. 2, "He shall break the people to pieces as a potter's vessel," so the same is distinctly said of them in Rev. 2.

The next consequence of Christ's coming will be that He comes to the relief of Jerusalem. It is distinctly foretold in Zech. 2, and Zech. 14, The Lord shall come and fight against the nations which war against Jerusalem;" and His return shall correspond to His ascension. "This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." The mount from which He ascended was the Mount of Olives, and it is distinctly said in Zech. 14 that the place to which He returns shall be the Mount of Olives. He comes in the air as the Morning-star to His people. He comes as the Sun of Righteousness in behalf of the Jewish people. His feet shall stand on the Mount of Olives, and the Lord shall come and all His saints with Him.

Observe that His saints come with Him when He returns to vindicate the power of His witnessing people Israel; and then, and not till then, shall be fulfilled the promise that is given in Jerem. 3:17, "Thou shalt call Jerusalem the throne of Jehovah, and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of Jehovah, to Jerusalem; neither shall they walk any more after the imagination of their evil hearts;" they shall say no more, "The ark of the covenant of the Lord." It will no longer be borne in remembrance, because there will be something better than even the ark of the covenant in which Israel of old so much gloried, for the Lord Himself shall be there.—Jehovah-Shammah.

And now another very interesting feature connected with our Lord's coming to Jerusalem, and the reign of His saints over Jerusalem, is this: Three times in Zechariah there is reference made to the feast of tabernacles. "And every one that is left of all the nations which went up against Jerusalem shall, year by year, go up to worship the King, Jehovah of Hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles."

There were three great feasts observed in Israel —the passover, the feast of weeks, and the feast of tabernacles. The passover has already had its antitype. "Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us," says St. Paul in 1 Cor. 5:7. The feast of weeks has already had its antitype in the Day of Pentecost, in Acts 2, when the Spirit was poured out from on high on the assembled disciples, and when the new law was written on their hearts.

But as to the feast of tabernacles; where is its antitype? It certainly has not been yet fulfilled. But it will be when the Lord will take His great power, and when Jerusalem shall be the throne of the Lord, and when all nations shall gather together to worship the Lord by their representatives at Jerusalem, and to keep the feast of tabernacles.

Just as Joshua kept the feast of tabernacles at the close of the successful campaign when Canaan was subdued before the people of Israel, and just as Solomon had a solemn feast of tabernacles, when all took part in it, and every man sat under his own vine and his own fig-tree, so then again there shall be a sabbatical rest, and the feast of tabernacles shall be the sealing of it. Israel shall then enter into that rest which God from the very beginning designed for them.

And then, again, the prophecy will be fulfilled. In Exod. 19 He says, "If ye will obey My voice ye shall be unto Me a kingdom of priests." And in Isa. 61:6 it is foretold, "Ye shall be named the Priests of Jehovah; men shall call you the ministers of our God." So, then, Israel in the flesh shall be the priests ministering to the nations in the flesh.

It is said of the sainted Mr. Simeon, who was one of the first among the founders of the Society for Propagating Christianity among the Jews that, when he was holding a meeting some one wrote on a piece of paper, "Mr. Simeon, how can you draw off the attention of the Christian public from eight hundred millions of heathen to fix their attention on five millions of Jews? The reply, written underneath, was, "If you first bring the five millions of Jews to Christ, then you will have five millions of missionaries to the eight hundred millions of heathens; and then will be fulfilled that prophecy which was addressed to Jerusalem, 'Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of Jehovah is risen upon thee. And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising.'"

During the millennium of a thousand years, Israel will minister in the flesh to the nations in the flesh, and Christ and the heavenly priest-kings in transfigured bodies, no longer in the flesh, shall minister to the kingdom of Israel and the nations in the flesh; and thus there will be a blessed exchange of giving and receiving. God and His Christ, Christ and His transfigured saints, king-priests, ministering to Israel; and Israel, in its turn, as king-priests, ministering to the nations of the earth. Oh, what a glorious future there is for the people of God! "Arise, shine, for thy light is come."

THE HORRORS OF YELLOW FEVER.

THE following account of the dread scourge is furnished by the correspondent of the New York Sun, who is now in Memphis, and was there also during the epidemic last year:

"I have sat by the bedside of several patients within the past few weeks, and for hours fanned their fevered brows, have heard their ravings, and have had to engage in fierce struggles with them to keep them in bed when they made frantic efforts to break loose and rush out of the houses. The peculiar yellow-fever smell pervades all things everywhere. It is recognized instantly by the expert.

"The outline of a case of fever is as follows: A chill, pains in the back, across the loins, a desire to go to bed, an increasing feeling of sickness, feeling inward heat increasing rapidly, nausea of stomach. You go to bed, have fierce fever from 72 to 98 hours, temperature ranging from 101 to 106, pulse at first high, then receding as the temperature increases, delirium, fever decreasing, sickness of stomach, black vomit, hiccoughs, suppression of urine, utter prostration, pulse down among the forties, probably a rise of fever with delirium and black vomit, again prostration, recovery of mind, and convalescence or death.

There are three stages of delirium, that which occurs when the fever rages and the temperature is at its highest, that which is caused by utter weakness from hunger, and that which is caused by suppression of urine, when the poison is absorbed. The fierce thirst is one of the peculiarities of the disease; you dream and rave of rushing waters, springs, fountains, which are in your grasp, but slip away ere you taste the cooling waters. It is the fever of Tantalus. When recovering every patient desires to buy a spring or a fountain at which forever to slake his thirst.

"Many die easily, go calmly off to sleep, hardly having strength to raise the eyelids, but too many die a horrible death. The struggle is terrible. They have to be held down in bed until the last gasp, and the scene after death is too horrible for description.

"Another peculiarity of the disease is when the patient is in a state of delirium and is prevented from getting out of bed. Often he makes a desperate effort to bite those holding him. I have a lively recollection of thus having to exert nearly all my strength to hold a yellow-fever patient in bed and keep him from biting me in the face. When he recovered reason he wept with anger at not being able to get up, but at last said: 'Hello! Is that you? Let us lie down on the pillow and go to sleep.' I was glad to do so.

"Entire families have been swept away. When the fever once enters a dwelling, it seems almost impossible for any member of the family to escape. The dirtiest people often escape, and the cleanliest are often stricken down. The fever continues to spread among both whites and colored. The latter are not so liable to take yellow fever as the former, and when they do take it their cases are lighter and their chances of recovery much greater. The large majority of the colored people who are down with fever are mulattoes. The pure blooded African is hardly ever attacked.

"The Howards supply nurses, visit the sick daily and nightly, send them physicians, medicine, and supplies, and bury the dead when necessary. For all this they are not paid a dollar. It is a labor of humanity."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Political Indications are Considered by Republicans to be of an encouraging character. The remarkably thorough and vigorous canvass of the State of Maine brought out all the voters who staid at home last year, but did not make any perceptible impression on the Greenback forces, or if it did, the Greenbackers made up for all losses by reaching a stratum of voters so far below the surface of ordinary political action as not to be affected even by the excitement of a Presidential campaign. The returns indicate that the Republicans have 18 members of the Senate to 13 of the Opposition, and 89 members of the House to 62 of the Opposition. The majority does not suffice to elect for Governor Mr. Davis, the Republican candidate, by the popular vote, but the overwhelming majority in the Legislature gives the Republican party the State.

The State Convention of the Democrats of New York, at Syracuse, September 11th, renominated all of the present State officers, with the exception of the Lieutenant-Governor. Clarkson N. Potter was nominated unanimously for that place. The Convention was the scene of stormy and exciting incidents. On one occasion John C. Jacobs was nominated for Governor by acclamation. but he declined the honor. After a long period of confusion a ballot for a nomination for Governor began. Augustus Schell then announced that the Tammany delegates would withdraw from the Convention. They did so at once amid disorder. The Convention was able to go on thereafter and complete its work. It adjourned sine die late in the evening. The platform deals mainly with State issues, but repeats the cry of "fraud," advocates hard money, and upholds the Confederate programme in Congress.

The Tammany delegates, meeting in another place, nominated Comptroller Kelly for Governor. Both the Tilden party and Tammany seem to prefer imperilling the interests of the Democratic party to making mutual concessions.

A satisfactory feature of the meetings of the Conventions was, that government officials were conspicuous by their absence, and were in their places at the Custom-House, etc., on the days of meeting. The President's notification has thus been observed more fully than was expected, and is a hopeful sign of the times. The goverment employés in England retain their places on good behavior, whether Conservatives or Liberals are in office, and they serve either party with equal fidelity. The policy works well, and the national interests are promoted by having men of experience in the various posts. The President's action is a step in this direction, and is considered by many far-seeing politicians as a wise policy.

A Hopeful Speech Full of Cheerful Anticipations of reviving business and better times generally, was made September 9th, by President Hayes, at Greenfield, Ohio, where the people gathered at the railway station to welcome him. He dwelt upon the reviving prosperity of the country, the increase of business in all parts of it, and the better times in the years to come which are fairly promised for capitalists, business men, farmers, and workingmen. The speech accorded in its views with the commercial opinion of the day. It is well to know good times when they come, and not to keep on, from sheer habit, complaining and grumbling.

For himself Mr. Hayes said : "In the position which I hold, it has been my desire to try to do something to bring it about that the government should be administered upon business principles and by business methods. I can see plainly, as you do, and as all my friendly and unfriendly critics do, the shortcomings and failures, and perhaps I see them more clearly than others do ; but my steady purpose has been to go forward in the right direction. Though the movement has been slow, still I can say to my friends in Cincinnati I have honestly tried to keep my face in the right direction."

The President's hopeful prognostications are confirmed by the fact that four steamers, which arrived September 10th, brought in freight the enormous amount of $4,900,000 in gold bars and coin. This is the largest arrival in one day on record, and is sent in payment of breadstuffs, provisions, and dairy products exported from this country. The exports continue large, and the shipments from the West are excessive both in wheat and corn.

Spotted Fever in Georgia.—A Telegram to the New York Herald from Atlanta, Ga., dated September 10th, says : "The reports of the fatal fever raging in the counties of Polk, Paulding, and Harralson have not been overdrawn. Within a few days over fifty men have died in an exclusively rural population. The victims are mostly young men. Those attacked with it suffer horribly, the tongue burning black and swelling to double its size, and blood oozing from the mouth and ears. Immediately after death the bodies become spotted and discolored. physician of high standing reports that of tw nine cases under his treatment not one r ered. The course of the disease is run in days. The greatest alarm and distress pre and the disease is steadily spreading. P cians here think it is the spotted typhus fe Suffering in Memphis Still Continues unabated force. A newspaper corresponde the city writes : "The lack of funds to su the sick in the city and feed the poor in camps is beginning to be felt ; hence retre ment in all expenses has been begun. Sh the fever continue until November, and cient assistance be not received, we will much suffering. National and State quaran bind us hand and foot. We have no trade, are helpless. We are bound, like Prometh to be devoured by fever and starvation. A l amount of suffering prevails among the p No one outside of Memphis has any idea of condition of affairs beneath the crust. Ar patrols employed by the State Board of He invest the city. None are permitted to go none are permitted to come in."

The Howard Association supply depot cl September 10th for want of funds. The H ards will continue issuing medicines and st lants, but not provisions, for the sick. Mr. Gould recently forwarded the large donatio $5000 to the Howard fund, but more mon urgently needed, as their expenses are $100 day.

The German Beer-Sellers of Newark, N made a big demonstration on September against the righteous law which forbids drin saloons to be opened on Sunday, and which recently been enforced in that city. A very procession was formed, and numerous mot designs, and figures were borne on banners by other means. One motto was, "The Peo choice—Lager on Ice." A large wagon contai a miniature saloon, with figures of a grou men drinking beer round a table, was inscr "The Temperance Hall of the Future." Ano wagon with a Drunkard's Home would have a good companion picture.

Another Philanthropic Bequest.—Mr. Tho Wilson, a very old and wealthy Baltimor died on September 10th, leaving an estat $2,000,000. The kind old man had been many years president of an association for h ing the poor, and in this position had see much suffering among little children that he termined to provide a comfortable sanitar for them. He has accordingly left an endowm of $500,000 for a "Thomas Wilson Sanitar for the Children of the Sick Poor," and th stitution will shortly be established by the t tees. Mr. Wilson also left $100,000 to be as a fuel-saving fund, his purpose being to vote the interest to the purchase of imm quantities of coal when it is cheapest, this to be sold to poor families at cost. It wa dealing in coal that Mr. Wilson made mos his fortune.

A Complainant Caught by His Own Evide —On September 10th a boy was placed in dock of the Tombs Police Court, New Y charged by a man living in Chatham Street having stolen goods from his house. The picions of the presiding judge were excite the prosecutor's evidence, and he ordered house searched. It was then found that he one of the most disreputable dens in the and that boys and young men were lured t and induced to spend large sums of mon drink and profligacy. The man has been for trial. The keepers of these wretched pl where opportunities are afforded for vic practices, are guilty of moral murder. Ma young man has lost his character in this wo and his soul in eternity, through the allurem of these villanous resorts.

The Tenement House Danger has not exaggerated. A report at Police Headquar New York, notifies that eight cases of typ fever have occurred in a house in Park St which is occupied by fifty families.

The Looked-for Arrival of the Rev. James A. Spurgeon, brother of the famous preacher, nd his associate in the pastorate of the Metro-olitan Tabernacle, took place on Tuesday even-ng, September 9. Mr. Spurgeon was a passenger y the Cunard steamer Algeria. He looked well nd in excellent spirits, and he was accompanied y Mrs. Spurgeon, who, as our readers know, is daughter of Sir John Burgoyne. After going r a couple of days to Washington, Mr. Spur-eon returned to New York on Saturday, and reached on the Sabbath at Washington Avenue aptist Church, Brooklyn, in the morning, and the Broadway Tabernacle (Dr. Taylor's) in the ening. A report of one of the sermons appears this number of the CHRISTIAN HERALD. r. Spurgeon will not be in this city again till ctober 10th, a day or two before he takes his eparture for England. A life and portrait of m were given in the CHRISTIAN HERALD for ugust 21st.

Mr. Sankey's Bible.—At Mr. Sawyer's Ser-ce at Cooper Union, September 7th, Mr. Sankey ng several hymns, and addressed the audience hich thronged the building. He said: "The eat question is how every person here can be ved. Jesus told Nicodemus how he might be ved. The part in my Bible here that tells the ory is nearly worn in two. I've used it a good al to tell poor souls what was Jesus' way; for many ways are talked of now. In these two rses ('Ye must be born again,' and 'He et believeth on the Son hath everlasting life') ohn 3: 7, 16), there is Gospel enough to save ery one in this house. The unbeliever says e Spirit cannot save. The faithful say it can. ose who looked up at the serpent are saved. ose who did not, perish.

"Are you ready to surrender your own opinion d take Jesus at His word? Do not discredit e message because you have no regard for the essenger. Many think it foolishness to be-ve Christ's words of promise. It was foolish-ss to me once. I used to sit and listen, and y that faith in Jesus Christ to save was fool-ness." Mr. Sankey related a story of a kindly w England man who purchased and freed a utiful slave girl in old slavery days. After e had received her freedom she entreated her iverer to let her be his servant. Her grati-le made her anxious to do more out of love n she had done in the days of her bondage to owner. That is the way the Christian feels vards his Redeemer.

Further Progress in Moral Reformation has n made. The Wallingford Community, an shoot of the Oneida Commune, has followed parent society in declaring that its members ll observe the civil laws in their conjugal re-ions. So far, good. It is to be hoped the re-ming tendency will soon reach Utah.

The New York Daily Witness Calls Upon Its nds to aid it in getting up a circulation of hundred thousand. That is not too large the only daily religious paper in the greatest ristian country. The publishers are entitled the good-will and support of the entire re-ous community, and we heartily wish their ectation may be realized.

Fatal Accident in the Alps.—Miss Abigail ight, of this city, a prominent member of St. ul's M. E. Church, was killed on Monday, gust 25th, while travelling in the Alps. The ident is described in a private letter from the . Dr. Tiffany, with whose family the lady nt abroad. We are permitted, through the dness of a friend, to make the following ex-t from the letter:

We started on Monday morning to make the to this place [Martigny,] my own family ty occupying two carriages, and Mr. Louns-y and his family—including Miss Wright—h their courier occupying another. All went l and safely in ascending the mountain to the otel Noir,' where we dined. The descent n the Forchaz is very precipitous, being a zig-but smooth road, with sharp turns. Soon r leaving the summit, the Lounsbury carriage ig in advance, Grace Tiffany [the doctor's second daughter] changed places, leaving our carriage, with Miss Calkins, the companion of Miss Wright, and so was in the Lounsbury coach.

"At a sharp turn the first carriage, with the horses and occupants, went over the embankment, which at this place fortunately was not very high—not more than four or five feet—but all were thrown out. Mr. and Mrs. Lounsbury escaped without scratch or hurt, and Grace was only scratched a little, but Miss Abby Wright suffered what afterward was found to be a fracture of the spinal column. She was at once removed to the roadside, and help was obtained from some peasants, who constructed a litter and brought her down to this place in about three and a half hours. She was placed on a bed, and medical aid summoned from Lausanne—the best physician and surgeon in this country. She was paralyzed in her lower limbs, but the doctors said at first that she might live several days. In the afternoon she grew very rapidly worse, and died at 9.30 last night."

By events like this the Holy Ghost is ever reminding men that they "know not what shall be on the morrow." Miss Wright was sixty-seven years of age. It is a matter for thankfulness to know that in the interval between her injury and her death, she distinctly acknowledged her trust in the Saviour.

The Sick Children's Mission in New York, which during the months of July and August did so much to mitigate the suffering then existing among the poor sick children of the tenements, has been closed for the season. During the fall and winter food and medical aid will be furnished, free of charge, to the poor children attending the industrial schools of the Children's Aid Society.

Two Young Girls were Saved from a Life of shame last week through the thoughtful action of a hackman. They were fifteen years of age, and had run away from respectable and well-to-do parents in Trenton, N. J., and come to New York. At the Pavonia Ferry they were hailed by a hackman, whom they took into their confidence. They said that they desired to be driven to an infamous resort, well known in being the grave of many a young girl's honor. The hackman was paid for the drive, and he went away, but his conscience smote him, and he went to the Twenty-ninth Precinct Station House and told Acting Captain Keating what he had done. A detective hurried to the house, found the girls, and took them to Matron Webb, at Police Headquarters. Inspector Murray telegraphed for their parents, and their fathers reclaimed them. Their minds had been poisoned by reading trashy stories and by bad companions, but they told Matron Webb that their experience in this city had shown them their folly. The hackman was thus the means under God of saving them from the consequences of their undutifulness.

The Death of a Young Jewish Heir.—Leonard Montefiore, son of Nathaniel Montefiore, of London, England, grand-nephew of Sir Moses Montefiore, and nephew of the late Sir Anthony Rothschild, died, September 11th, of acute rheumatism, at the Ocean House, Newport. He was only twenty-seven years of age. He had a literary turn of mind, and contributed to the Nineteenth Century and other reviews, principally articles upon religious affairs. He came to this country last July, and, after an extended tour, seeking renewed health and studying our institutions, he went to Newport, where his disease assumed a severe form. He was the principal heir of Sir Moses Montefiore, whose philanthropic labors for the benefit of his race are well known.

The Cost of Sinful Pleasure.—A Young Man of wealth in Brooklyn came over to New York last week for the purpose of indulging in the pleasures of sin. He stayed two days, and squandered one thousand dollars. He has learned that vice is ruinous to the pocket as well as to the soul, and that sinful companions "hunt for the precious life."

SATAN'S PUNCTUALITY, POWER, AND PURPOSE.

A Short Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"Then cometh the devil, and taketh away the word out of their hearts, lest they should believe and be saved."—LUKE 8: 12.

The Purpose of Hearing Frustrated—Hearts Like a Trodden Pathway—Satan at Work in a Congregation—I. His Punctuality always Prompt—Indirect Influence—Black Crows or White Doves—II. His Power—His Abilities Naturally Superior—Improved by Long Practice—A Hard Heart does the Devil's Work for Him—III. His Purpose—He is a Sound Theologian—Why He Dreads Faith—His Presence Defiling.

IT is a great comfort that such multitudes are willing to hear the Word of God. Even though many should turn out to be as the rock, the wayside, or the thorny ground, still it is a cheering circumstance that the seed can be sown broadcast over so large an acreage. Yet the thoughts excited by the sight of a vast congregation are not all pleasurable; the question most naturally arises, What will come of all this preaching and hearing? Will the heavenly seed produce a harvest, or fall on barren soil?

The thoughtful Christian, in considering this question, takes into consideration the condition of the persons addressed, and remembers that many are unprepared for the gospel. So far from being like a field furrowed to receive the seed, they are like a trodden pathway. They hear the gospel, and so far we are hopeful of them, but they have no idea of allowing it to enter their inmost souls. The ground of their hearts is too much occupied already; other feet will tread there and speedily obliterate the sower's footprints; and as for the good seed, it may lie where it falls: entrance into the inner man it can have none.

Nor is this all; the anxious observer remembers that there is yet another difficulty: the arch-enemy of God and man is opposed to the salvation of souls, and therefore he is present with destructive power wherever the seed of the Word is being sown. It is of this we shall now speak—the activity of Satan during the preaching of the gospel. He is out of sight, but we may not allow him to be out of mind: he does all the more mischief if men sleep; let us watchfully turn our eyes toward him, and prove that we are not ignorant of his devices.

Our divine Lord in the words before us reminded his hearers of the devil's punctuality—"then cometh the devil;" of his power—"and taketh away the word out of their hearts;" and of his purpose, which is the prevention of saving faith—"lest they should believe and be saved." At this time, when special services are being held, it may be well to bring these points clearly forward that all may be warned against the wicked one, and so by the grace of God his designs may be frustrated.

I. First observe the evil one's

PUNCTUALITY.

No sooner does the seed fall than the fowls devour it. Our text says "then," that is, there and then, "cometh the devil." Mark renders it, "Satan cometh immediately." Whoever else may loiter, Satan never does. No sooner does a camel fall dead in the wilderness than the vultures appear. Not a bird was visible, nor did it seem possible that there could be one within a radius of many miles, yet speedily there are specks in the sky, and soon the devourers are gorging themselves with flesh: even thus do the spirits of evil scent their prey from afar, and hasten to their destroying work.

The lapse of time might give opportunity for thought, and thought might lead to repentance, and therefore the enemy hurries to prevent the hearer from considering the truth he has heard. When the gospel has somewhat affected the hearers, so that in some slight degree it is in their hearts, then swifter than the flight of the eagle is the haste of the devil to take the word out of their hearts. A little delay might put the case beyond satanic power, hence the promptitude of diabolic activity. O that we were half as quick and active in the service of our Lord, one half as prompt to seize every opportunity for blessing the souls of men!

No doubt Satan acts at times directly upon the thoughts of men. He personally suggested to Judas the selling of his Master, and many another black insinuation has he cast into men's minds. Like the foul vulture which constantly feasted itself upon the vitals of Prometheus, so does the devil tear away the good thoughts which would be the life of a man's soul. Insatiably malicious, he cannot endure that a single divine truth should bless the heart.

Fearful blasphemies, lewd imaginations, gross unbeliefs, or vain frivolities, the devil casts into the mind like infernal bombshells to destroy any new-born thought which looks toward Christ and salvation. At one time he fascinates the mind, and anon he terrifies it, his one aim being to distract the man's thoughts from the gospel, and prevent its lodgment in the conscience and heart.

As Satan cannot be everywhere present at one time, he frequently does his evil work by his servants, sending the inferior spirits to act as fowls in devouring the seed, and these again employ various agents. With great cunning are the common incidents of life used in the evil business, so that even by things indifferent in themselves the purposes of the adversary are brought about. The preacher has some speciality in his manner, utterance, or appearance, and this becomes the bird which devours the seed; the hearer is so taken up with a trifling oddity in the minister that he forgets the truth which was spoken. An anecdote was related, an illustration employed, or a word used which awakened a memory in the hearer's breast, and away went the word out of his heart to make room for mere vanity.

Or if the sermon was preserved to its close, it then encountered a fresh peril. A lost umbrella, an extra pressure in the aisle, a foolish jest overheard in the crowd, or the absurd dress of an unknown person, may any one of them answer the devil's purpose and snatch away the word. Little does it signify whether the seed is devoured by black crows or white doves, by great fowls or little sparrows: if it does not abide in the heart it cannot bring forth fruit, and hence the devil arranges that somehow he will take away the seed at once. If he never visits a place of worship at any other time, he will be sure to be there when a revival has begun—"then cometh the devil." He lets many a pulpit alone, but when an earnest man begins preaching, "Satan cometh immediately."

II. Secondly we will now for a moment notice his POWER.

"And taketh away the word out of their hearts." It is not said that he tries to do it, but that he actually does so. He sees, he comes, and he conquers. The word is there, and the devil takes it away as easily as a bird removes a seed from the wayside. Alas, what a sway has the evil one over the human mind, and how ineffectual is the preacher's work, unless a divine power is put forth with it.

Perhaps from the striking manner in which it was stated, a little of the truth abides in the memory, but the enemy takes it quite out of the heart; and so the main part, the all-important part, of our work is undone. We may be foolish enough to aim at the head only, but he who is crafty beyond all craft deals with the heart. Who will may win the intellect; if Satan can keep the affections he is quite content.

To the man's heart the good seed is lost, the fowls have devoured it; it has become to him a nullity, having no power over him, no life in him. Not a trace is left, any more than there would be a mark remaining of seed cast on the wayside after the birds had taken it away, so effectual is the work of the prince of the power of the air. When Satan thinks it worth his while to come, and come immediately, he means business, and he takes care that his errand shall not fail.

His power is partly derived from his natural sagacity. Fallen as he now is, he was once an angel of light, and his superlative faculties, though perverted, defiled, and dimmed by the blighting influence of sin, are still vastly superior to those of the human beings upon whom he tries his arts. He is more than a match for preacher and hearer united if the Holy Spirit be not there to baffle him.

He has also acquired fresh cunning by long practice in his accursed business. He knows the human heart better than any one, except its Maker; for thousands of years he has studied the anatomy of our nature, and is conversant with our weaker points. We are all young and inexperienced compared with this ancient tempter, all narrow in our views and limited in our experience compared with this serpent, who is more subtle than all the beasts of the field; what wonder that he takes away the word which is sown in hard hearts.

Moreover, he derives his chief power from the man's condition of soul: it is easy for birds to pick up seed which lies exposed on a trodden path. If the soil had been good and the seed had entered it, he would have had far greater difficulty, he might even have been foiled; but a hard heart does the devil's work for him in great measure; he need not use violence or craft; there lies the unreceived word upon the surface of the soul, and he takes it away.

The power of the evil one largely springs from our own evil. Let us pray the Lord to renew the heart that the testimony of Jesus may be accepted heartily, and may never be taken away. Great is the need for such prayer. Our adversary is no imaginary being; his existence is real, his presence constant, his power immense, his activity indefatigable. Lord, match him, and overmatch him. Drive away this foulest of fowls, break up the soil of the soul, and let Thy truth truly live and graciously grow within us.

III. Our short sermon closes with the third point, which is

THE DEVIL'S PURPOSE.

He is a sound theologian, and knows that salvation is by believing in the Lord Jesus; and hence he fears above all things lest men should "believe and be saved." The substance of the gospel lies in those few words, "believe and be saved," and in proportion as Satan hates that gospel we ought to prize it. He is not so much afraid of works as of faith. If he can lead men to work, or feel, or do any thing in the place of believing, he is content; but it is believing that he dreads, because God has coupled it with being saved. Every hearer should know this, and be instructed thereby to turn all his attention to the point which the devil considers to be worthy of his whole activity. If the destroyer labors to prevent the heart's believing, the wise will have their wits about them, and regard faith as the one thing needful.

"Lest they should believe and be saved" Satan takes away the word out of their hearts. Here also is wisdom,—wisdom hidden within the enemy's cunning. If the gospel remains in contact with the heart its tendency is to produce faith. The seed abiding in the soil springs up and brings forth fruit, and so will the gospel display its living power if it dwells within the man, and therefore the devil hastens to take it away.

The Word of God is the sword of the Spirit, and the devil does not like to see it lie near the sinner for fear it should wound him. He dreads the influence of truth upon the conscience, and if he cannot prevent a man's hearing it he labors to prevent his meditating upon it. "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God;" to obliterate that which has been heard is the Satanic method of preventing faith. Here, again, is a practical word for the ear of prudence—let us keep the gospel as much as possible near the mind of the unconverted, let us sow and sow again, if haply some grain may take root. Countrymen were wont in planting certain seeds to put in "one for the worm, and one for the crow, and then a third which would surely grow," and we must do the like.

In the book of Jeremiah the Lord describes His own action thus: "I spoke unto you rising up early and speaking, but ye heard not; and I called, but ye answered not." Surely, if the Lord Himself has thus continued to speak to an unanswering race we need not murmur if much of our preaching should appear to be in vain. There is life in the seed of the gospel, and it will grow if it can be got into the soil of the heart; let us therefore have faith in it, and never dream of obtaining a crop except by the old-fashioned way of sowing good seed. The devil evidently hates the word; let us then keep to it, and sow it everywhere.

Reader or hearer, you have often heard the gospel: have you heard it in vain? Then the devil has had more to do with you than you have dreamed. Is the thought a pleasant one? The presence of the devil is defiling and degrading, and he has been hovering over you as the birds over the high-road, and lighting upon yo to steal away the Word. Think of this.

Fellowship with the Father and with his So Jesus Christ you are missing by your unbelie and instead thereof you are having fellowshi with satan. Is not this horrible? Instead the Holy Ghost dwelling in you as he dwells i all believers, the prince of darkness is makin you his resort, coming and going at his pleasu into your mind.

You remember Jacob's dream of a ladder, a angels ascending and descending from himself heaven; your life-experience may be set forth another ladder which descends into the da abyss, and up and down its rounds foul spir come and go to yourself! Does not this star you? The Lord grant it may. Do you des a change? May the Holy Spirit turn your he into good ground, and then shall the seed of vine grace grow in you, and produce faith in Lord Jesus.

A BROKEN BARGAIN.

In the course of an address in Exeter H London, the following anecdote was related the Rev. W. M. Hay Aitken, the eminent e gelical preacher:

"I remember in the parish where I spent of my boyhood and early youth, which was remote part of Cornwall, there was a yo miner, a mere boy of fourteen, brought knowledge of the truth, and he knew there not a single person in his family who woul oppose and persecute him, and we said o another, 'Ah! John's father was a less, drunken, worldly, good-for-nothing and John's great sorrow was about his fa and he prayed for him day by day.

"It happened one Saturday afternoon th father was digging in a field on the hillsid he said, 'John, I want you to give me a with this bit of a fence which I am making the field.'

SIGNS OF THE CRISIS.

ev. R. Hamilton, Melbourne, Australia.

ions—Gospel Preaching—A Falling Away
Franco-Prussian War—The Napoleonic
sty, etc.

s inquire what the Scriptures say of the the second advent. Our Saviour has given a great variety of signs, to put us on our against the deceitfulness of sin and the ing pursuits of the world, to excite desire pectation, and to stimulate watchfulness nstant readiness.

ng the predicted signs are famines, earth-, wars, and pestilences, and "Immediate- the tribulation of those days shall the darkened, and the moon shall not give ht, and the stars shall fall from heaven, e powers of the heavens shall be shaken. hen shall appear the sign of the Son of n heaven; and then shall all the tribes of rth mourn; and they shall see the Son of oming in the clouds of heaven with power reat glory. And He shall send His angels great sound of a trumpet, and they shall r together His elect from the four winds, one end of heaven to the other."

ll be noticed that Christ does not furnish hadow of ground for the thought that the ised thousand years' reign of holiness, peace, oy would be a prophetic foretoken of His nal appearing in glory. The Millennium is r given as a sign of Christ's second advent. sign of a very distinct character which our gives of His near advent is the preaching e Gospel among all the kingdoms of the earth. is Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached l the world, for a witness unto all nations, then shall the end come." Let it be ob- ed, we are not taught to look for the conver- of all mankind before the end, but simply preaching of the Gospel for a witness.

sus also tells us that the love of many shall cold, because of abounding iniquity—that e should be a ripening of the wicked for gment, and a ripening of the righteous for y, as set forth in the parable of the tares, as in the harvest, when there has been a ultaneous preparation both of useless weeds of precious grain for the sickle of the har- t—that there should be a plentiful crop of e doctrine before the great crisis—and that there should be a widespread prevalence of selfish gratification, sensual practice, and carnal security.

Then the Apostles give us their signs. The second advent, as they teach, is to be looked for after a falling away to a great extent from the truth in the Christian Church—in connection with the wasting away toward utter destruction of the anti-Christian dominion of Babylon, the great city that reigned over the kings of the earth or European nations, that was clothed in scarlet, and was drunk with the blood of the saints—where there is a manifestation of individual and social wickedness in a pre-eminent degree—in the midst of eager worldly pursuit, licentious habits, and devotedness to pleasure—during the manifestations of a reckless skepticism, a demoniacal infidelity, and a daring blasphemy.

Moreover, the appearing of the great God, even our Saviour Jesus Christ, is to be expected after the predicted vials of judgment have been poured out, one after another, like the plagues in Egypt—after the seven, or rather the eight, heads of the great Roman dominion have successively appeared and disappeared—and in close connection with monster preparations for war, and the battle of the great day of God Almighty.

Now let us look to THE FULFILMENT OF THE SIGNS. We can take only a cursory glance.

Were it not that there is some dreadful nightmare of spiritual darkness, worldliness, and unbelief in reference to the nearness of the second advent resting on professing Christians—were it not that, like the disciples in the garden who slept for sorrow, the followers of Christ in our time have fallen into slumber—the whole church would be roused to stand on the tip-toe of the highest expectation and watchfulness for the Saviour's appearing in glory.

The writings of wild romance are not to be compared with the recent traces of the finger of Providence on the wall of the great city that has tyrannized over the nations, and is red with martyrs' blood. On the eve of the great consummation "the ten horns of the beast were to hate the whore, and make her desolate and naked, and eat her flesh, and burn her with fire."

In fulfilment of this clear and distinct prediction, let it be noticed that there has not been seen such a state of things as that which now exists in Europe since the rise of the anti-Christian confederacy thirteen centuries ago. The entire number of the kingdoms of the prophetic earth have not only withdrawn their support from the great ecclesiastical system of Rome, but have lent the weight of their political influence to effect its degradation and ruin.

Not a single scheme that has for its object the recovery of the lost ground of ancient Romanism now ever succeeds. A most signal illustration of this has been furnished in the defeat of the French in the Franco-Prussian war of 1870; and the siege, downfall, and partial conflagration of Paris may be regarded as probably the first great act in the drama of Babylon's destruction.

Another aspect of the mighty tragedy which is being acted in our day in connection with the speedy appearing of Christ is presented to view by John, in the Revelation. In immediate connection with the description of the fall and burning of Babylon the Great and the coming of Christ, John pointedly mentions that there were to be seven kings, or heads of power, in the dominion of Rome, viewed politically. Not only so, but there should be an eighth belonging to the seventh head. At the time John wrote five of these heads had appeared and passed away.

The sixth was in existence while he lived, viz., the emperorship. When the seventh arose, it should continue a short space, implying, evidently, that the sixth should survive a long time. After the seventh had come and gone there was to be a peculiar feature marking the great empire. It was to be "the beast that was, and is not, and yet is."

In fulfilment of this most significant prophecy, the emperorship, or sixth head of the Roman civil dominion, of John's time continued till the first Napoleon. Bonaparte was the seventh head, and the short space of eleven years sufficed for his reign. Immediately after his fall came the mysterious interval when "the beast was not." The French monarchy was restored, and during its continuance there was no head of the real imperial dominion.

Soon the eighth head, which was of the seventh, appeared in the person of Napoleon the Third. He constituted himself a successor of the Cæsars, like his uncle, with Paris as the metropolis of the great empire, Rome having been degraded to second rank. After a brief reign the eighth head has passed away into political "perdition," thus fulfilling the prophecy.

Another sign which is in the course of fulfilment at present is the manifestation of the "three unclean spirits like frogs, which are going forth to the kings of the earth, and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of the great day of God Almighty." On this point, the monster standing armies of the present day, the extremely precarious basis on which the peace of the world rests, speak for themselves.

Another mark of the nearness of the coming of Jesus is the present outpouring of the Spirit, and the widespread revival movement which has begun. Considering the remarkable character and rapid progress of the great awakening which is now going on, we cannot help remembering the prophecy of Joel about the "pouring out of the Spirit on all flesh." Then, in immediate connection with this general reviving of the Church throughout the world, we are told, "The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come."

Let us, then, my dear friends, in consideration of all these things, "lift up our heads, for the day of our redemption draweth nigh."

A SOLDIER'S BIBLE.

A BULGARIAN Christian Soldier in the late war, which resulted in the partial liberation of the Bulgarian people, being a Protestant and accustomed to read his Bible daily, when he entered the army took the precious volume with him. It was not a small pocket Bible, for there is none such in the Bulgarian language, but a large, heavy book. It increased the burden which he had to carry to no inconsiderable extent, and he thus became the object of the jeers and the contempt of his comrades. But he would still cling to his Bible. Sometimes he was obliged to ask his associates for a piece of bread, and they would reply, "If you are foolish enough to carry about with you that great book, then we might as well let you starve."

During the bloody fight near Eski Zaghra, a Russian colonel, finding it necessary to dismount in order to engage in some particularly delicate and dangerous service, gave his horse into the hand of this young Bulgarian to hold till his return. While he was thus holding the horse, the rout occurred, and the Russian army, together with the Bulgarians who could get away, began to crowd into the road leading up the passes of the Balkans. The rout became so complete that no one thought of any thing but his personal safety.

The Circassians, who, according to their custom, had kept themselves at a safe distance from the fight, now came upon the helpless fugitives, cutting down all they met. The colonel returned to the place where he had left his horse, but with little expectation of finding it. What was his surprise as he saw his horse still held by the young soldier into whose hands he had committed it! He stood alone at the post of duty. The officer, as he attempted to tell him what he thought of such a brave and noble act of devotion, burst into tears. He now mounted his horse and took up the soldier behind him, and so the two went on together, and at last together made their escape. The officer wrote to his superior, commending his young hero to favorable consideration. He was rewarded with a medal and was given the immediate command of those who had jeered at him for reading his Bible.

DAVID'S STRENGTH

A Sermon by the Rev. James A. Spurgeon, Preached on Sunday Morning, September 14, in Washington Avenue Baptist Church, Brooklyn.

Lesson, PSALM 23.

THE EXPOSITION.

IT is not known at what period of David's life this Psalm was written, and it has been supposed by some that he wrote it when a shepherd-boy feeding his flocks. But I rather think it must have been when he was David the aged, and the memory of God's goodness to him through his life filled his heart.

"The Lord is my Shepherd." That He is a shepherd is manifest to us all; but the point is that He is my shepherd, my guide, my protector, the one to whom I look for all my needed supplies, so that I can say emphatically the Lord is my Shepherd. Not mine to the exclusion of others, as if they had no part in Him; but mine by personal application, by personal acceptance of His promises.

If the Lord is my Shepherd, then it clearly follows that "I shall not want." With such a Shepherd, no real want can be felt by the flock. Fancied wants may be felt, we may wish for things that would prove a curse rather than a blessing, but no true want can be experienced.

"He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: He leadeth me beside the still waters." Here is the twofold aspect of the Christian life: it is restfulness, and it is progress. He maketh me to lie down and He leadeth me. We want both these. Life needs rest. I hope you know what it is to have a religion that gives you that needed rest. Perpetually wandering to and fro is the state of the ungodly, but he that believeth has entered into rest.

I remember visiting the sick-bed of a Christian lately, and he said, "I have got a fresh view of that Twenty-third Psalm since I have been sick. He has made me to lie down in pain and weariness; but it has been in green pastures all the while. I have been feeding and learning every hour. I can truly say it is good for me that I have been afflicted. He hath made me to lie down in green pastures."

Then He leadeth me beside the still waters. That is progress. Our life is a battle, a worry, but the still waters are ever near us. The road to glory is not travelled in a Pullman car. It is a hard and a rough journey. How pleasant it is then, after the whirl and bustle, to go beside something that is still. God give us that peace in our worship to-day.

"He restoreth my soul." For David knew that, like a sheep, he had wandered. But there is One whose duty it is to restore the soul. He that watches over His flock will not allow one of them to be lost. Just as the natural frame must have its time of recruiting, so the soul must have its period for restoration. Do you not wind up your watches every day? Your hand must do it, the watch cannot. So must His hand restore the soul; no other power can do that work. He restoreth my soul for His name's sake.

He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness. In the paths—not in the path. The Christian walks in many ways, but they should be all holy ways. He walks in the path of business, that should be that must be a holy path. I do not believe with those who say business is business and religion is religion. That is no fit business for a Christian that is not a holy business and consecrated by his religion.

He walks in the path of pleasure; that too must be a path of holiness, What should you think of that sheep who said, "Now I am going to have a nice piece of pleasure away from my shepherd." If he saw a ripe piece of carrion on which the vultures were feeding, and he went and joined them, it would be a feast contrary to the sheep's nature. So is unholy pleasure a mode of enjoyment contrary to the nature of the renewed soul.

He walks in the path of home life. That too must be a path of holiness. And there is a path that no eye hath seen, the solitude of his own spirit, in which alone, with his God, he is led by Him. And in all these paths God will lead His child, and they all should be, they all must be, paths of righteousness.

"The valley of the shadow of death." Oh! how many have refreshed themselves in passing along that shelving bank of their lives! It seems to me John Bunyan had entered into the spirit of the Psalmist when he wrote the "Pilgrim's Progress." You remember he places the valley of the shadow of death long before the passage of Jordan. Long before you pass hence and be no more seen, you will tread the valley of the shadow of death. You stand at the bedside of some dear one, and as his spirit wings its flight from the body, you will feel that the shadow of death has passed over you. Or God may take you out into the wilderness of trouble, of trial, of bereavement, and speak to you there. But whatever the trial, however deep the shadow, there is never an absent God. Thou art with me.

"Thou preparest a table before me." What a sumptuous feast if the hand of God prepares it! It will be a feast with Jesus; and would you! not rather feast with Jesus than with any earthly potentate? You may feast with Him, even though your repast be but a crust in a humble cottage; and remember, he who feasts with Jesus feasts with God.

"Thou anointest my head with oil." That is the symbol of gladness; the symbol of consecration; the symbol of service. God make us faithful to it even unto death.

My cup runneth over. There is abundance. But let there be no waste. If it runs over in earthly goods, think of the poor. If in Christian knowledge and experience, teach the young. Let it be your rule always, your constant motto, to think of others.

"Goodness and mercy shall follow me," you will want them both, and both are promised you, both are supplied you in all fullness and plenitude.

"I will dwell in the house of the Lord." There was no temple of the Lord then, no sacred house, but David had solved that difficulty. He had made his house the Lord's house, and there he walked with Him.

THE SERMON.

"But David encouraged himself in the Lord his God."—I SAMUEL 30: 6.

Some people view the Bible as if it contained the truth, but was not the truth; that therefore it must be sifted so that the truth may be extracted from it. Now I hold that the Bible is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

The truth is not given there in the form of a system, but it is all given in the various parts. It is our privilege and duty to put these together to make a system. You have perhaps seen a man at work with precious stones. He takes one stone and another stone and fits them one to another until he has made them into a beautiful mosaic. So the passages concerning faith, repentance, prayer, and the other duties and graces are scattered through the word of God, and ours it is to take them and place them together until we have the whole mind of the Spirit.

But there are here and there passages which seem at a single stroke to place before us our duty in a crisis; to show us how we ought to bear ourselves under given circumstances. Such a passage is the one before us.

You know the surroundings of David had been away with his warrior

the Philistines had forced Achish to s disappointed that he had not been a there. While they had been away, t a source of encouragement to him.

As he had gone out at the head of his followers, he had felt himself every inch a man. But now his spirit is crushed; he too is weak with weeping. His energy and his prowess have been dissolved in tears, and in himself is there no sense of strength. By the necessities of the case he is driven to the only refuge left—he is driven to the Lord his God.

The world would call it shameful to turn to a friend, only when there is no other resource, to go to him after every other helper had failed. But God is long-suffering and a never-failing helper. As Matthew Henry, the commentator, has said, "Man's extremity is God's opportunity." The Prodigal Son stayed in the far-off country as long as his money held out, as long as he had friends, as long as the husks that the swine did eat sufficed for him. But when all failed, he said, "I will arise and go to my father." The father did not refuse to receive him because he had tried all other resources before he came home. He saw him afar off, and met him with open arms, and rejoiced over and welcomed him.

That is the way God treats His children. Do I speak to any who are driven to extremity to-day? who are saying "Whither shall I flee?" Flee there, to the God-man Christ Jesus. He will help and succor you; ye who have done so in the past will perhaps come to like periods of extremity in the future. Faith becomes weak, hope becomes dim, and gloomy doubts arise. David said, "I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul; we think we shall never hold out to the end. When these doubts and fears arise, then is the time when we should, like David, encourage ourselves in the Lord our God.

III. How abundantly David's course was justified in

HIS EXPERIENCE IN THE FUTURE!

David recovered all that the Amalekites had carried away. "There was nothing lacking to them, neither small nor great, neither sons nor daughters, neither spoil nor any thing that they had taken to them; David recovered all."

So shall it be with you; according to your faith will it be unto you. Has man ever sought His face in vain, or been straitened in the Most High? I have alluded to the past history of David and to your own past history, and you know the deliverances He has wrought for you as He did for David. That God, your God, is the same to-day. He is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. As yet you have only seen a sample of His power. Whatever you are putting your trust in God for, be sure it will be granted you.

If there is any thing in your business which troubles you, take it to God. If there is any thing in your family that causes you anxiety, go with it to God. And certainly if in your soul's life there is aught which is not right with Him, go to His mercy-seat and there encourage yourself in Him. If there is any thing connected with the Lord's service which hangs heavily on your soul, go there. Why should you bear your burden alone? You remember when the grapes were brought from Eschol they placed them on a pole and two bore them on their shoulders. Go then to Him and you will find encouragement in the Lord your God.

God can work through any means—the jawbone of an ass or the ram's horn, but usually He works by fitting means. He takes a brave man to do a brave man's work, but what will He do through the instrumentality of a man who goes about with downcast countenance and his hands hanging down? Let not your service be the service of weaklings. Be brave; encourage your selves in the Lord your God, and you will go on from strength to strength.

Then notice further still how speedily David's deliverance came. He had just been weeping, his goods gone, his dear ones captives, his tried soldiers in mutiny. A few days after, where was he?

On the third day after his trial, "Behold, a man came out of the camp from Saul, with his clothes rent, and earth upon his head: and so it was when he came to David, that he fell to the earth and did obeisance." He had come to bring intelligence of Saul's death, and to salute David as king. And soon after came others who anointed David king over all Israel. So in a few days this exiled chieftain, bereft of all he had, and in danger of death by stoning, found himself king over God's chosen people.

So shall your deliverance be full and complete if you put your trust in the Lord your God. Faith brings to us every blessing this side the grave, and every glory the other side. Ours it is to have, first grace and then glory. The faith that trusts God for the present is the faith that saves through eternity.

Let me ask you, do you know any thing of this faith? Do you know what it is to confide yourself and all you have to the custody of another. I ask you to give yourselves this day unreservedly to God.

How long do you halt between two opinions? I can understand the position of that man who says, "It is all a myth" I do not believe in it. It is a mere dream." He is mistaken, but he is at least logical. But I cannot understand the man who says, "I do believe it; I believe there is a hell of which I am in danger; I believe there is a heaven to which I may gain a welcome," and yet who goes on living carelessly and unreconciled to God. This halting between two opinions is insanity.

If there is a hell, and you fear you will fall into it, can you sleep in your beds and know that your sleep may have no awakening in this world? If there be a heaven, can you rest until you have realized your title to it? There is nothing else to be done till you have done that. Business? That is your business. I can understand the man who says, "I love the pleasures of this life, and I do not believe there is any other." But the halting man I cannot understand.

And to you who have known His love, who have experienced His power; who have treasured up in your memories the recollection of deliverances wrought for you in the past, I say, trust Him to-day. And now, and in the future, at all times, under all circumstances, encourage yourselves in the Lord your God. Amen and amen.

"SOMETHING THAT WON'T DIE."

THE first pet Clara had was a canary, which would eat out of her hand and perch on her shoulder; and when it sang she used to declare the canary was telling her how much it loved her. But one day, when the canary was flying about the room, the cat came in, and made a spring at it, and there was an end of the poor bird. Clara cried piteously, and was only comforted by the gift of another pet. This was a little lamb, and she liked it better than the canary. It learned to follow her wherever she went like a dog, and many were the games they had together on the lawn or in the field. And, after all, a lamb was nicer than a bird, because it could be hugged and caressed.

But alas! the lamb too came to a sad end. One day a dog got into the meadow where it was feeding and worried it to death. At this loss the poor girl cried as if her heart would break. "Father," she said, "can't you give me something to love that won't die?" He took her on his knee, and said, "Yes, dear child, there is something that you can love that will not die." "Oh!" she cried, "then do give it me—please give it me now, father." "It is God's gift, not mine, to you and to me and to everybody," replied her father. "He has given us His dear Son the Lord Jesus Christ, and He came down to live a little child on this earth, that He might know how a little child feels, and then to die a cruel death, in order that you and I might not die, but might go to live with him in heaven. And all this because He loves us, and because He wants us to love Him in return. He wants the love even of a little child like you. Let Him have it, and then you will have something to love that will not die."

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

"FORSOOK ALL AND FOLLOWED HIM."—LUKE 5 : 11.

No dog would go mad that summer in Ashley even to please a learned man ; no opportunity occurred of testing the power of the balsam as a preventive of hydrophobia.

One morning Edith entered the philosopher's study with a smile which had in it something of triumph. She held in her hand her little blue phial of the antidote.

"Uncle, I have made my first experiment," she said in a cheerful tone, "and it has been a complete success."

Mr. Vernon half rose from his seat, and turned toward his niece with a look of eager inquiry. "A mad dog at last !" exclaimed he.

"Nay, nothing so formidable," was Edith's reply ; "you may think the incident trifling, but it has given pleasure to me. Some ten minutes ago I heard a child crying piteously not far from our gate.

"I heard it too," interrupted Vernon, who had been disturbed and worried by the noise. "The brat screamed as if some one were murdering it. I thought of ringing for Alec to make the little wretch stop its howling, or yell farther off from my gate. But what were you going to tell me about it ?"

Edith went on with her story. "I ran out to see what ailed the poor child. I found a fine boy, scarce two years old, who had been badly stung on the neck by a wasp. Tears rolled fast down his rosy cheeks, and his mother was vainly trying to quiet his cries."

"And so you came to the rescue ?" said Mr. Vernon

"I thought of your wonderful balsam. I said to myself, 'What will cure the bite of a serpent may cure pain caused by a sting.' My blue phial was speedily brought, and a few drops from it rubbed on the poor inflamed little neck ; and before the tears were dry on the rosy cheeks of the child, he was smiling and laughing, perfectly happy, in the arms of his mother !"

"Well done, fair doctress !" said Mr. Vernon, amused at Edith's miniature experiment, and by no means displeased at the practical use to which she had put his balsam. The philosopher then turned to pursue his interrupted studies, but Edith did not at once leave the room. Leaning upon the back of her uncle's chair, she took what she felt to be this favorable opportunity of pressing on his notice the object dear to her heart.

"You should have seen the mother's pleasure," said the lady; "and I could not help thinking what that mother's feelings would have been had your precious balsam been the means of saving her little one, not only from pain but from death !

"Uncle, at this very moment mothers are childless because—because when their darlings were shrieking from the agony caused by snakebites, those who would have given their very lives to save theirs knew not that a cure exists for the evil."

"I am aware of that," said Mr. Vernon shortly.

"And can you bear to delay giving to sufferers the remedy which can relieve agony at once ?" cried Edith, who would as soon have stood quietly to look on while a cradle was burning in which lay a shrieking babe.

"The pear, I repeat, is not ripe," said the philosopher, peevishly. "I never saw pertinacity like yours, Edith Temple. You are always harping on one string, always hammering on one nail. I must surely be the better judge as to the right time for plucking and enjoying the fruit of my labors."

Mr. Vernon was equally deaf to his niece's oft-repeated suggestion that he would at least write down the recipe for his balsam, keep it, if he would, in his strong-box, but not run the risk of his precious secret being lost from not being confided to any second person.

Her uncle told Edith, with a smile, that his own brain was the best strong box, and his will a capital padlock, of which he would trust the key to no one. So fearful was Mr. Vernon that the secret of his mixture should be found out, that (excepting Edith's phial) there was but a single bottle filled with the precious balsam, and this bottle was kept by the discoverer on the highest shelf of his bookcase, to be reached only by making use of the steps. No person but himself, Edith, and Stewart ever entered the room, save when the philosopher showed to visitors the contents of his Museum. The door of the study was always carefully locked at night by Mr. Vernon himself.

Thus week after week passed away, and no attempt had been made to procure a patent for the antidote. It pained Edith whenever she passed the box in which the cobras lay coiled, to think how many precious lives were being sacrificed by delay. She thought of the fabled talisman which would lose its power of curing if for one day it were suffered to lie unused. Was not the knowledge which might save many lives a precious talent committed to Mr. Vernon by God, and could it be lawful to bury that talent even for a few days ?

It almost seemed to the impatient Edith as if her uncle's interest in the balsam had become less strong than at first. This was not actually the case ; but during the waiting time, which his niece thought so needlessly long, the active mind of the philosopher was turned towards other matters.

He purposed to begin a grand work, a book on revealed religion, which should startle the world as much as would the antidote itself. But the effects of the balsam and of the book were likely to be in direct contrast one to the other. The balsam was to counteract poison in the body, the book was to instil the venom of infidelity into the reader's soul.

The antidote was a new discovery, and Mr. Vernon flattered himself that the arguments brought forward in his book would also be perfectly novel ; but in this the sceptic was greatly mistaken.

The old arguments with which the Bible has been attacked, age after age, have been reproduced again and again, and refuted again and again, just as the waves which dash against a rock which they cannot overthrow or even shake are formed not of newly-created water, but of drops which in cloud, or rain, or sea, have existed from the beginning.

The Bible stands in these last days unshaken and immovable in spite of all that has been done by Satan and his emissaries against it. Books have been written against it sufficient in number to make the largest library the world has ever seen sufficient in the learning employed in making them to have annihilated the cleverest imposture ever palmed on man, yet there stands the little book still, the same precious treasure to young and old, rich and poor, the voice of God to man. Its hold on the affections of those who know its contents best is undisturbed, its power to move and mould the hearts and lives of men is quick and strong as of old, and the gates of hell have not prevailed against it. Its very existence after the assaults it has survived demonstrates the divinity of its origin.

Edith one morning joined her uncle in the study, by his request, at an earlier hour than usual.

The philosopher was seated in his large arm-chair, absorbed in thought ; his blue spectacles as usual concealed his eyes, which were becoming weaker and weaker, so that he only now read large print, and seldom touched a pen.

But a great deal of writing work was now to be done, if one might judge by the quires—nay, reams—of blue-wove paper, and the quarter of a hundred of new quill pens which lay on the table. Alec Stewart had been ordered that morning to fill the ink-bottle afresh.

"That's for the use of Miss Temple," the old butler had said to himself, as he slowly poured out the black fluid. "How fast my master makes her empty the ink-bottle—he works her as if she were a paid clerk. She's a hard-working lady if ever there was one on this earth ; I'm sure when I'm in the library du books whilst Miss Temple is writing that her uncle dictates I think that I break stones on the road than be at s as hers, hour after hour, with neither nor thanks for her trouble. The stor words ; how the lady spells them I can

"Miss Temple's uncle calls her stup server, and little as she suspected tha the case, Edith was daily preaching the peevish, trial-soured man.

Alec was often in the study dusting or the dried specimens in the colle his master was dictating to Edith Te Vernon had a fancy to have every expected his old servant to attend

Alec, it is true, understood not a there were some things which the amongst them was the value of a mee

Alec was on the steps, busy with t the upper shelves, when Edith ente on the morning in question.

"Have you something for me to w manner.

"Plenty to write, for my mind i pher, motioning to Edith to tak

"I have for years been revolving

Edith's refusal.

"Oh ! uncle, you know well, y

It cost her a painful effort to bri

"And do you mean, woman, to as a judge of what I, Oswald Ve ought not to write ?" exclaimed his fury starting from his seat.

Edith made no reply to the question.

"And do you actually refuse to write down what I please to dictate, because it does not fit in with your narrow fanatical notions?" Mr. Vernon's voice was tremulous with passion; both he and Edith had quite forgotten that a third person was present.

"Narrow and fanatical," said Alec to himself; "yes, that is the name people generally get called who hear decent Christian notions. If one objects to have holy things treated with irreverence, the devil always prompts some supercilious scoffer to call out, narrow-minded fanatic. But if Miss Edith is a fanatic, I say I wish there were more of 'em." Alec's sympathy was drawn out toward the gentle girl who had patiently borne the sneers and scoffs of her uncle, and had only protested when she was required to aid him in his wicked work.

After a minute's silence Edith spoke. "Uncle," she said, "I am willing to write to your dictation from morning till night so long as the subject relates to science, but I cannot, dare not, will not, write down any thing against my blessed religion." The lady rose from her seat with quiet dignity as she concluded the sentence.

"Then you may just take yourself out of my house; it is no place for a bigoted fool like you," exclaimed Mr. Vernon, his fury bursting all bounds. "You had better go back to London to-morrow."

"I am ready to go to-day, if you desire it," Edith calmly answered.

Her firmness made some impression upon her uncle. He had expected expostulation or entreaty. It occurred to the mind of the selfish man that if his secretary, reader, and housekeeper in one should quit Eureka House, he might find it no easy matter to replace a companion so useful.

"Nay, Edith, we must do nothing rashly under the impulse of anger," the philosopher said, adopting a more conciliatory tone. "You must know first what you hazard, what you may lose, by obstinate folly. I have no near relations of my own; you are the niece of my wife; I am ready to regard you as something more—as my daughter, as my heiress"—Mr. Vernon laid an emphatic stress on the last word—"I only ask from you in return such submission to my will in all things as might beseem a daughter, and your compliance with those easy terms will secure to you independence, comfort, and, ultimately, even wealth."

"I am willing to obey you always, save when conscience forbids," said Edith, leaning on the table to support her trembling frame; "but oh! not to be heir to the wealth of all the kingdoms of earth would I consent to use this hand in the cause of infidelity!"

"Is this your final decision?" asked Vernon.

"It is," replied Edith firmly.

"Then take the consequences, you silly girl!" exclaimed Vernon. "The sooner you leave this house the better; I wish never to see you again!"

Edith bowed her head, and silently glided out of the study. She had made her deliberate choice, following in her humble course the example of Moses, who esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt (Heb. 11 : 26), and the higher example of One greater than Moses.

"Where shall I go?" Edith faintly murmured to herself, as she stood at the bottom of the staircase, pausing a few moments to reflect on her new position. She knew that the old lodgings which she had occupied before coming to Eureka House had been long since let, and she could at first think of no other place where she, with her very limited means, could suddenly find a new home.

Edith's friends were for the most part so exceedingly poor that she conld not hope for assistance from them. After brief reflection, she remembered the wife of a clergyman residing in London, who, though unable to receive her into an over-crowded home, might possibly help her in finding some humble lodging.

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

S.S. Lesson for Sept. 28. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Our lessons for the last quarter have been drawn from St. Paul's Epistles. Two of our lessons, Peace with God, and The security of believers, were taken from his epistle to the Romans. It is not by chance that this epistle stands first, although it was not the first written, for it is full of the foundation truths of Christ's Gospel. The faith of the Roman Church was spoken of throughout the whole world (Rom. 1 : 8); and the great Apostle leaves no domain untouched in this inspired letter. By faith we have peace with God, but this is not all; we are also crucified with Christ that the body of sin might be destroyed, and by faith in the mighty work of Christ's redemption, sin can have no dominion over us (Rom. 6 : 6, 14). By faith also in God's fatherhood "we know that all things work together for good to them that love God," and in them all "we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us" (Rom. 8 : 28, 37); and thus it is possible, by the confidence which knows our interests are safe with Him, to present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God (Rom. 12 : 1).

Our next three lessons were from the two epistles to the Corinthians. The Church of Corinth came behind in no gift (1 Cor. 1 : 7), but there was a sad want of unity, a sad spirit of strife among them. Unlike that wondrous description of the early church in Acts 4 : 32, 33, which one is never tired of reading, the Corinthians were yet carnal and walked as men. Envying, strife, and divisions still existed amongst them, and they could not present a broad front to the enemy of souls. Our first lesson from these epistles is on Christian love. And here again, dear reader, let me ask is your life so lived with God that this divine atmosphere of love which "seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil . . . beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things," has become your second and divine nature?

We next considered Victory over death, the blessed and glorious fruit of Christ's resurrection, and that not only as taking away the sting of death in the case of believers who fall asleep in Jesus now, but also, and still more, in the raising of the dead and the taking away of the saints without dying, when our beloved Lord comes again. The very closeness of this union in resurrection glory between the living and the raised ones, the very joy of being re-united in one body, is a hope which ought to banish from such as possess it, all bitterness of spirit, strife, and dissensions. Our third lesson from Paul's instructions to the church in Corinth, is The ministry of reconciliation. This again strikes at the root of self, in leading us to be occupied in seeking the souls of others, the love of Christ constraining us; and we are called to freedom from ourselves, to live "not unto ourselves but unto Him which died for us and rose again."

We next took a lesson from the Epistle to the Galatians. This church of Galatia is the only one for which Paul had nothing to praise God. He had to reproach them that having begun in the Spirit they were seeking to be made perfect in the flesh. He appeals to them by his own experience (chap. 2), that he, Paul, the Apostle, who "lived in all good conscience before God" (Acts. 23 : 1), yet did nothing of himself, "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me" etc. (chap. 2 : 20); then he appeals to them, by the contrast between the law and grace (chap. 3 : 4), and exhorts them (chap. 5 : 1), to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made them free. And it is not till after then that he speaks of the fruit, not of effort, not of the law, but of the Spirit.

Our next lesson was from Ephesians. Paul gives thanks on behalf of this Church of Ephesus for their faith in the Lord Jesus and love to all the saints (Eph. 1 : 15, 16). He unfolds to them, in a remarkable way, our inheritance and our position as seated with Christ in heavenly places, as risen with Christ, etc. His great soul seems to be full to overflowing with what Christ has done and what He has provided for His Church. And even then he pours out his soul in such a prayer as perhaps no other man ever prayed, culminating in the tremendous petition "that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God" (Eph. 3 : 14–19). It is to this church that he writes about the warfare, because the more we accept of, and possess the position and powers which God has given us, the more will the enemy of souls make war against us, and thus he shows us in God's armory what is the Christian armor.

We take a lesson next from Philippians. Paul had been able to thank God upon every remembrance of the converts at Philippi. Their fellowship in the gospel from the first day in which he knew them was a joy to his heart. There is a oneness of the Apostle's spirit with this church which is most precious, and to them he unfolds in the third chapter his present spiritual experience. They would understand him because their steps were close after his. It was fitting that to this church he should teach about the mind of Christ, and exhort them to possess themselves of it. There is a wonderful tone of loving confidence running through it: it is no longer a master tending little children, but the breathing of disciple to fellow disciples which we find here.

From the Epistle to the Colossians we took the lesson on practical religion. This epistle which resembles in many respects that to the Ephesians, is eminently practical in its application of the principles involved in Christ's teachings. Paul had thanked God since he had heard of their faith, love, and hope (Col. 1 : 3–6), and he teaches them to "give thanks" (Chap. 1 : 12–14) "unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light; who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of His dear Son; in whom we have redemption through His blood, even the forgiveness of sins. He then, as in the Epistle to the Ephesians, speaks of their high position in Christ; "rooted and built up in Him," "complete in Him," "buried with Him," "risen with Him," etc. And it is on the ground of this accomplished fact which had been already recognized and accepted by them, that he insists upon the practical results which should flow from such a position.

From the Thessalonians we learned something of the coming of the Lord. Paul thanks God, as for the Colossians, for their faith, love, and hope; and this hope of the Lord's coming lay very near their hearts. The two epistles are very full of it. Let us each one ask himself, How does the hope of the Lord's return affect my business, my social relations, the education of my children, etc.? Is it a power in my life which gives a color and a bias to all my words and deeds? or is it a dead doctrine which I assent to, but which does not influence me? Our last lessons were very similar, the Christian in the world, and the Christian citizen, taken from Paul's epistles to Timothy and Titus.

And what is to be the result of this teaching? Only knowledge? But "knowledge puffeth up" (1 Cor. 8 : 1) and love is not puffed up (1 Cor. 13 : 4). Oh, if there were but one dozen of true-hearted men of God, ready to accept all that God gives in Christ, to live as Christ lived, and to teach as Christ taught, how mighty would be the power upon others! When will the time come again when it shall be said of the disciples of Christ "great grace was upon them all"? when shall men take knowledge of them that they have been with Jesus? In this our land we have much of evangelizing—effort in meetings, etc., but the power, oh how it lacks! Meetings without conversions, aye, and conversions with so little change in the lives of the converts that there is room for sceptics to sneer, and for ritualists to boast that true self-denial is only found with them. God awaken us and send the power of His Spirit among us, for Christ's sake. Amen.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Distressing News has Come from Afghanistan. the Mohammedan kingdom, with Yakoob Khan, the ruler of which, the British Government lately concluded a most satisfactory peace. Twelve regiments of Yakoob Khan's troops have mutinied, and after besieging their Chief in his palace, have burned the British embassy and massacred the distinguished officer Major Cavagnari, with two brother officers and the entire bodyguard of fifty men. Yakoob Khan has implored assistance from the British, which cannot be withheld; so extensive preparations are being made in England and India for a new invasion of Afghanistan. As Yakoob's authority over his lawless and warlike subjects is little more than nominal, he may find himself alone in his alliance with the British, and another alarming war may be imminent. Verily God seems to be angry with England; and meanwhile the predicted "wars and rumors of wars" are thickening.

The General Conference of Christians of all nations has just closed a week's session at Basle, Switzerland. Dr. Schaff, of New York, spoke of the vitality of Protestantism in America, and called especial attention to the fact that the American Church was firm in its adherence to a strict observance of the Sabbath. He said that Mormonism, now under legal restriction, would go to ruin but for the constant immigration of its followers from Europe. The Rev. Dr. Washburn, of New York, spoke of the nature and dangers of socialism. He regarded Christianity as the only source of relief for socialistic vagaries and disorders. A committee was appointed to ask the Austrian Government to remove the disabilities of Bohemian Protestants.

The Decay of Turkey Appears to be Inevitable. Dr. Washburn's account of the present condition of that unhappy country is especially valuable, being the report of an eye witness. He writes: "The English consuls in Asia Minor report a state of things which even Mr. Bourke, the Under-Secretary of State, declared to be more horrible than anything he had ever heard of. Almost within sight of Constantinople, the district of Adabazar is held by 40,000 Circassians, who have robbed the people of all their horses, cattle, and everything movable, prevented the cultivation of the fields, and have murdered in cold blood hundreds of Christians. Nothing is done to put an end to this reign of terror, which has continued for months. The same story of absolute anarchy comes from all parts of Asia Minor, and the condition of Macedonia is equally bad.

"The condition of Turkey is well nigh hopeless; the progress of decay and disintegration has been more rapid during the past year than ever before; the time will probably soon come when the British must either abandon the Sultan altogether or interfere actively in the government of the country. They evidently intend to take the latter course, and they have already sent a large number of their best army officers into Asia Minor as consuls, to prepare the way for an occupation." Surely this betokens nothing else than the predicted drying up of the Euphrates Valley.

Captain Carey, the British Officer whose Courage failed him so signally when he and the late Prince Imperial of France were attacked by a band of Zulus, is, it now turns out, a praying soldier, and in that character has endured much persecution from his brother officers since he joined the army. Under the trouble and disgrace which his conduct on May 31st brought upon him, he, like Jonah, "cried, by reason of his affliction, unto the Lord," and, as we all know, the event has been his acquittal and release from custody. True to his profession of faith, Captain Carey has written the following letter to the London Christian, in which he gives glory to God for his escape:

SOUTHSEA, August 25, 1879.

"MY DEAR SIR: May I ask you to kindly insert a request for praise on my behalf in the next number of your journal?

"Since the first moment of my arrest I took the whole matter to my heavenly Father. I left it in His hands, reminding Him constantly of His promise to help. He has borne my burden for me, He has sustained me, my wife, and family in our distress, and He has finally wiped away tears from our eyes.

"There were certain circumstances at first that it seemed, owing to the bewildered statement of the survivors, difficult to explain; but though my faith wavered His promises endured, and He in His good time brought me to the haven where I would be.

"I feel that it would be wrong to keep from my fellow-believers such a wonderful example of God's goodness and power in influencing the hearts of men; and, though I hate publicity, I feel compelled to add my testimony to the power of prayer. Believe me, dear sir, yours very faithfully.

The English Protecting Gibraltar.—There is considerable excitement in Spain over the erection of some batteries at Tangiers, opposite Gibraltar, and their armament with heavy guns under the superintendence of certain British officers sent for that purpose. The British are also erecting large barracks for the reception of their troops en route from India, but there is little doubt that Tangiers will be held until the cost of these heavy works is repaid to England. As the repayment by the Morocco Government is improbable, Tangiers may be looked upon as a new British colony, and both sides of the Straits of Gibraltar will be guarded by British guns. As the command of the Straits is practically under control of England so long as her fleet is the strongest afloat, the acquisition of Tangiers is a matter of small moment to outsiders, but had Spain after a war with Morocco secured possession of this port, the consequences would have been serious to England.

A Great Strike is Impending in England.—The cotton manufacturers decline to withdraw their notices of a five per cent reduction of wages, and the spinners and weavers are determined to resist the reduction. If a strike ensues it will involve all the working people in the Ashton district, and it will be a protracted one.

A Secular Provincial Journal in the North of England thus remarks upon the work of the Salvation Army: "Ridicule as we may the doggerel hymns, the incoherent prayers, the wild harangues, the violent gesticulations, the rude sensationalism of a country fair imported into public worship, to say nothing of the swooning produced and the nervous excitement, the fact remains that the 'Salvation Army' has saved, for the time being, numbers of the very lowest of the community from vice and crime. The testimony of the police and of the magistrates in Gateshead is conclusive as to the genuineness of their work. They have reduced the charge list in Gateshead by one half, and effected a startling reformation in the personal habits of multitudes of the worst characters in the lowest slums on Tyneside. So successful have they been in reclaiming the drunkard and in enforcing an almost ascetic habit of life upon their converts, that it is said the publicans offered the 'Lasses' £300 to transfer their operations to some other field."

At the Blantyre Coal Mine Explosion in Scotland last year a newspaper correspondent reported that when he rushed to the pit's mouth, he saw scores of men from other pits hurrying to the scene of the accident, in case they might be of use there. He asked one of them, "Will you go down that pit in the face of the explosion?" "What else are we here for?" was the answer. Would that Christians were like that! What else are they here for, but to explore the depths of sin and misery, and to rescue perishing souls?

In Rome, Italy, was Recently Ordained a Colored priest who was formerly a slave. He had suffered many indignities, and an Italian lady, learning his condition and character, purchased him and gave him his freedom. He was then sent to the Propaganda, and his ordination is the result. His field of work is Abyssinia, where he has been sent to labor among his own people.

Mr. Sankey's Hymns in India.—Rev. Isaac Fieldbrave, native pastor of the Hindoostani Church at Lucknow, is doing the Methodist Church in North India a good service by translating the best hymns of "Sacred Songs and Solos" sung by Mr. Sankey, the late Mr. Bliss, and others. Brother Fieldbrave has a gift for this work, and renders the hymns in a faithful, singable translation. He has already translated about fifty of these, and the boys and girls in the mission schools commit them very rapidly, and children and adults soon learn to sing them. And a correspondent says that all who have ever heard it know that there is music in Hindoostani singing.

The Pardoned Communists are Returning to France after their weary exile, to become and remain better citizens than they were in the exciting days of the Commune. The Republic has sufficient confidence in its own stability to be able to pardon these men, and there seems to be very little risk in this act of clemency. Doubtless a few of the returned exiles may brood over their apparent wrongs, and foolishly hope for a chance to revenge them, but prudence and a remembrance of the miseries of penal servitude will doubtless keep them quiet.

The City of Jerusalem and its late Bishop, DR. SAMUEL GOBAT.

DR. GOBAT, BISHOP OF JERUSALEM.

In April, 1879, there died, at the age of eighty, in Jerusalem, a remarkable personage, who was the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of that "city of the Great King," Dr. Samuel Gobat.

He was born on January 26th, 1799, at Cremine, in Switzerland. His father, who was a small farmer, was, as well as his mother, very religiously disposed, although not really converted by the Holy Spirit, as they ultimately became at a later period.

Samuel Gobat became the subject of true spiritual conversion of heart at the age of twenty, and in the spring of 1821 entered the Missionary Institute of Bâle, and studied there until the autumn of 1823. He then spent a year at Paris in the study of Arabic, and after visiting London for nine months, was sent out by the Church Missionary Society as a missionary to Abyssinia.

He had a remarkable talent for languages, and could speak fluently French, German, English, Arabic, Syriac, Hebrew, and, in fact, altogether about twelve languages.

He labored with great blessing as missionary in Abyssinia until 1833. During his visit to Europe which followed, he married, in May, 1834, Mary Zeller, daughter of Inspector Zeller, of Bruggen, near Bale (sister of Mr. Samuel Zeller, whose work in healing by faith at Männedorf is so well known); and he returned with her to his loved Abyssinia, where they arrived in March, 1835. But in the mysterious ordering of God, he was brought low during the next year and a half (until September, 1836) by a severe and unaccountable illness. "My precious wife," he writes about this time, "has unspeakably much to do and to bear. During eighteen months she has seen me on the brink of the grave in a strange land, while she has suffered several times from cholera. But by the help of God, she was not only the instrument of lightening and sweetening my sufferings a hundredfold, but also of preserving my life. She loved the Saviour from her youth, and this was her power and daily strength. There could be at this time no question of work among the people. I was carried at last on a litter, like a dying man, to the Red Sea."

In the month of May, 1839, when his health and that of his wife was somewhat restored, he received from his committee a commission to go to Malta in order to direct the publication of the Arabic edition of the Bible in the Mission press.

Later he received the direction of the Protestant College in Malta, and from there to a yet higher vocation, to undertake the Evangelical Bishopric of Jerusalem, which was formed in the year 1846, jointly by the Queen of England and the King of Prussia. He died in Jerusalem, at his post, in the April of this year, aged eighty. The Rev. Dr. Barclay has been appointed his successor as Bishop of Jerusalem.

We append the following interesting narrative by himself of his early life and remarkable conversion:

BISHOP GOBAT'S INTERESTING AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

Translated from the "Volksbote."

His Birth in January, 1799—His Parents Unconverted, although Outwardly Religious—Their Character and History—His Singular Religious Experience—His Conviction of Sin under a Pious Pastor in 1818—His Remarkable Conversion, on October 20th, 1818, leads to his Parents' Conversion—His Subsequent Studies and Missionary Life.

"I was born on the 26th January, 1799, at Cremine, in the district of Munsterthal, which now belongs to the Canton de Berne (Switzerland), but which was at that time subject to the French Government until the fall of Napoleon. My parents were religiously disposed, my mother especially so. They never missed public worship on Sunday unnecessarily, and they spent the remainder of the sacred day in reading the Bible or other religious books. They had daily morning and evening worship with their household, which was suspended only in the exceptional times of hay and wheat harvest, when the hard field work rendered it difficult on account of the great fatigue of labor. They led, for the most part, a quiet and retired life.

"Had there been any true and living Christians at hand in their neighborhood they would undoubtedly have been drawn to them, but their piety lacked a stirring power as well as fundamental light, for which cause they remained until the year 1818 more under the law than in the enjoyment of free grace. It is true the doctrine of free grace, and of righteousness imputed through the merits of Christ, was well known to them, but they always thought they must add something to it by their own works, and this something they could never find or succeed in. In my infancy and early childhood my mother was continually under a distressing feeling of sin and condemnation; notwithstanding which she never gave up the hope that through her efforts and faithfulness to duty she would yet attain to the worthiness which was acceptable to the Saviour.

"Thus both

MY PARENTS

were wanting true spiritual life. However, when I remember the wisdom with which they dealt with their children, I cannot avoid the conviction that, unconsciously to themselves, they were already at the time I mention under the special influence of the Holy Ghost. They felt and showed to their children the tenderest parental affection, by which they knew how to bear with childish inconsiderateness and frivolousness without excusing them; but this love was united to an unbending firmness against wilful evil, against lying, disobedience, wilfulness and such like. In intercourse with others they were reserved, this characteristic being the consequence of trial in their surroundings. Before their marriage both were brought up in well-to-do family circumstances; but in the issue of the French Revolution and the blow sustained by Switzerland they lost, soon after they were married, the largest part of their fortune, and this blow, together with a tender conscience, brought about that anxiety, that absence of self-consciousness, and that strength of character which rendered them unwilling for intercourse with other people.

"Their continual occupation in the cultivation of their land, which was in a very unproductive soil, cost them much and severe labor. Thus it happened that my father fell into debt, which caused him much trouble, until, in the year 1818, as he saw that his two sons (my elder brother and I, he being schoolmaster and I missionary) could render him no assistance in agriculture, he decided to sell enough of his land to clear off the debt. And truly there remained little enough of earthly possessions. But from that same time there came upon the whole family an unusual spiritual blessing, so that not only my father and mother and their four children became converted to God within two years, but the Lord was also pleased to choose some among us as instruments to lead other souls to the same Saviour whom we had learned to know as our life and salvation. My mother especially became a lasting blessing to many around her, until it pleased God to call her from this world to the upper home in August of the year 1837. After her death my old and worthy father went to live with my brother.

"As concerns

MY OWN AWAKENING.

"I was from my earliest childhood accustomed to expect and to pray for every need and every blessing from God, and to love Him above all things. I think I may say that I was as pious as a young child can be. My greatest joy was to read in the Word of God, and then to withdraw in stillness and solitude to pray. In my seventh year I had as much reliance upon the Bible as I have now, although there was much in it that I did not understand. I read much, enjoyed also reading in other truly pious and edifying books. Frequently I prayed to God that He would make me a preacher of the Gospel.

"But this early piety melted away like th morning cloud, without solidity and continuance. For I began as early as in my ninth yea to nourish doubts about some passages in th Word of God, and a few years later I doubte everything, even the Godhead of Christ and th immortality of the soul. My parents had already pronounced the wish that I should stud theology; but as the time for decision drew nea they were so brought down by a series of misfortunes in their circumstances, one following afte the other, that the expense of my theologica education could no more be thought of. An my own desire to be a pastor was gone, for i was clear and well known to me that an uprigh pastor, if he would not be a miserable hypocrite, must be godly at heart, and in persona possession of Divine truth; but my heart desire the undisturbed enjoyment of sin.

"Thus was I from my eleventh to my twentieth year an unbeliever, without letting my parents know, lest they should be still mor grieved. For the same reason my outward wal was orderly and respectable, so far as I though my parents would see or take knowledge of it Notwithstanding, it could not escape their watchful eyes that I was not in reality what I seeme to be in their presence. During all this time worked with my parents in the field only in orde not to displease them. I had neither wish no taste for any kind of work. My heart was a meeting-place for much evil. When I was able t escape the eyes of my parents and their friends I played cards with my companions (who hav all become converted since then). With all this when accidentally I met with truly pious peopl I loved and honored them, though I avoide them as much as possible; and if people mocke and slandered them behind their backs I too up their cause, for I despised all those who professed belief in the Bible and who did not liv consistently, while I held all the pietists as honest, sincere, and conscientious people. I knew also, the Scriptural truth of salvation as well a though I had myself become a real Christian and was as convinced of the real inner change c a heart which clings to the Saviour. Thus once occurred that two piously disposed youn men allowed themselves to be persuaded to sin a worldly song before a large company. Then I not having the courage to exhort and war them, for fear of being laughed at, went out an wept for them, not because I thought the thin was wrong in itself, but because I foresaw wha bitter, remorseful regret must torment them before peace was restored to their consciences.

"For many years I had, as far as I can reco lect, no consciousness of needing a Saviour, n longing after God. The first occasion on whic for a moment a deeper impression was made o my heart, was as follows. My parents, withou my knowledge, had besought of the neighborhood (Bost) to visit us, and t speak with me. Now, as he was looked upo by men of the world as a very severe man, sought, whenever he was with us, some pretex for leaving the room.

"My mother's sharp eye marked it well, an fearing, on the one hand, that I might agai run away, on the other hand, pondering that might be as dangerous as wholesome if my unb lief or my present unchristian walk should mee with rebuke before other witnesses, she aske me in the most ordinary tone if I would not a company the pastor on his way home, and pa him a visit in his parsonage. This I promise to do, perceiving it was the only means of escaping more open shame. On the road the exce lent man sought to gain my attention to th truths adapted to my state, but it did not spi just the right thread. I could easily perceiv that during the whole hour's time this faithf servant of God was painfully moved and distres ed in his mind. As soon as he looked at m so soon he lowered his eyes, full of thought, t the ground. This made the more impressio on me, because it was not his way to mak much digression when he felt himself calle to talk with sinners. At last I felt the ment was coming in which he would turn an say to me, 'Thou art a man of death !'

'What was to be done? I would not defend myself, out of fear he might give my parents a report of me ; also I would not cast away me the word of truth ; so I suddenly stood and bidding farewell as though to the e, broke away, under the pretext that at and such a time I must be at such and such ace. So I hurried back. A little distance looked back, and saw the dear man wiping the tears from his eyes. At this moment myself as the worst man upon God's earth. to myself, 'Love has driven this man to ouse ; love to me and the tender considerwhich would not push me back, has occad him to be so mild and to seek to win me 's heart ; and now he is reproaching himself is own unfaithfulness ! And I ? I have as a shameful hypocrite !' From this time 1818) I no longer felt so well at ease in piritual death as before.

arly in October of the same year my levity occasion and courage to a young man to t me in a way which opened my eyes for the ime to see the dangerous balance in which ng, threatening me to be lost through sin. that day I had no more peace. Every day rked hard until I was exhausted, that I t forget myself, and then I played often the night through, only to get rid of the melly thoughts which pursued me ; for I had to the decision to think no more about nd especially no more about God. Thus it until Sunday, the 20th of October, 1818.

"THAT MEMORABLE SUNDAY.

the morning service in the church, which, ase my parents, I still frequented, I danced gh the afternoon, and had arranged to pass ight in card-playing. As I broke away after r, sorely against my parents' will, to the mentioned place, there fell upon me with cedented power and penetrating sensation onsciousness of the presence of God. I back into the house ; took up the Bible egan to read in it—a thing which I had to do for years, excepting when at the excommand of my parents. However, as I d the holy book, I felt myself so standing the wrath of God, and so unworthy to His holy word, that from fear my parents t remark my unrest of soul, I shut the book and returned to my room.

t was between seven and eight in the even-As I was alone I looked round a moment ; I threw myself upon my knees and began ay as follows : 'Oh, my Creator, it has told me that Thou hast sent Thine only ten Son into the world to save sinners. I Thee, if it is possible, manifest Him to me, am a lost sinner,' etc. But the more I d, so much the greater was the anguish of oul. It seemed to me that there was but a etween me and never-ending death. But tinued to pray and confess my sins until three o'clock in the morning, when I said od, 'Lord, I will not let Thee go except bless me, and if I must perish, then I will here in Thy presence upon my knees.' light dawned upon me, and I could bebelieve firmly, that Jesus was my God and aviour—that He had baptized me with His , and made me His eternal property. This he most blessed hour of my life.

ut in the morning, when I sought to rise the short rest I had had, all strength had e, and I had no power to raise myself. my mother came to look after me, she quietly, 'What has happened to you? The ssion of your face is quite changed.' I reto her what had taken place in the forego-ght, but my judicious mother did not seem nder ; on the contrary, she hurried to my and said to him, 'We have neglected the thing with our children ; we are no true tians.' From this time forward, my two ts passed through strong impression and ction of sin, until the grace of the Lord shone also into their souls, and they tasted the peace of God in the happy experience of full forgiveness of their sins.

"From that time it was my desire to work hard all day, and to spend the half or two-thirds of the night in the praise of God. It was my wish to remain with my parents, and to lighten and sweeten their life by the help I could render them. It is true I had long thought of becoming a missionary ; only, having received so poor an education, and being already twenty years old, I saw no possibility of the carrying out of my wish. However, I felt constrained again and again to pray God that He would show me His holy will about this thing, and that if He had called me to this work according to His good pleasure, He would make His call clear and distinct. On one Sunday I went out into a forest near, and prayed the Lord there with particular earnestness and fervor that He would make known to me His will, and I received an undoubting inward assurance that He would do it, although I could not think in what way it could happen.

"As I returned to the house, I found there a pious lady, who was in correspondence with the Missionary Institute in Bale, and who asked me most unexpectedly if I did not wish to become a missionary. My answer was, 'As soon as the Lord calls me,

I AM READY.'

"Upon this she wrote, without consulting me, to the Committee in Bale, and in about three weeks I received the call to hold myself in readiness for my admission in the mission house, as soon as a new year's class could be formed. In the spring of 1821 I entered the Missionary Institute as student, and remained there until the autumn of 1823. I then went to Paris for a year to study Arabic, then spent nine months in London, and from there was sent out by the Church Missionary Society to Abyssinia.

"What has happened since that time is easily added, that my knowledge and my whole intellectual training in every relation was confined to a very circumscribed limit. For in my boyhood I went to a miserable village school, and that indeed only four months out of the twelve, continuing until my sixteenth year. From that time until my twentieth year I did nothing at all towards my education.

"The two and a half years which I spent in the Mission House in Bale could only serve to lift me a little out of my great ignorance. Since then I have sought as opportunity offered—here a little, there a little—to gather and gain what help I could. God's Word was, and is still, my principal study."

PIETY AT HOME.

By Governor Colquitt, of Georgia.

From an Address Delivered in Mt. Hope Church, near Orchard Hill, Ga., during a Series of Revival Services a few weeks ago.

How much easier it is to bear the burdens of life, with all its cares and sorrows, if a man can turn, when the day's work is done, and evening is casting its shades across his pathway, to a home where the Prince of Peace, the blessed Saviour, reigns supreme.

Home ! What a sacred name ! How tenderly and fondly does memory turn back to that sacred spot ! The tree under which we played, the curling smoke, as it wended its way to the skies from the chimney of the old homestead, with its background of light and shadow, of mountain or valley, as the sun's last rays, at the close of day, used to rest upon it ; the fireside gathering when night had fallen on the outer world ; the old arm-chair, the mother's face, beaming with light and love, with father, brothers and sisters gathered around, form a picture that lingers on the memory with a freshness which defies both age and sorrow to obliterate.

We can see the aged father and mother as they stood in the door, with tear-dimmed eyes, as a darling daughter was going away, with her new-made husband, to a distant home. They turn, as she waves her farewell kiss and is gone, to their lonely fireside, and pray God to bless their darling child. We can see them bowed with care and anxiety, day after day, until a letter came saying that "John, in spite of all his embarrassments, consecrated his new home with family prayer." Smiles now chased their tears away. Their child was safe in the keeping of one who loved Jesus.

Our heavenly home ! Who can picture its beauty !—framed by the same Architect that fashioned the rainbow and the flower ! Remember that home when sickness, sorrow and death come ; it will lighten every care and sweeten every labor.

How the heart responds to the memory of home ! During the war, when the havoc of death had ceased awhile beyond the river, over in the Federal lines the strains of "Yankee Doodle," came wafted on the evening breeze, with the cheers of the Federals. Soon the Confederate band responds, and "Dixie" was as loudly cheered by our boys. The silence was then broken by the strains of "Home, Sweet Home," when both bands—friend and foe—joined alike, and for a moment each heart was away off in fancy gazing upon wife, children, mother—home.

So let us Christians, when about to be overcome with the bitterness of this life, think and sing of our heavenly home, our mansions in the skies. Detraction and misconstruction will never prevent me from spreading my sails to catch every breeze that can waft me on to that heavenly home.

In the evening Mr. Colquitt again spoke in the same church. His subject was REST.

He said : "Rest is the object of life ; some imagine that wealth and power will secure it, but when life has been spent, and old age finds itself in possession of these, happiness, like a will-o'-the-wisp, laughs at their grasp as she flits away, far off as ever ; and poor deluded man stumbles into the grave, while death and darkness close round him forever.

"But, thank God, there is a rest even amid the storms of this life, and rest, sweet, everlasting rest, beyond the shadows of the tomb.

"The aged pilgrim, as he walks the shores of time, finds that the road, once trod by the Prince of Peace, grows less rugged as the feeble footsteps are reaching the end of the journey ; and the anticipation of that heavenly rest illumines the heart, while the aged form bends over his staff and the visions of this world are all fading away.

"Ah, sinner ! think not that the life of a Christian is all warfare. There are times when the soul is wafted away from trouble and care, and is at rest. And when death is coming—when the eye is glazing, the pulse failing, the dampness of death gathering on the forehead, and friends stand around for the last, fond look—all is rest and peace then. It matters not how brave you are, you cannot face death without power from on high. I can almost see the brave and reckless veteran of the "Virginia Army," who had never flinched in the storm of battle, feeling his pulse grow feebler as his life-blood ebbed away, and calling upon his weeping comrades to sing one hymn. And when, with streaming eyes and bursting heart, and face covered with the dust of battle, I approached, he reached out with feeble hand, feeling, in the darkness that death had thrown around him, for his Christian General, and with dying lips murmured, 'Oh ! General, can you do nothing for me !'

"And while we gazed on that war-scarred group kneeling there, we could almost hear the prayer that burst from the soul of that General, mingling with the boom of cannon and the rattle of musketry, ascending to the God of battles in behalf of the dying soldier, around whose soul the darkness of eternal death was so fast gathering. He had oftentimes derided the prayer-meeting when his comrades would gather under the lead of their General, just before the battle began, but now, in the extremity of death, it was his only refuge."

CHRIST'S MISSION.

The Last Sermon Preached by the Rev. Dr. Talmage in London.

Preached at the Agricultural Hall, Sunday, Sept. 7th, 1879, and Specially Reported for the "Christian Herald."

Farewell to London—Kossuth's Visit to America—The Calling of Zaccheus—Sympathy with the Lost—The Lost Child, the Lost Vessel, and the Lost Man—Christ's Humanity—Christ's Divinity—Christ's Mission to Men—Napoleon and the Simplon Pass—The World's Treatment of the Fallen—God's Treatment of the Fallen—The Happy Slave—Rose Allen and Hugh McCail—Christ's Solicitude for Human Souls—The Scotch-woman's Fatal Delay—Appeal to Young Men—Conclusion.

In this, my last sermon in London, just before going to the sea and starting for home, and at the close of a three months of hearty good cheer among the English people—I having received from them kindness the story of which will never be told—I feel that I must speak an earnest word to-night, and my text is in Luke 19 : 10.

"The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost."

When Kossuth visited America twenty years ago, so great was the enthusiasm for Hungary that the people mounted into the tree-tops to see the procession that passed; and indeed there is no better place to see a procession than from a tree-top, if you be well poised.

Well, Christ had come to Jericho, and all the people wanted to see Him. There was a man whose head did not come up to the shoulders of other people, and who feared if he stood on the dead level he would not be able to see Christ at all, and so he got up into a sycamore tree—a wide-branched tree, its arms reaching clean across the road; and there, seated on that tree-branch, he waited and watched for the coming procession. After a while Christ with a great multitude advanced; coming under this tree-branch he looked up and recognized Zaccheus, and cried to him, "Come down, I am going to dine with you to-day." Zaccheus came down; and among other things that Christ said to him was this, "The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost."

We are

with anything that is lost. If we see a dog that has wandered from its master, if we see a bird that has escaped from its owner, we say, "Poor thing!" Going down the streets some cold nightfall, moving in the very teeth of the north wind, we wrap our coat tighter about us, and we say, "God have mercy on anybody who is out in the cold to-night!" and just at that moment we hear a cry up the street. It is the cry of a child. There is a great excitement in the street. People gather around this little one. He is so frightened he can't tell his residence or tell his name. A plain body comes up with her plaid and throws it round the child, and says, "I will take the poor bairn to-night." Meanwhile there's a bellman going through the street ringing his bell, and crying out, "A lost child, three years old, blue eyes, light hair—a lost child."

On shipboard you see a vessel against the sky-line. It comes near you. It rolls over into the trough of the sea. You can't understand why it is unmanageable. You put the glass to your eye and you see no man in the rigging; you see no man on the deck; you say it's an abandoned ship, and as the vessel goes on rolling into the trough of the sea, the crew say to the passengers, and the captain says to the mate, "A lost ship."

You are going down the street, and you find a man who once was your associate. He had a large fortune, and he had good morals, but you see he is all covered over with the marks of sin and of poverty. You say, "What a change in that man! Why, he must have gone to the very bottom of the ladder. God have mercy on his wife and children! God pity him—a lost man!"

But, my friends, we are all lost. All we like sheep have gone astray, and the bellman of heaven comes out to-night to find those who have wandered from the right path; and through all the streets of London and New York, and through all the valleys and mountains of the earth, the bellman is ringing the Gospel bell to-night—"The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." Oh, Lord God of the Pentecost, give us 3000 souls to-night!

I am so glad it is the Son of man that is come to seek and save that which is lost. It is not a monarch riding down the sky with thunderbolts to crush us. Oh, no, it is the Son of man. His infancy rocked in the cradle of a mother's arms; His boyhood spent amid a boy's temptations; His manhood with blistered hands learning a trade. Oh, yes, He was a man—the Son of man. He ate like a man, He drank like a man, He slept like a man, He wept like a man, He suffered like a man—He was a man.

When Chrst comes into this hall to-night to save us, He doesn't come into a strange world. He comes into a world whose muscles and bones and nerves He has already inhabited. Like us, the cold chilled Him. Like us, the fire burned Him. Like us, betrayal roused indignation in Him. Son of man, Son of man! bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh, heart of our heart, grief of our grief, pang of our pang, woe of our woe—the Son of man! the Son of man!

I do not doubt

HIS DIVINITY.

Do not mistake me. I stand while Mary and Martha are weeping over the grave of Lazarus, and I see Christ weeping with them. He is a man; but then I hear His voice ringing out till it wakes the dead, "Lazarus, come forth!" He is a God. As Lazarus rises up he proves that Christ is God. And then I see Christ in the back part of the ship, sound asleep in the vessel on the Lake of Gennesaret, His head reclining on a fisherman's coat. Oh, how soundly He sleeps! Look at His face. He is a man! He is a man! But then I see Him come to the prow of the boat, and, looking out into the tempest, with one word for the wind and another word for the wave, He says, "Peace, be still!" and the waves crouch like whipped spaniels at His feet. He's a God. Ecce Homo—Behold the man! Ecce Deus—Behold the God!

But the thought that most stirs me to-night is that coming with the fresh memory of His own sorrow, and His own grief, and His own persecutions and trials, He is walking these floors, walking these galleries, knocking at the gate of every human soul in this august and stupendous assemblage—the Son of man come to seek and to save that which was lost. My friends, we are lost to holiness, and Christ comes to find us. Need I tell the people of London what they all know, that the Bible is true when it says that "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God"? "There is no health in us, from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot." We are full of wounds and bruises which have not been bound up and mollified with ointment.

There is not so much difference between a ship going out yesterday from Liverpool harbor with flags flying and that ship in two weeks hence ground to pieces on the rocks of Long Island coast, as there is difference between our soul as it came forth from the hand of God and that soul dismasted and shipwrecked through sin. But, blessed be God, Christ comes to invite us back to holiness.

"Oh," says some one here, "I can't get back, there are so many obstacles." I am here to tell you we may get back. When Napoleon proposed his campaign in Italy, people said, "You can't get over the Alps. If you knew what the Alps were you wouldn't think of taking an army across them." Then Napoleon rose in the stirrups and waving his hand towards the mountains, said, "There should be no Alps." And then the Simplon Pass was constructed, and that wonderful road made which has been the astonishment of all the years since. Now, you say that between your soul and God there is a great obstacle. Christ comes to-night. He waves His hand over your sin and says, "There shall be no obstacle. I will come over the mountains of thy sin and the hills of thine iquity." Oh, what is that flutter among angels? Who is that horseman riding through the streets of heaven with qu dispatch? What is that bulletin in the h venly streets—what is it? I will tell you w it is. Christ has found that which was lost.

> "Nor angels can their joy contain,
> But kindle with new fire;
> 'The sinner lost is found,' they sing,
> And strike the sounding lyre."

Oh, the mercy of the Cross! I wish all h to-night had it—mercy, free mercy, long-su ing mercy, eternal mercy. You are all strang to me, but I preach it in full confidence. know not what your history has been, bu know this, that to-night you may have all y sins pardoned, and you may start for heave masse, this whole assemblage.

Have you ever noticed how differently world treats a man or a woman gone astray fr the way God treats a man or a woman g astray? When the world says, "Out with him; throw him of all social circles; stop his credit at the b—away with him; we don't want to be s walking down the street with that man; he disgraced himself and his friends—away him, out with him." And if it is hard f man to get back, how much harder it is f woman once gone astray. If a man has g astray the world casts him out, but God him.

When he first goes astray, God says, "C back;" and when he goes still further as one hundred miles from God, then God "Come back" louder. When he has gone thousand miles away from the truth, then thunders from the heavens, "Come back, c back." And if it is hard for a man to get after he has gone astray, how much harder, peat, for a woman.

What though she repent—no mercy; though she hunger and starve—no pity; though she die—tumble her into the grave have no prayer said over her. If she try to ashore, stone her back again. If she com far up that she can get the tips of her finge the rock trying to clamber up, then come with your hard heels and smash the tips o fingers till she fall off. No pity for men women gone astray. But God's heart mercy, all pity, all love, all kindness, and vite you this night to accept that grace. cept it now. Postpone not a moment. "C came to seek and to save that which was l That is me and that is you.

Again, I remark that we are lost to happ A caliph said, "I have been a caliph fifty and yet I have not had but fourteen da complete happiness." How many people are in this assemblage who have never had teen days' unalloyed pleasure. Oh, my fr the human heart is an organ with four ba keys, and the world doesn't know how to on it; but the religion of Christ comes and with its right hand it strikes the keys of the soul, and with its left the lowe of the soul, and sweeps them with the very phonies of heaven. Why, if you get the re of Christ in your heart you are happy wh be the untoward circumstance; happy, lik slave who said, "I own everything I wa own. I own the air, for I breathe it. the sunshine, for I lie down in it. I ow earth, for I can sleep on it. I own the he for I am destined to them."

So it was with Rose Allen, sacrifice Christ's sake. When they held a burnin dle under her wrists until finally the sinews ped, she said, "Now you have destroy hand, burn my foot, and then burn my for it is for Christ's sake." And so it wa Hugh M'Cail. When he went upon the that led to martyrdom, Christ was with hir turning to one side of the scaffold, he "Farewell, father and mother; farewel moon, and stars; farewell, all earthly del

Then, going to the other end of the platform, he said, "Welcome, God and Father! Welcome, sweet Jesus Christ, the Mediator of the New Testament! Welcome death! welcome glory?"

Oh, my friends, there is no happiness like that which is to be found in Christ. Jesus comes to you this evening, and if you have sickness, if you have temptation, if you have trial, He is ready to bear your burden. You know sometimes a child gets so sick it can't lie in the cradle and the mother has to take it on her lap; and so there are times when God's children are so weak and sick and suffering that they find no easy place but in God's lap, and then He bends over them with this lullaby, "As one whom his mother comforteth so will I comfort you."

"The soul that on Jesus hath leaned for repose
He will not, He will not desert to His foes;
That scul, though all hell should endeavor to shake,
He will never, no never, no never forsake."

I remark again, we are

LOST TO HEAVEN,

Christ comes to take us there. I cannot think of anything more distressing than to be compelled to hear an oratorio two and a half hours long if a man has no taste for music, or then to be in the National Gallery of London or the Louvre of Paris if he has no taste for pictures. Yes, my friends, I can think of one thing more distressing, and that is for a man to be put in heaven without any taste or preparation for it and yet a great many people think all they have to do will be at last to close their eyes, without any preparation for the presence of God, and go up and be happy.

Oh, no, we must get preparation, and the Lord Jesus Christ comes here to-night to prepare us all for that blessed place. He wants your soul. How do I know it? I will prove it—yes, prove it to the satisfaction of every man in this audience. If a man had lost a diamond and he looked eight or ten days for it, wouldn't you conclude he wanted to find the diamond? And when you have lost your soul by reason of sin and the Lord Jesus Christ comes to seek it and search for it, and He comes and seeks for it day and night, year after year, under all circumstances of trial and hardship, and keeps on seeking and searching, doesn't that prove He wants to find the diamond?

Oh, yes, Christ has a throne for you in heaven; not only a throne, but steps by which to mount it; not only a harp, but a tune to play on it; not only a possession, but a victory to celebrate. Christ wants no vacant chairs in heaven. He doesn't want to be asked at last why you have not been solicited into the kingdom of heaven. He doesn't want the Book of Life to be closed until your name is recorded there. Oh, no! He is here to-night. He comes from Bethlehem to Nazareth, from Nazareth to Jerusalem, from Jerusalem to Golgotha, from Golgotha to glory, from glory here, to seek and save that which was lost.

Now, my friend, don't hide away from Him when He comes to seek and save you, for though His grace may not find you, my brother, my sister, there are some things that will find you. Trouble will find you. Temptation will find you. Sickness will find you. Death will find you. Judgment will find you. Eternity will find you. Soon will you be gone from all these scenes. The grave will have your body. Your heirs will have your property. Eternity will have your immortal soul. Oh, my God, help us to-night to seek after Thee and prepare for heaven!

Don't put it off as did the Scotch woman when in the night time she became anxious about her soul, and she rose and wrote in a book this resolution, "One year from to-night I will surrender my heart to God," and retired to her couch, but could not sleep. She rose and made a better resolution, and recorded in her book, "One month from to night I shall surrender my heart to Christ." She retired again to bed, but could not sleep.

She got up and made a better resolution still, she thought, and wrote down in the book, "One week from to-night I will attend to the matters of my soul," and then retired and went to sleep. The next day she went out into the gayeties of life. Before the week was ended sickness came and her soul had gone. The delirium lifted itself from her mind just long enough to allow her to say, "I'm a week too late." Oh, my friends, to be a year too late, to be a month too late, to be a week too late, to be a day too late, to be an hour too late, to be a minute too late, to be a second too late, is to be for ever and for ever too late. Oh, come unto God to-night!

THESE YOUNG MEN,

these thousands of young men here—oh, come into the kingdom of God to-night! It is within arm's reach now. It is within one inch of your immortal soul. Young men, with all the possible influence you have for Christ, come out and exert it. Don't you know how it is in a factory, a store, or a shop, if one young man comes to Christ they are very apt all to come? They follow the example of the decided man; and I say to every young man in this vast assemblage, if you will give your heart to Christ you will have a mighty influence in the right direction, and your friends will in all likelihood come with you. It won't be necessary, perhaps, even for you to invite them, they will know that to-night you gave your heart to God.

Oh, young men, give your hearts to God! I shall never meet the great multitude of you again until I see you before the throne of Christ. Oh, come into the kingdom, and come now. "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation." "To-day, if ye will hear His voice." Now is the time to make your choice.

"Say, will you to Mount Zion go;
Say, will you have this Christ or no?"

When I was preaching in Kansas a few months ago, a young man sat on the steps of the pulpit, and I saw the tears rolling down his cheeks, and I wondered who he was, and I found out that he was the son of a minister of the Gospel in the eastern part of our country. He had gone out West to escape from the influences of the Gospel, and plunged into all kinds of sin, but I heard that that night he gave his heart to God. "The Spirit and the Bride say, Come, and whosoever will let him come and take of the water of life freely." God bless you and bring you all into the kingdom.

Ye aged ones, almost home, worshipping God leaning on the top of your staff, be comforted—almost home. Men and women in middle life, cast about by many cares and toils and anxieties, take good courage. Put your trust in the Lord and He will see you through. God be merciful unto us, and bless us, and cause His face to shine upon us. Amen and amen.

"It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after death the judgment." "Behold He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him." Hark, I hear the sound as of the rush of chariot-wheels. The heavens begin to glow. They redden. They roll back in waves of glory. Herald angels in advance cry through all the heavens, "Make way. God is coming. The judgment! the judgment!" while all the islands of the sea and all the continents of the earth, with uplifted hands, repeat it, "Make way! God is coming to judgment! to judgment!"

"Oh, on that day, that wrathful day,
When man to judgment wakes from clay,
Be thou, O Christ, the sinner's stay,
Though heaven and earth should pass away."

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

Mrs. Spencer Accounts for Swords and Pistols being Found in her Apartments—Jemmy Mehaffy's Sense of his own Importance Increases with his Trouble—He is Lodged in Prison—Mr. Lemaire Breaks the News about Percival to Lucie—She Laughs at the Charges made against Percival—She Resolves to Save Him—She Meets him, and Entreats him to Flee from His Pursuers.

"I BEG your pardon, ma'am," said the sergeant to Mrs. Spencer, "if I have done something wrong. I'm not certain that I have, ma'am, and I'm sure, anyhow, I didn't intend it; but would you have the goodness, ma'am, to explain to me how these things—certainly not lady's tools"—and he held forth the long sword and big pistols—"have got somehow into a lady's apartment? It certainly is very extraordinary."

While the explanation was being given—Mrs. Spencer was all through violently sobbing—Sergeant Holder felt himself growing gradually very small, and before it was concluded was more than content to beat a hasty retreat from the lady's presence, especially when, having satisfied her grief, she opened upon him in an eloquent burst of feminine rebuke, and indignation for daring to insinuate anything derogatory to her husband's memory. We are aware that the sergeant had done nothing of the kind—was, indeed, perfectly innocent of the fact that such a person as Captain Spencer had ever existed—but the lady, with a lady's outraged feelings and pertinacity of will, would have it otherwise, and the sergeant was fain to withdraw, a discomfited, and let us hope a wiser, man. That this latter moral result was effected would seem to be indicated by the fact that only for a very brief period afterwards did he continue his household researches.

"Come," he said to his colleagues, looking about at the chaotic confusion around him; "I think we've done enough here for one day, anyhow. The fortune of war, I'm sorry to say, is against us. That Montaigne—cute fellow!—must have his treason papers somewhere else besides this. I vote, comrades, we quit the building and make for quarters." But after giving a dark look at Jemmy, he added, "As I've said we would, we'll, however, take this fellow a prisoner with us; and if it does nothing else, it will show we've been to execute our orders." Those whom the sergeant addressed were not less reluctant than himself to have done with a troublesome undertaking which had proved so utterly barren and unsatisfactory in its results.

They immediately prepared for departure, leading Jemmy with them, who piteously asked, as they led him downstairs, "How in the world they supposed the masther could do widout him?" Deigning no reply, they quietly passed through the hall, and heard with satisfaction the hall door close behind them, before Mrs. Spencer or her domestic had come to know the utter medley of affairs which they had left behind them. Jemmy Mehaffy, after being charged at the office of the police in Rathmines, and committed, was safely lodged by them in Richmond Jail, and there we shall leave him, while we return to Mr. Lemaire, whom we left sadly making his way to his residence.

When near the end of his melancholy walk, and his dwelling appeared in sight, a choking sensation gathered in his throat. He knew what a place of peace, happiness, and hope that house was up to the present moment; and then he pictured to himself how all this would be changed when he communicated his miserable tidings. He slackened his already slow step, and lingered in the purpose of his coming. "Would to heaven," he said within himself, "that Rathgar had been not here, but in India!"

There was no wisdom, however, in putting off the inevitable task before him. No matter how he might shrink from its performance, it must at some time be done, and delay was weakness, and would prove in the end useless. He therefore knocked at his door, and when in the hall inquired whether Mrs. Lemaire and Miss Lucie were within. From his altered manner the servant observed that something extraordinary had occurred. She anxiously asked, "Are you well, sir?" and then added, after getting no reply, "The mistress is out, but Miss Lucie is in the drawing-room." "So much the better," said Mr. Lemaire to himself. "I shall go up at once, and have it out with her."

When he entered the room, Lucie much wondered to see her father at that hour in the day ; but, running up to him, she as usual presented her cheek to be saluted. To her surprise, he folded her close to his heart, and held her there, while several times he kissed her ; he then gently drew her towards the sofa, placed her tenderly down, and took his seat beside her.

Looking lovingly but sadly into her face, he said, "Lucie, can you bear to hear some very unexpected and disagreeable news?"

"What can you mean, papa?" said the young lady, with nervous anxiety. "Oh, dear papa, do tell me! Have you lost a great deal of money—poor papa!—or has any evil thing taken place at the Castle ; or what is it, papa? I must know it. Oh, tell me!"

"I wish it was only something of the kind you mention that I had to tell you, my darling," said Mr. Lemaire ; "but, oh, Lucie, it is something far worse than that ; so much worse that I have been compelled thus to gradually prepare you to hear it."

At these words the young girl at once conjectured it was evil tidings about her betrothed, but certainly not such as her father had to tell. "Oh, dear papa," she cried, "what has happened to Percival? I know, from what you have said, it must be something about him. Is he taken dangerously ill, papa?" And then, when Mr. Lemaire paused in his reply, suspecting news even worse than that, gasping from intense emotion, her cheek all blanched, she, in her anguish, cried, "Oh, papa, dear papa, do tell me ; is he—" and her tongue faltered at the word, and twice she had to struggle before she could say, "Is he dead?" and she threw herself on his bosom for support.

"No, Lucie, no," Mr. Lemaire promptly answered ; "it is not that I have to tell you about Mr. Montaigne." And the formal mention of his name, not the long-familiar word Percival, caught her attention and sounded sharp and unpleasant upon the young girl's ear.

"Thank God!" she exclaimed. "Then my Percival, in God's love, is not lost to me."

"Listen to me," said Mr. Lemaire. "Lucie, darling, do not be so sure of that. Death, alas! is not the only thing that severs us in this world from those we love." With a wild stare, the fair young girl, at these words, looked full into her father's face.

Could it be that Percival had changed his love, and, depriving her of his heart, had transferred his affections to another? She had heard and read of such things being done, and a pang of jealousy shot through her heart that almost stopped its beating, and she gasped, unable to speak. Her father divined the thought that had passed through her mind, and at once sought to dispel it. "Do not imagine, my own dear child," he said, "that the tidings I bring you are that Mr. Montaigne has changed his love for you." "Oh, why do you, papa," she interrupted, "why do you call him by his formal address? Why do you not speak of him as you always did, of late, as Percival—my true and loving Percival?" she repeated.

"Because," said her father, speaking very low, yet distinct, "his truth and love may not now be worth possessing ;" and seeing that his daughter, with lips apart, panted for an explanation, he continued, "What would you say, Lucie, if it has come to light that Mr. Montaigne is a dangerous conspirator—a secret Papist and in heart a rebel has been heard to utter the most violent words against your Queen and her Government, and has openly declared himself as an avenger of John Mitchell? I perceive," said he, "that my words appear to you incredible, but I can tell you as a fact he has been sworn against, by a trustworthy informer, as being all that I have said, and this moment there is a warrant out for his apprehension."

Before Mr. Lemaire had quite finished his communication, his daughter sprang from his side, stood drawn up to her full height in the middle of the room, and after a short laugh, half sarcastic and half hysterical, said, "And, papa, do you—can you believe this? Percival a conspirator against his country—a Roman Catholic—a rebel thirsty for blood! What witches' dream can have come over you, papa, and what spirit of malevolent falsehood can have inspired those who have asserted such things of my beloved Percival? If ever loyal fidelity and Protestant truth beat in a human heart, I know that they beat in the heart of my own high-minded and Christian-souled Percival. Papa, I feel astonished, pained, and hurt, that for an instant you could have entertained a suspicion that these charges you have told me of could be true. Papa, it is unworthy of you. Percival has always so borne himself that you should have known their truth is utterly impossible. Were it not that you are my own dear papa, it would almost turn me against you," and the young girl drew herself a little back in token of her revulsion.

Mr. Lemaire looked on while his daughter, flushed and with uplifted head, was speaking, admiring her, yet unconvinced of her judgment concernng Percival. He remembered how something of the same indignant refusal to believe had full possession for a while of himself, and how he was compelled to bow before what he deemed unchallengeable proof. When his daughter, therefore, with exhausted breath, ceased to speak, he said, "Lucie, I honor and am proud of your reluctance to believe aught unworthy of him to whom you have pledged your affections ; any other conduct would be unbecoming my own true and noble-hearted daughter. But, look here, my own darling child, all this I have said of Mr. Montaigne has been sworn to, and one of our detectives, the most cautious and skilful man we have, has confirmed the depositions."

"Then he speaks an utter and cruel falsehood," interrupted Miss Lemaire, and that passionately ; for her conviction of Percival's innocence was so immovably fixed that nothing could shake it, and her whole moral nature was roused almost to frenzy at the wrong which she felt had been done him. "But, papa," she added, "I have no time to further reason with you or express my indignation. You have told me that a warrant is out for Percival's arrest : good, then I shall seek to save him."

Without waiting to hear anything in reply, she hurried to her room, and hastily put on her outdoor dress. Avoiding her father and, indeed, all in the house, she glided swiftly downstairs, left the house by the backdoor, then, screening herself from observation, she plunged into a shrubbery close at hand, and which had been planted round three sides of the premises, and at last made her way through it to a side entrance, and having gained a by-road near, she hurried along it.

It so happened that Percival had arranged to meet her that afternoon, on his return from college lecture, near the road in front of the Marquis of Ely's demesne, which has been previously mentioned. They often arranged thus to meet for a delightful stroll, for it avoided next-door jocular gossip and servant-girls' observations. Percival was at the appointed spot ready to greet her. Seeing her coming he moved in her direction, and when close, was about to give her his usual salutation, when no one was in sight, when she seized both his hands and cried out

"Percival, dearest, escape—fly for your life!—there is a warrant out for you apprehension!—evil men have sworn base falsehoods about you my father has told me so." (She did not sa however, that Mr. Lemaire had not so characte ized the falsehoods, and that it was her own fe ings which prompted this description.) "Y Percival ; wicked men are on your track, and y have not a moment to lose to evade them. O Percival, do hasten to be gone!" and, tears fi ing her eyes, she added, "May God, for Chris sake, help and protect you!"

TEMPERANCE JUBILEE FETE AT TH CRYSTAL PALACE, LONDON.

Fifty Years' Work—What is Utopian?—Acro the Hoosac Mountains—The First Temperan Pledge--A Boston Meeting in 1842—A Fig Round the Platform—How to Quell an Interr tion—Why Balaam's Ass Spoke—Temperan in Europe—Future Work—A Hopeful Prospe

NEARLY 40,000 persons assembled at the Cr tal Palace from all parts of England on Tu day, September 2nd, on the occasion of the Te perance Jubilee fête. The event of the day w the address of Mr. Gough, it being his last pu lic appearance in the country, except his farew meeting which is to take place at Hoxton H where he first spoke after his arrival in Engla on his present visit. The veteran Sam Bowly, Esq., presided over the meeting.

MR. GOUGH'S ADDRESS.

Fifty years have passed away, and how mu has been accomplished in those fifty yea Fifty years ago the first great efforts were m against this terrible evil of drunkenness.

In 1829 they began to work. Humble work though they were, they began to remove the t to prepare the place in which the corner-stone a grand superstructure should rest, and in 18 on the third day of June, I left my native vill to cross the Atlantic to try my fortune ; and fifty years of my life—my active life since I twelve years of age—and the fifty years of t perance work seem to run in some degree (if will allow me to say so without being egotisti in a parallel. Now we look back upon the f years of work.

We speak of what has been accomplished, l gentlemen, how has it been accomplished? has been accomplished by the blessing of on the efforts of those who have, in the sp of self-denial, gone out like iconoclasts to down the Dagon of abuses their fathers worshipped.

And I wish to say here that although we spoken of the mighty struggle of three and hundred years to get rid of an evil, yet I do lieve that the temperance movement has gr right out of the fact of the open Bible and preached Gospel to the people. It has gr directly out of the efforts of Christian men women, because all benevolence comes from Gospel, and there is no benevolence outside When we look back upon fifty years of wor we look upon fifty years of opposition? not q because there has been very little opposition ing the past few years.

There never was a movement yet that b fitted the world but what was opposed. E such movement has had to encounter stron position. There never was a movement started but there were those who stood on side, and cried out, "It's a Utopian scher What do they mean by "Utopian?"

Ask these men what "Utopian" means, they will perhaps do as a man did with me said, "It's all pure, clear, sheer, unadulter fanaticism." "Well," I said, "what do mean by fanaticism?" "What do I mean b why, I mean fanaticism, that's what I me "But," I said, "what is fanaticism?" " fanaticism—you know what fanaticism That's the only definition he could give me word that was frightening him from his dut

Never was there a movement started yet what there were men to cry out "Imposs impossible!" When railroads were first i duced in this country, what an opposition was to them. In the Quarterly Review, I t 1826, there is an article in which we read this, t a Member of Parliament in his place in the use of Commons said that it was utterly im- sible for a railway ever to compete with a al! "They talk of these machines," he l, "going through the country at the rate of nty miles an hour; why, I would rather trust self on the back of a Congreve rocket shell n behind such a machine as that." Railways, n, were opposed in every direction.

was riding from Worcester to Albany, right r that western road that crosses the Hoosac ntains, and at Springfield I wanted a book ead. Having obtained one, I read it: it was il Hall's "Travels in North America." It cribed the beautiful scenery, the gorges of the ntains, and the difficulties of the track, and said, "These Yankees talk of constructing a road over this route. As a practical en- eer, I pronounce it simply impossible." And e was I, in a train of cars and a locomotive ine with six driving wheels, snorting up a t ascent of 1800 feet, reading a book the hor of which, as a practical engineer, had nounced the construction of such a road nply impossible."

r. Lardner declared, as a mathematician, it utterly impossible for a steamer to cross the antic; and a steamer did cross the Atlantic, conveyed his mathematical propositions from land to America. I repeat, there never was ovement yet that benefitted the world but it with opposition; and at the commencement his movement it was the same. How small e its beginnings.

THE FIRST TEMPERANCE PLEDGE

I ever saw, read something like this: "Any nber of this association who shall be guilty ntoxication, or who shall become helplessly xicated, shall be fined twenty-five cents, un- such act of intoxication shall take place on fourth of July, or on any regularly appointed tary muster."

ow, you think that was small enough; and those who started the movement on that ciple were opposed and persecuted. Their s were destroyed; the glass in their conser- ories (when they had any) was broken, and r property damaged. Why, it used to be the om in the old time, when there was a tem- nce meeting held in the villages, for the er sort to go round and cut the hair off the ses' tails and cut off the manes, and cut the ness so as to produce some accident. I only tion this to show you the bitterness of the osition.

hen I began to speak, in 1842, we had many es to fight, yes, absolutely to fight, for a foot- d.

remember very well in a hall at Boston the mies of the movement had taken possession e times of the platform, and appointed one heir number, a prominent liquor-seller, to be hairman; and I remember the night we ght the battle and obtained the victory.

r. Grant, who is President of the Society, to me, "Will you run the risk of speaking his hall?" I said, "Certainly I will. I'm g to occupy my hour and a half, and I don't n to leave the platform till that hour and a is up." When I was introduced—oh, such ll and such howling!

he enemies of the cause began to form a cir- in the centre of the hall, and they danced sang,

"Heigho! the boatmen row, Sailing down the Ohio."

ch a noise and confusion you perhaps never rd. One man was on another's shoulders, and ting to a very fine picture on the wall, he , "Why, there's one of my ancestors!" It pened to be John Hancock, the one who put name first on the Declaration of Indepen- ce; and there was a descendant of John cock on the shoulders of a drunkard, him- intoxicated, and pointing to the picture! ell," I said, "your family is very much like a of potatoes—the best of them are underground" hat night we fought the battle. The gas was put out. One man was thrown from the platform. Some one took him by the collar of his coat and skirt and threw him out. My wife was in the gallery, and she thought it was me, and she felt dreadfully frightened. I had spoken on board the United States ship Pennsylvania, and a lot of the sailors were there, and they said, "You stand still and we'll keep them off." So the bluejackets stood round me, and every one as he came got a tremendous blow. They got on the platform and broke the table, and then they took the legs for weapons, and the water pitcher was broken. One man took the handle and laid open the side of another man's face with it, and then we began to think it serious.

I happened to have a new hat that day, and I put it under the table, and I thought some boy might step on it, so I took it out and put it on just as one of the sticks came crash down upon it, and a ruined hat was mine that night. But it was to me a very serious matter.

HOW TO STOP AN INTERRUPTION.

I give you this simply as an illustration of the opposition that we met in simply declaring that intoxicating liquor was not necessary to health or comfort, or physical, moral, or spiritual advancement—simply that, and no more than that. Those of us who spoke then were obliged to have our wits about us. We were interrupted sadly, and I would say this for the benefit of those teetotal advocates who may be here, that when you are interrupted in a speech do not stop to argue the point—just give them some little story, and it will do a great deal more than argument.

I remember a man one night who would persist in interrupting me. He made a terrible noise, and I knew that the liquor-sellers had set him on to his work—in fact, that he was a man who would not have come to disturb that meeting had he not been prompted to do so and fired by drink. So I said to him, "You remind me very much of a story I heard." He said, "Very well, let's have the story." I said, "There was a man who stammered very badly, and he was a notorious quiz, and he had one joke, only one, about Balaam and his ass, which he perpetrated on everybody he met. Those who knew him knew the joke, but he would tell it always. One day he said to a stranger, 'Can you tell me why—why it was—' and the remainder he couldn't get out for the life of him on account of his stammering; and his clerk, seeing his master's difficulty, said, 'Can you tell me why Balaam's ass spoke?' 'Yes, said the stranger, 'I think I can. Why, you know, Balaam was a stammering man, and got his ass to do his talking for him.'" That silenced the man; but it will show you what the kind of opposition was when I tell you that the relation of the story did more than all the argument that could possibly have been used, and, as I say, stopped the interruption at once.

Yes, we have had opposition, but now we can look back over fifty years and see the progress that has been made, not only here but in America and on the Continent. Why, twenty years ago I went to the Continent, and the very little time I was there I didn't like it. At every table the book was placed before you, and there was the cry of, "Vis wine," or, as they call it, "Vahn." "No vahn; ah, no vahn!"—and a shrug of the shoulder and a look of contempt. They would neglect you so palpably that you would feel exceedingly mortified because you didn't "vant any vahn."

And now it is very rarely that they put the book in your face, and if you say "No wine," it's a bow. Even on the Continent there is progress in this matter. I know very well that they take a good deal of the wines of the Continent, and I was told that I must drink them because the water would hurt me. Now, gentlemen, you know as well as I do that the wine-drinkers imbibe more water than we do. I have seen a man drink a quart bottle a day of this sour wine on the Continent, and four tumblers of water besides. I don't drink myself half a tumbler at my dinner.

It's a mistake to suppose that we teetotalers are always drinking water. We don't want it. We only drink when we are thirsty, and then drink to quench our thirst. Now, I saw but very little intemperance on the Continent as I saw it twenty years ago, though once in a while I did. At a table I saw three young English boys or young men of sixteen, seventeen, or eighteen years of age. They drank two quart bottles of champagne; and I could not help looking at them and thinking of what their future must be if the love of strong drink lays hold of them as it lays hold of so many who begin as they were beginning.

The fact is, that though we have had opposition and though we have had an immense amount of progress, there is

A GREAT DEAL OF WORK YET TO BE DONE.

I ask our opponents what beer has done for the working classes of Great Britain in the past twenty years? Are the working classes of to-day nobler, purer, better, more intelligent than they were twenty years ago? I tell you, there is a class of working men in this kingdom that is deteriorating, that is becoming brutal, that is becoming sodden, that is becoming stupid, that is becoming useless to society through the influence of beer; and yet some tell us that beer is a great blessing to working men. We have, then, an immense amount of work to do, and it is not at such meetings as these, in my opinion, that we get the strength and encouragement to do it.

We come to-day more for recreation than for speeches—more to look back upon the past and thank God—less to remember the discouragements than to look at the encouragements; to brighten up our armor a little, and get ourselves in better trim for a nobler struggle and a heavier conflict against our arch enemy.

This is not the place to make a speech or to enter into an argument, which some say I am unable to do. Very well, if I am not able to argue I am able to understand the question, for I have been for thirty-seven years working in it, and I know that when I speak to reformed men I speak to them from a standpoint upon which I can rest with certainty. I know something of the appetite for intoxicating drinks.

I KNOW WHAT THE BATTLE IS.

I know what it is to wrestle face to face with the enemy. I know what it is in burning fever to struggle against it. I know what it is, with great drops of sweat upon the forehead, to struggle face to face, foot to foot, hand to hand, breast to breast, wrestling with the foul devil who had fastened his fangs upon me and had put his arms around my neck.

I know what the conflict is, and, thank God!—and I say it from my inmost soul—I know what the victory is to stand free from the damning influences of drink. I know very well men tell us that we are never entirely free. Free in what sense?

I hold my freedom is to let it alone. If I touch it then I can't say I am free. I don't mean to say to you that I have the appetite for intoxicating drink, that I ever want it or long for it, not a whit; but I do say this, and I say it to every reformed drunkard, you are only free as long as you let it alone.

I am glad to meet you all here to-day, and congratulate you on the beautiful weather we are having. Shall we not take it as an omen of what is to be for our cause in the future? Shall we not believe that the day will yet come when the sunlight shall stand tip-toe upon the misty mountain-top to dispel all the clouds and all the fogs that will settle around our field of enterprise?

Let us, then, take courage—let us have faith in God, faith in one another, faith in our principles, faith in our organizations, and then let us, shoulder to shoulder, go on to victory; aye, and the angels will reply to our jubilant hosannas, "Victory, victory!" and those who have borked shall hang their battered armor on the wattlements of heaven, and cast their crowns before Him through whom and by whom every moral victory is achieved.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Twenty-second Anniversary of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting was celebrated September 23d. Many hundred persons were present, and churches of all denominations were represented. A more interesting record of cases of answered prayer than that of this world-famous meeting it would be impossible to find. One of the speakers said that it would occupy many hours merely to mention the cases of conversion which he knew of as having had their origin in the prayers of that meeting. He specially mentioned the case of the minister of an English church, now doing successful work in the old country, who attributed his conversion to the persevering prayers offered in Fulton Street.

Mr. Schieffelin, in describing the origin of the meeting, alluded to an interesting historical fact. It appears that the scene of the Daily Prayer Meeting, now the centre of a crowded business district where every inch of land is precious, was many years ago a grazing ground for cattle, and the identical plot on which the present building stands was given to a minister as a pasture for his cow, so that his family might be always supplied with milk. Mr. Schieffelin said "it had proved a goodly pasture in a spiritual sense, from which many ministers and laymen had drawn precious supplies."

Another City Burned.—A Fire Broke Out at Deadwood, D. T., September 26th, in which the entire business portion of the city was consumed. Thousands of people have been rendered homeless, and left in a destitute condition. The loss is roughly estimated at $2,000,000, on which there is little or no insurance. Deadwood was known throughout the Union as an extremely wicked city, where drinking and gambling were unusually common. So severe a calamity teaches a lesson to which all do well to take heed.

No Conscience and no Shame.—It was not to be expected that the devil would be idle when Dr. Talmage was proclaiming the way of salvation to tens of thousands in England. Accordingly he invented a story that after the Crystal Palace Good Templar Fête, on July 8th, in which Dr. Talmage said he was "as good a teetotaler as any one," the Doctor drank champagne of the finest brand at dinner the same day at Luton. Any one might have seen in a moment that this belonged to the same source with the abominable story about the drowning of the first Mrs. Talmage, which was so assiduously circulated in these States some time ago. Nevertheless, Satan procured the publication of his diabolical falsehood as an undoubted truth in the editorial columns of a high-class religious paper in London. The statement was shown to the Mayor of Luton, at whose table Dr. Talmage was said to have drunk the champagne, and he immediately telegraphed the following denial : "Dr. Talmage did not take any champagne, or wine of any kind, at my dinner on the 8th of July."

But the devil can always find agents who have neither conscience nor shame, so that the exposure of one falsehood does not hinder his inventing and circulating another. Stories as infamous as the one under notice are constantly propagated about every minister of Christ's, who gives Satan particular trouble, Mr. Moody himself not excepted. The thing most to be regretted is that right-minded Christian people are usually complacent about such scandals. As long as the members of Christ's witnessing church upon earth will not put themselves about to be shocked at moral outrages upon their own body, there can be no remedy for them short of a direct judgment from heaven.

A Six-Days' Walking Match in Madison Garden, New York, caused considerable excitement in the city last week. Many thousand persons paid a dollar each for the privilege of witnessing the race. Bulletins of the progress of the contest were scanned by crowds of anxious readers; while the daily journals devoted more space to the race every morning than they gave to matters of national importance.

It was clear, however, that the contest belonged to the category of matters which a "highly esteemed among men, but are an abomination in the sight of God" (Luke 16 : 15 The revolting exhibition of men with swolle limbs, blistered feet, and faces haggard from lo of sleep, dragging themselves wearily around th track, was a spectacle fit for the ancient Roma amphitheatre. The low buffoonery and gener dissipation which characterized the scene showe the injurious influence of the struggle. Bettin was extensively carried on, from the man wh staked his thousand dollars to boys who venture their cents on the issue. Nor was the conte free from a suspicion of fraud; bundles of te dollar bank-notes are known to have been offer newspaper reporters to write biased accounts the race, and an ex-champion wasted his tin and strength in silly antics, to the disgust of h supporters. Some interested party threw a lar stone to disable one of the walkers, and the li of another was said to have been attempted poison.

"She Hath Done What She Could."—A La in the West writes to us : "I have received se eral copies of the CHRISTIAN HERALD A SIGNS OF OUR TIMES, and am so much intere ed in them that I go to the neighbors to re them a sermon. Every Christian should be e couraged by the signs of our times, and eve unsaved one should be alarmed at the near a proach of the time when it will be said, ' which is filthy, let him be filthy still.' It do not seem enough that I lend a paper, but I and read it, and impress the necessity of maki a present application."

An Officer who Never Drank.—When Gene Grant was in command of the army before Vic burg, a number of officers were gathered at headquarters. One of them invited the party join in a social glass; all but one accepted. asked to be excused, saying that he "ne drank." The hour passed, and each went way to his respective command.

A few days after this the officer who decli to drink received a note from General Gran report at head-quarters. He obeyed the or and Grant said to him, "You are the office believe, who remarked the other day that never drank." The officer modestly answe that he was. "Then," continued the gene "you are the man I have been looking for to t charge of the Commissary Department, an order that you be detailed to that duty." served all through the war in that respons department, and afterwards, when General G became President, the officer who never dr was again in request. The President needi man on whom he could rely for some impor business, gave him the appointment.

Sojourner Truth, who is now in Her 1 year, thus accounts for her wonderful vit and longevity : "People ask me how I cam live so long and keep my mind, and I tell t it is 'because I think of the great things of not little things.' I don't fritter my mind in caring for trifles." She has lately undert a long journey to Kansas.

The Abduction of a Young Lady at Bu last week is one of the boldest attempts to e money which has of late years come befor public. A youth, employed as a telegraph ator, having need of money, contrived cruel deception to get possession of a y school-girl, and locked her up till she woul $500 from her father, for which she wrot order; but finally he took her word to sen money and released her. She told her fa and the fellow was arrested and confesse crime. The names of a number of childr wealthy parents, with their addresses, were f on his person with letters prepared for sen stating that unless the money were forw without delay, the child would be drowned.

Mr. George C. Needham, the well-k evangelist, hopes to commence a protr work in Mr. Moody's church in Chicago sh All Christians will hope that a rich blessing attend his labors in that populous city.

President Hayes, as a College Student, is d to have kept a minute diary, and examined nself as to his motives, purposes, ideas, and pirations. He declares himself as being at at time too ready to try the edge of his wit on ners; and perceiving this failing, he proceeded curb it. Whether this had the effect or not of nging about a change in the opposite direc- n, it is certain he became painfully bashful in ciety. From the two extremes he at last uck a medium.

He was addicted to every kind of manly orts, and excelled in shooting, hunting, swim- ng, and skating, while as a fisherman he s especially successful. He accomplished ne great feats in pedestrianism, walking forty les home to Delaware, in twelve hours, at ristmas time, and then after vacation back to mbier, when there were four inches of snow the ground.

Captain Adams, of the Whaler Arctic, gives t no spirit rations to his sailors, and finds hot ffee is much preferable to grog as a sustaining mulant under extreme cold. In this principle is confirmed by General Sir Garnet Wolseley, o has served in extremely hot as well as in y cold climates, and who affirms that in both nperatures tea and coffee are far preferable as verages to intoxicating liquors. He has proved s fact by experience. Ardent spirits are not be given to the crew of the Polar exploring p Jeannette, which has recently sailed from n Francisco under the auspices of the proprie- of the New York Herald.

The Misery of Covetousness has Received a sh illustration in the case of a Chinaman at ngshau who got a house and grounds that had en devastated during the Taiping rebellion. ving reclaimed the ground, he proceeded to g, and soon came to a jar, which, on opening, discovered to be filled with gold. The first ing that he did was to destroy certain papers ich were laid over the gold in the jar, fearing ey might invalidate his ownership of the gold. adually he invested the money in houses and ds, disclosing his good luck to very few until got secure from molestation. Latterly he has come unhappy, because a friend suggested that e documents which he had destroyed contained ormation as to the localities of other deposits gold. The thought of having thus lost fur- er sums of gold was dreadful, and he suffers m the upbraidings of wife, parents, children, d other dependents, besides constantly re- oaching himself; but the papers were consum- by fire, and the ashes afford no consolation. e evidently does not live in the spirit of the xt, "Let your conversation be without covet- sness, and be content with such things as ye ve, for God hath said, I will never leave thee r forsake thee" (Hebrews 13: 5).

A Prescription for Low Spirits.—An Ameri- n Missionary writes: Among our letters from me was one marked, "To be opened when u both feel sad." We have waited in vain for at time, and have been compelled to open the ter. We read: "Thou wilt call, and I will an- er Thee. Thou wilt have a desire to the work Thy hands." Both we and others have called, d He has answered. He has given us a desire this work, and we are very happy in the anti- pation of entering upon it. Pray ye therefore e Lord of the harvest that He will send forth her laborers into the harvest.

A Remarkable Mirage.—The Journal, Pub- hed at St. Thomas, Ontario, which is about n miles from the shores of Lake Erie, de- ribes a remarkable mirage which was seen at at place. Soon after twelve o'clock, Mr. John ok chanced to look in a southward direction m his house, and saw Lake Erie spread before m with all the distinctness of reality. After oking for a few moments, he called his family witness the scene.

The whole party could see the lake as if it ere only a few rods off, and the waves rolling regular succession toward the shore. Three eamers were speeding toward the east, the noke from their funnels streaming behind them, while a couple of vessels under sail were pursuing their steady course. They could see the lay of the land for a considerable distance along the coast, but it seemed as if some banks intervened to prevent a view of Port Stanley. The opposite coast of the United States was so distinctly visible that they could perceive the indentations and formations of the shore, the very trees, and a town away to the south-eastward, the buildings of which were plainly discernible. The meridian sun was shining brightly all this time, and an opaque cloud, fringed with pink, stretched along the southern sky from east to west. Under this cloud the mirage appeared, and after for some time presenting the scene described, faded, and gradually dissolved away in the direction of Buffalo.

A Company of Baptist Gentlemen have Purchased Round Island, in the St. Lawrence River, and have placed it at the disposal of the Baptist denomination of the United States and Canada, to hold international summer meetings. Round Island is one of the famous Thousand—really 1800—Islands of the St. Lawrence. It contains 150 acres of beautiful sun and shade land, with charming island scenery on every side. The work of preparing it for occupation has been begun.

A Text Misapplied.—Wisconsin has a New religious sect called the "Peculiar Children," but irreverently known by outsiders as "Babes in the Woods." A farmer of Osakana is the leader of these misguided people, and he has induced them to take up the most childish practices by a literal interpretation of the text, "Except ye be converted and become as little children ye shall not enter into the kingdom of Heaven."

How a Church was Built in the Sandwich Islands.—The Rev. Titus Coan, a missionary, writes: "Some of these islanders, when they wished to build a church, hitched 150 of themselves to each log, and dragged it eight miles; they dived ten to twenty feet for coral to make lime. The women subscribed $200 to the Church Erection Fund, payable and paid by making mats at a few a week; and subscriptions from men to this fund were paid by the profits on fire-wood sold at eight cents per stick, after ferrying seven sticks in a canoe across a twenty-mile wide channel. Then they began a foreign mission on the Micronesian Islands, two thousand miles away. Ought not the ready willingness of the converted heathen to deny themselves provoke other Christians to self-denial and good works?

Safe Climbing.—Dr. Thompson Relates that on one occasion he had climbed nearly to the top of a steep mountain, lifting his feet carefully over the projecting rocks, when faintly from below he heard a silvery voice call out, "Take the safe path, father; I'm coming after you." His heart stood still as he realized the danger of his precious boy. If fathers only remembered that the boys are indeed coming after them, how differently they would walk! If they drink, or use profane language, they must expect it in the boys. If they get angry, they will see the same thing in their children. God gives lives into a parent's keeping to be fitted for an endless future. The thought of that fact ought never to be absent from a Christian parent's mind.

Palestine for the Jews.—The "Jewish Chronicle," commenting on a recent letter in the Alliance Israelite, says: "Who can doubt that, in exchange for a substantial fixed tribute, the Sultan would willingly part with the power of nominating Pashas to misadminister Palestine, or that under good government the land might easily pay an increased tribute? The solution of the Turkish problem evidently is the substitution of tributary States for provinces governed directly from Constantinople. This process is still to be begun in Palestine and Armenia. The Armenian Commonwealth would be Chris tian, but the State formed out of Palestine might well be Jewish. No sentiment rallies round Palestine so strongly as the Jewish sentiment."

THE ONE FOUNDATION.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ."—1 CORINTHIANS 3: 11.

The Foundation the Main Part of a Structure—Christ the Foundation of our Religion—I. Without Him No Church—1. He is its First Portion—2. He is its Support—3. He gives it its Shape—4. He is Indispensable to it—II. Without Him No Gospel—1. He is its Mediator—2. He is its God—3. He is its Essence—Wholesome Teaching of the Early Church—III. Without Him No Hope of Salvation—Every other Hope Fallacious—The Man with the Bad Bank-Note—IV. Without Him No Christian—He the Christian's Model—He the Christian's Life.

UPBUILDING is very important, but the first question must always concern the foundation. However quickly, however cleverly a man may build, if the foundation be unsound he is a foolish builder; and however slowly, however laboriously a man may proceed, his building will not put him to shame if he has set his walls erect upon a firm basis.

This is emphatically true in spiritual things, for there the foundation is of the utmost importance. The hearer of the word, who is not a doer also, comes to a fatal end, because, as the Saviour says, he has built upon the sand, and therefore his fabric in the day of storm and flood is swept away, while he who hears the word and does it is secure because he digs deep and lays his foundation upon a rock, and therefore his building survives the rains of trial from above, the floods of persecution from without, and the mysterious winds of Satanic temptation which howl from every quarter. The best masonry must crack and fall if the groundwork is unstable: the higher the pinnacle the speedier its fall if the base is insecure.

As to what the foundation is in the religion of Jesus Christ there is no question. This verse declares it to be decided beyond controversy. A man may build the superstructure in some measure according to his own taste and judgment, but it must be based upon the one foundation; there may be room for varieties of style in the upper building, but there can be no variety in the groundwork. That is fixed forever by the unchanging God, who says, "Behold, I lay in Zion a foundation stone." It must be acknowledged that all Christian minds and lives do not take exactly the same form and fashion: there are among the best of Christian builders certain grades of excellences,—one man builds with gold, another with silver, and a third with precious stones; but as to the foundation, all are on a level, Christ is all and in all.

Whether the gracious life be rich as a golden palace, or pure as a temple of silver, or substantial as a tower of marble, whether it be public or obscure, wide or narrow' it must in every case be built upon the same basement of eternal rock: "for other foundation can no man lay than that is laid." You may say "we will agree to differ" about matters which concern the superstructure, but we must agree to agree as to the foundation; for if we are not at one with the plain statement of the text we are in the wrong.

The apostle is dogmatic to the very last degree: "Other foundation can no man lay." "But," saith one, "various teachers did lay other foundations." The apostle will not admit that they were foundations: they were not worthy of the name, the imposture was too shallow to succeed. No builder if he looked upon a heap of sand poured into an excavation would admit that it was a foundation. If he saw a mass of decayed vegetation and garden rubbish heaped together no architect would for one moment allow it to be spoken of as a "foundation."

Paul declareth that there is but one foundation, and that there is none beside it, or beyond it; and that the one only, unalterable, immovable, everlasting foundation is Jesus Christ. It is not to be imagined that there are other foundations somewhat differing and only a little inferior to the Lord Jesus: there is no other, and no other can be laid. It is not a question of comparison, but of monopoly. All other groundworks and principles, whatever may be said in their praise, are mere falsehoods if they are set forth as foundations, for the Lord Jesus has exclusive possession of that title, and in Him alone all that is fundamental is summed up: "Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved."

I will sketch out my discourse with these four lines, which I may not always be able to keep from intersecting each other, but they shall each be marked deeply and broadly, so that none can help seeing them: 1st, No church but what is built on Christ; 2d, No gospel but what is built on Christ; 3d, No hope of salvation but what is built on Christ; and 4th, no Christian but what is built on Christ.

I. First, there is

but what is built on Christ. I mean, of course, no true, no real church. There are many churches in the world, so called, but this may be laid down as a first principle, that there is but one church, and that this one church is built upon Christ alone. Whatever community, congregation, hierarchy, sect, or corporation may call itself a church, or even the church, if it is not built upon Christ it is not a church at all. No matter how great in numbers, or how ancient, or how wealthy, or how learned, or how pretentious, bigoted, dominant, or exclusive it may be, it is not Christ's church, if it is not built upon Christ.

1. To begin with, a foundation is the first portion of a building; and so is the Lord Jesus first and foremost with His church, for His people were chosen by Him. God has always had in His purpose and decree a chosen people, but He has had no such people apart from Christ. The apostle saith: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ: according as He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world." We were chosen in Christ Jesus; He is "the first-born among many brethren," and the Lord has "predestinated us to be conformed to the image of His Son." The first setting apart of the church and making it to be the peculiar inheritance of God was in connection with Christ.

"'Christ, be my first elect,' he said,
Then chose our souls in Christ our head."

2. But next, a foundation is the support of all, and there is no church but that which derives all its support from Christ Jesus. If there be any company of people calling themselves a church who depend for salvation and eternal life upon any thing beside, or beyond the merit of Christ's atoning blood, they are not a church. That all things are of God, and that He hath reconciled us unto Himself by Christ Jesus, is a truth never to be doubted. The atoning Saviour is the corner-stone of the church. He is the one rock of our salvation, the one pillar of our strength. As living stones we are built up into a spiritual house, but we one and all rest and depend upon Him, and upon no other.

To us the word of the Lord has come with power,—"Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ." The great atoning sacrifice of Christ must be the sole reliance of the whole church as well as of each individual, and this must be set forth with great clearness and distinctness as its first and greatest doctrine—salvation by Christ Jesus: "In whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace." The atonement taken away, no church remains. Call the community a religious club if you like, but it is no church when once the atonement made by the Lord Jesus, through His death in the room and stead of His people, is denied or ignored.

3. Furthermore, a foundation has the shaping of the building, and the true church shapes and forms itself upon the Lord Jesus as its ground-plan and outline. The shape of a building must, to a very large extent, be determined by its foundation. If you have ever traced the foundations of an ancient abbey or castle, as they have appeared on a level with the soil, you have proceeded to infer the form of the building from the run of the ground line. Here was a sharp angle, there was a circular tower; there was a buttress, and there was a recess. The building must have followed the ground line, and so must every true church be built upon Christ, in the sense of following His word and ordinances to the best of its knowledge and understanding. The law of Christ is the law of the church.

All the decrees of popes and councils, all the resolutions of assemblies, synods, presbyteries, and associations, and all the ordinances of men as individuals, however great they be, when they are all put together, if they at all differ from the law of Christ, are mere wind and waste paper, nay, worse, they are treasonable insults to the majesty of King Jesus. Those who build apart from the authority of Christ build off of the foundation, and their fabric will fall. There is no law and no authority in a true church but that of Christ Himself; we who are His ministers are His servants and the servants of the church, and not lords or law-makers. To His law a faithful church brings all things as to the sure test.

As churches we are not legislators, but subjects; it is not for us to frame constitutions, invent offices, and decree rites and ceremonies, but we are to take every thing out of the mouth of Christ, and to do what He bids us, as He bids us, and when He bids us. Parliaments and kings have no authority whatever in the church, but Christ alone rules therein. If any portion of a church be not based upon Christ it is a mere deforming addition to the plan of the great Architect, and mars the temple which God has built, and not man. What a blessed thing it is to feel that you belong to a church which has a rock under it, because it is constituted by Christ's authority. We feel safe in following an ordinance which is of His commanding, but we should tremble if we had only custom and human authority for it.

4. A foundation is indispensable to a building, and so Christ is indispensable to a true church. In a house you could do without certain of the windows, you might close a door, and you might remove parts of the roof, and still it might be a house, but you cannot have a house at all if you take away the foundation; and so you cannot have a church of Christ if Jesus Christ be not there as the foundation and corner-stone. When sermons are preached without so much as the mention of Christ's name, it takes more than charity, it requires you to tell a lie, to say, "That was a Christian sermon;" and if any people find their joy in a teaching which casts the Lord Jesus into the background, they are not His church, or else such teaching would be an abomination to them. Yet have I heard it said that from some ministries you may go away like Mary Magdalene from the sepulchre, exclaiming, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him."

Let us put this, our first point, in a few sentences. It is not the union of men with men that makes a church if Jesus Christ be not the centre and the bond of the union. Neither can a church be created by a mere union to a minister. Neither is a church made by the following of any particular form or rite. No, most blessed Lord, Thou must be there, or nothing is there! Pastors, elders, deacons, teachers, evangelists, these are courses of precious stones in the heavenly temple, but without Thee they are no church, for the foundation is wanting. All Thy saints come to Thee and rest on Thee, O Christ; and in Thee all the building, fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord. Thou, O Christ, art the seed-corn out of which the church grows, the stem from which it branches, the head in which it lives, the shepherd by whom it is fed, the captain by whom it is marshalled, the husband to whom it is married: Thou art, indeed, the all in all of the church which Thou hast redeemed with Thine own blood.

Thus far, then, we have declared that there is no church except that which is built on Jesus Christ. This truth we assert in the face of all men; let them make what they will of it.

II. Secondly, we assert that there is but what is built on Jesus Christ. There are many pretended Gospels in the world. Paul said once "another Gospel," and then he corrected himself, and said, "which is not another," for strictly speaking there is only one Gospel, and there cannot be two. The good news, God's good news to men, is one. There never were two Gospels, for there never were two Saviours or two redemptions, and there never will be: but a Saviour and a redemption are necessary t a Gospel, and therefore there can be only one The foundation of the Gospel is one, namel Jesus Christ, and there is no other possibl foundation.

1. For, first, there is but one Mediator, by whon God speaks words of grace. "There is on God, and one Mediator between God and men the man Christ Jesus." If then, beloved, an man shall come to you and say, "God hath spoken to me, and bidden me say to you somewhat other and above what Jesus hath said," receive him not. If any man say unto you, " have a revelation from heaven, and God bids m speak," if he speak not according to the wor of Christ Jesus he is a false prophet, and comet not from God at all. Yea, moreover, if bisho or council, or church speak otherwise than Chri has spoken, the truth is not in any of them.

2. The true Gospel has Christ's divine pers as its glory, and there can be no Gospel witho this. Christ is God, and in Him dwelleth all t fulness of the Godhead bodily. In the pers of Christ the Divinity has come down to us heal our diseases and remove our griefs. No if you hear of a Gospel which begins by sayi that Christ is not the Only-begotten of the F ther, or that He is not the Son of God, cl your ears to it, for it is not the Gospel of G Unless Jesus be extolled as certainly God o all, blessed forever, the preaching is not Gospel.

3. Jesus Christ is the essence of the Gosp He Himself is the good news, as well as the dium of it. The good news is, that God h sent His only-begotten Son into the world t we might live through him. Eternal redempt has been obtained for us by the life, death, resurrection of the Lord Jesus, and this is Gospel. There is pardon through His blo justification through His righteousness, sanctification through His Spirit. Complete vation is freely provided for believers in H and the grace of God through Him is abund ly displayed to the very chief of sinners. hath made Him to be unto us wisdom, and ri eousness, and sanctification, and redempti in fact, all the blessings that are needed to man up into the favor of God, and keep there forever, are stored up in the person of sus, in whom God's love hath displayed itse the fullest degree.

Jesus is the sum and substance, crown glory of the Gospel. If, then, you hear a Go in which the freewill of man is spoken of as main agent, in which the works of man, o forms and ceremonies practised by priests set up as being fundamental things, reject teaching, for it is not the good news heaven. The one good news is this,—" was in Christ, reconciling the world unto I self, not imputing their trespasses unto the Let others preach what they please; as fo "we preach Christ crucified." Jesus Hi preached the very Gospel of the Gospel He cried, "Come unto Me, all ye that labo are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Now then, brethren, for I speak to mar u who teach the Gospel, I beseech you to re- lect my simple text of to-day, and henceforth ch nothing apart from Christ. The teaching doctrines is not the teaching of the Gospel if se doctrines be held in a dry,didactic style rt from Christ. Suppose I preach the doc- ne of election—that is one thing ; but unless I ach that we are chosen in Christ I have left the foundation, and my teaching crumbles the ground : as a bowing wall shall it be, and a tottering fence. Suppose I preach final per- erance, it is well ; but I have not preached the spel unless I show that it is because Jesus es we shall live also, and that the preservation the saints depends on their union with Him. ppose I am teaching justification, it is not true justification unless it is the righteous- s of God in Christ Jesus which I hold forth. Herein I commend to you the example of the lier preachers of the church. From such of ir writings as remain we gather that they elt much upon the actual events of the Re- mer's life. They are not always so clear as could wish upon the great doctrines as Paul es them to us, but there is one point in which y excel. You may not hear enough from m about justification by faith, but you hear a at deal concerning the precious blood of rist: they do not always speak so clearly n regeneration as we could desire, but they ak much of the resurrection of Christ, and of newness of life which His saints enjoy in vir- thereof. Pardon to them is a washing in blood of Christ : conversion is being called Christ : resurrection is a risen Christ.

very thing is brought out as a matter of fact sing from the actual life and death of the iour, and I am free to confess that I greatly nire this way of preaching the Gospel. How es Paul put it? What was the Gospel to ? Hear him : "Moreover, brethren, I de- re unto you the Gospel which I preached unto . which also ye have received, and wherein stand ; by which also ye are saved, if ye keep memory what I preached unto you, unless ye e believed in vain. For I delivered unto you t of all that which I also received, how that rist died for our sins according to the Scrip- es ; and that He was buried, and that He rose in the third day according to the Scriptures ; that He was seen of Cephas, then of the lve." Thus, you see, Paul's body of divinity the life and death of that only embodied di- ity, the Lord Jesus.

y all means let us have practical-preaching, plenty of it, and let it come down sternly faithfully on the vices of the times ; but rely to preach against this and that vice, and l this and that virtue, is a mission fit enough Socrates or Plato, but does not well beseem inister of Jesus Christ. Set Jesus forth, my ctical brother. His example shames vice encourages virtue. Set Him up as the rror of all perfection, and in Him men will what they ought to be, and learn how to me at it. Jesus Christ, then, is the only Gos- . We leave that point, being abundantly e that you are persuaded of it.

II. Thirdly. There is

t that which is built upon Christ. This is an- er point upon which I need not speak much. ill only spend a few minutes in talking upon tain other hopes. No doubt some think it st be well with them because they were ught up from their childhood most respec- bly, their parents were excellent Christian ple, and they believe that they themselves, ving never done any thing very wrong, are no ubt safe. Ah, my dear hearers, if this is your ly hope, you are lost, for you are dead in sin. at which is born of the flesh—the best of sh that ever was—is flesh, and flesh and blood not inherit the kingdom of God. You must born again, you must have a far better hope n any which can spring out of your birth and r relations.

"Ay, but," saith another, "I had all the cere- nies of the church performed upon me." Yes, and it makes no difference to me what church it was. If you are building even upon rites which God has given, they will not suffice you ; they cannot bear the weight of your soul. Baptism, the Lord's Supper, or fifty thousand sacraments, if men were to make so many, would not help you one solitary inch. The only foundation for your soul's hope must be Christ, and none of these outward things. "Ah," saith another, "but I have diligently performed a great many good works." I would to God you had ten times as many good works ; but if you have committed one single sin no works can save you. All the good works of the best men that ever lived would make but a rotten foundation for them if they were to place reliance thereon. Abound in good works, but do not trust them. Human merit is a foundation of sand.

"But I have had special spiritual feelings," says one ; "I have been broken down, I have been lifted up." Yes, you may have been crushed down to hell's door, and lifted up to heaven's gate, but there is nothing in feelings and excitements which can be a ground of hope. "Why," says one, "it has troubled me that I have not had these feelings." Do not let it trouble you, but go to Jesus Christ and rest in Him ; feelings or no feelings. High frames and low frames are delusions all, if they be trusted in. We can no more be saved by our feelings than by our works. "Oh, but," saith another, "I have confidence that I am saved, for I have had a wonderful dream, and, moreover, I heard a voice, and saw a vision." Rubbish all! Dreams, visions, voices! Throw them all away. There is not the slightest reliance to be placed upon them. "What, not if I saw Christ?" No, certainly not, for vast multitudes saw Him in the days of His flesh, and died and perished after all. "But surely a dream will save me." It will give you a dreamy hope, and when you awake in the next world your dream will be gone.

The one thing to rest upon is the more sure word of testimony : Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, and whosoever believeth in Him is not condemned. I believe in Him, and, therefore, I am not condemned. Why do I believe my sin to be forgiven? Because Jesus died to put away the sins of believers, and there is no condemnation to those who are in Him. Why do I believe myself to be justified? Because he that believeth is justified ; the word of God says so. How do I know that I am saved? Because Jesus Christ has declared that whosoever believeth in Him is not condemned.

You see, then, there is no hope of salvation but what is fixed upon Christ alone ; and I do invite and entreat you, if any of you have any hope which goes beyond Christ or beside Christ, get rid of it, throw it on a dunghill, and loathe it as an insult to God. Do as the man did with the bad bank-note. When he found it was a forgery he buried it, and ran away as fast as he could, for fear any body should think the note had ever been in his possession. So, if you are trusting in any thing that is not of Christ, bury your faith, and run away from it, for it is a false confidence, and will work ill to your soul. Let your faith cry, "None but Christ": all-saving faith delights in that cry. For eternal salvation, "other foundation can no man lay than that is laid."

IV. Our last point is this,—there is but the man built on Jesus Christ. Here is a Christian, and of one thing in him I am sure : I cannot tell whether he holds Arminian views or Calvinistic views, but if he is a Christian he has no foundation but Christ. Here is a person who reverences the Pope, here is another who glories in the name of Protestant, here is a third who is a Baptist : which is the Christian out of these? I answer, he is the Christian that is built on Christ, whoever he may be ; but if he can do without Christ he is not worthy the name of Christian. What do we mean? Why this. I mean first, every man to be a Christian must rest his whole soul upon Christ as to eternal salvation. There must be no stuttering or stammering over that ; there must be no mixing up the merits of Jesus with priests or ceremonies ; no, it must be a clear, straight line, —Christ for me, Christ every thing for me, my sole and only hope. Any deviation here is fatal. On the cross is written, Spes unica, and it remains the one only hope of a burdened soul.

Next, if you are to be a Christian, Christ must be your model; by the aid of His Holy Spirit, you must try to do what He would have done in your position and under your circumstances. You are not to say, "I cannot follow Christ in this :" you are never to renounce His leadership. If you do you must give up being a Christian, because you are bound to take up His cross and follow Him. He claims to be your King when He becomes your Saviour. A true Christian is a man who builds upon Christ as his model as walls are built on a foundation. A true Christian is one whose growing up is in Christ, for, strange to say, the temple of God grows. Nor need we wonder, for it is a living temple.

I have seen magnificent pieces of architecture, masterpieces, and it has struck me when I looked at them that they must have grown. An ordinary, clumsy bit of work displays the mason and the carpenter, but perfect architecture looks as if it grew ; and Christ's church does grow, for Christ's people grow. But all our up-growing must come out of Christ. When a man says, "Years ago I used to worship with these Christian people, and I felt very happy with them, but I have now more education and have got beyond them," he is guided by his pride and not by grace. No true Christian talks so. The higher he grows the more he grows into Christ ; the wiser he is the more he shows the wisdom of Christ. If he has begun aright he may advance as far as he can, but he never can advance beyond Christ ; he will get to be less and Christ will be more and more to him, for he is not a Christian who does not still stick to this,—that the foundation goes as far as he means to go, and he builds never beyond that, but builds upward upon that, and upon that alone.

And he, again, is the true Christian who lives for Christ, to whom Christ's glory is the great object of his being. He is a Christian who reckons that time wasted which is not used for Jesus, that substance wasted which is not used in obedience to Jesus : who considers that he does not live except as Christ lives in him.

Brothers and sisters, I pray that you may all be Christians of this sort, only do let it be with you evermore Jesus Christ. I do not like to preach a sermon without feeling the presence of my Master. I have done so, but never to my own comfort. I cannot bear to come away from the Monday-evening prayer-meeting without feeling that the Lord has been there, and He generally is. The true heart does not like to engage in any kind of enterprise without first consulting Him, and doing it in His sight. We are a very busy church, and I want you, as a busy church doing a great deal, always to keep the Master near you.

The most holy work gets to be mere routine, to be done mechanically, unless we enjoy His dear love, and sweet presence, and blessed smile in the doing of His will. Sit at Jesus' feet with Mary as well as work for Him like Martha. May He be the foundation of every thing, not only of the church, but of our hope, of our character, of every little thing we do. When you are laying the first stone of a new enterprise, lay it upon Christ with fair colors. Set it in the vermilion of His precious blood ; perfume it with the oil of gratitude, and lay it upon Him alone ; so shall you build for eternity, and glorify His precious name.

An Evangelical Sign—The Spanish Authorities Obliterate it—The Institutions at La Force—Visits Mr. Spurgeon at Mentone—Twenty Sermons in Rome—The Triumphal Arch—The Catacombs—The Scala Santa—The Excavations at Pompeii—Return to America.

When our schools at Madrid were established and a place was opened for preaching the Gospel, a sign was placed outside over the entrance announcing that this was an evangelical place of worship for preaching the Gospel. After this sign had existed a considerable time official directions were sent to Mr. Fenn to have it painted over, so that the announcement might be obliterated. But the painter who had done the work, being at heart grieved at having to destroy his own work, and sorrowful also that these schools should be hindered instead of being encouraged by the Government, painted the sign over with water colors, so that still in a measure what had been painted before could be seen.

Some time after also the rain made the former painting still more visible. Now the Government sent by night their own painter to daub the sign thickly over with oil paint. May the Christian readers be led to pray much for Spain, that it still may be kept open for the preaching of the Gospel and the circulation of the Holy Scriptures; and may they also especially pray for those who labor in the Gospel in that country.

From Madrid we went back to France, where I held one meeting at Bayonne and one at Biarritz. We then went to Pau, which is a great resort of the English gentry during the winter, where I had nine precious and important meetings. From Pau we went to Bordeaux, where I preached three times, and thence proceeded to La Force, where I preached twice. At La Force we saw some remarkable institutions, which the loving heart of Mr. John Bost has founded for the benefit of epileptics, idiots, the insane, and persons otherwise grievously afflicted in mind or body. Pray for this dear man of God, who through immense pressure of work is himself now in very feeble health.

We then went to Cannes, where I preached fifteen times, and had a very important and profitable time. After leaving Cannes we visited Nice, where I preached fourteen times. From Nice we went to Mentone, where I held twelve meetings. In all these different places on the Mediterranean, so exceedingly frequented during the winter months by visitors from various countries, I held meetings especially for them; and this was just one point which made my service so important, because many through my work and writings knew me and were ready to come and hear.

I cannot leave this notice of Mentone without mentioning that, in addition to having very happy interviews with various Christians, I enjoyed especially the intercourse I had with Mr. Spurgeon, with whom I spent repeatedly a considerable time. After leaving Mentone we went into Italy. At Bordighera, on the frontier, I preached twice, at San Remo once, and thence we set out, via Genoa and Pisa, for Florence, where I preached nineteen times, and where we spent a very happy and profitable time. From Florence we went to in various languages, with or without translation into Italian, as I had done in Florence, so that as many as possible who desired to hear the truth might be benefitted. From my earliest days, through the classical education I had received, Rome had great attractions for me; but that which now, as a servant of the Lord Jesus, especially interested me was the triumphal arch erected by the people and the Senate to Titus after his destruction of Jerusalem.

This triumphal arch, just eighteen hundred years old, is well preserved, and under it you see in sculpture the golden candlestick taken from the Temple, the two silver trumpets with which the priests had to blow, and the Jews led along by their conquerors in chains. The catacombs in which the early Christians hid themselves, and where for a very long time they carried on their worship and buried their dead, being immensely long subterranean caverns and passages, extending for hundreds of miles round the city, likewise interested us much, because for centuries these caves were thus used.

One of the most affecting

was the Scala Santa, a staircase upon which poor deluded devotees went up on their knees because a papal indulgence connected with doing it is granted. But wherever the eye turned almost you saw idolatry; no longer now the idolatry of pagan Rome, but of so-called Christian Rome. I counted it, therefore, an especial honor to be allowed to witness for the Lord "in Rome also."

From Rome we went to Naples, where I was permitted to preach; it is the largest city in Italy. Here, as everywhere else, I had happy intercourse with Christians, preaching in all the various evangelical churches gladly, where they held the Head even Christ, and were sound in the foundation truths of our most holy faith; for I take especial delight in seeking to promote love and union among the various bodies of believers.

While in Naples we saw the awful destruction permitted by God through the eruption of Vesuvius, A.D. 79, just 1800 years ago, whereby many hundreds of persons suddenly lost their lives, and the two towns of Pompeii and Herculaneum were buried. They are now gradually being disinterred. We saw hundreds of buildings, houses, temples, theatres, shops, bakeries, etc., which have been cleared from the ruins around them—even the very bread taken out of the ovens which was in them when the eruption came. The lava which we saw in ascending Vesuvius impressed me more with the power of God than anything I ever remember to have seen; for these masses, which flowed out of the crater of that mountain in a liquid state, seemed to me far greater than the mountain itself. What cannot God do? But I must not enlarge here.

After leaving Naples I preached also at Bologna twice, in Venice five times, in Brescia twice, at Como five times, in Milan nine times, at Turin five times, and in the Waldensian Valleys seven times. I counted it an especial honor to be allowed to witness for the Lord in these valleys, where so many thousands of Christians were martyred for the truth, were imprisoned, banished, or suffered the loss of all their earthly possessions. I especially commend the descendants of these godly forefathers to the prayers of the Christian readers, that they may be blessed spiritually, and may greatly glorify God in this nineteenth century, as they now enjoy perfect religious liberty.

We then went to Paris, and after I had preached there twice we left for Bristol, where we arrived on June 18th, 1879, after I had preached altogether during these nine months and twelve days 286 times, in forty-six different towns or cities.

The longer I thus move about on these preaching tours, the more I see how greatly my labors are owned by the Lord, and the more I am convinced that it is His holy will I should spend while the Lord Jesus tarries, and health and strength are continued to me, in going from city to city, and from country to country, to preach the Gospel of the grace of God, and in seeking to benefit Christians through the amount of knowledge and experience I have obtained in the service of the Lord during the past fifty-three years.

After we have tarried, therefore, about ten weeks in Bristol, we propose, on August 28th, 1879, to sail again for the United States, as I had to leave America last year with one hundred and eight written invitations, which I had not been able to accept before we had to return to England. I recommend myself and my dear wife for this service to the prayers of the Christian reader.

We are glad to add to the above interesting account that Mr. Müller arrived in New York on Saturday, the 6th of September, and after preaching every day for a fortnight in this city, Newark, and Brooklyn, left for a short tour in more distant parts of New York and New Jersey. Up to the time of his leaving he had preached only once in English, at Brooklyn, his other services having been exclusively among Germans. We shall give a life and portrait of this man of God soon.

DR. TALMAGE'S LAST SUNDAY IN LONDON.

The visit of Dr. Talmage to Europe has now terminated, and he will probably be once more in his native country on September 30th.

The last Sunday of his stay in London he preached twice. In the morning he occupied the pulpit of Surrey Chapel, from which the eminent minister, Rowland Hill, once delivered his remarkable discourses. The building, although a very large one, was crowded to its utmost capacity, and it was computed that as many persons had to be refused admission as succeeded in effecting an entrance. We need hardly add that an equally crowded audience heard the Doctor at his evening service.

In the evening Dr. Talmage preached at the Agricultural Hall, one of the largest buildings in London, capable of holding twenty thousand persons. His subject was the mission of Christ, and we print the sermon in this issue of the Christian Herald.

Dr. Talmage prefaced his morning sermon i Surrey Chapel with the following observations

"With what joy I enter this church to-day can hardly tell you. I was glad to accept the invitation to preach here; first of all, because should have an opportunity of speaking a wor for my glorious Master, blessed be His name fo ever. Then I thought I would come under th wing of the Primitive Methodist denominatio with 182,000 members in this country, and wit Sabbath-school scholars 365,000, making a chur mighty now and mightier in the future— church characterized all the world over for ho enthusiasm and for having given man a migh stroke for God and the truth.

"Then I felt glad to come to a church in who pulpit Rowland Hill had stood, and, after he h done his work so well, had after it laid down rest. A glorious man of Christ!—even his centricities concentrated to God. While so in this day speak chiefly of him in connecti with mirthful and grotesque incident, those us who have read his life and know his w look back to him as a man of great holiness heart, purity of purpose and of life—all in right direction.

"Then I accepted the invitation with gl ness, because I should have the honor of sta ing in the pulpit consecrated by the voice James Sherman—his name a synonym of co cration to Christ—his name to go down thro all the ages associated with everything tha good.

"Then I knew I should have the honor standing in a pulpit where Newman Hall ha faithfully proclaimed Christ to the people— titudes all over the world responding to the vitation of his, 'Come to Jesus.' Blessed be that He has gloriously and magnificently umphed over all His enemies.

"To-day the beloved pastor of your ch put into my hand the first sermon that Rowl Hill delivered at the dedication of this chu printed at that time. In it he makes many sions to his own ministry. In his preface says many quaint and beautiful and stir things in regard to himself and the min which had been assaulted on all sides, decla his faith in God—that God who brought off victorious over all his foes, and made name honored in all Christendom, and t honored in all the ages that are to come. the opening sentences of that sermon Row Hill declares, 'I take it for granted the maj of my congregation believe in the immortal e soul, and that the Bible is our only directory a blessed eternity.' That is the key-note of y sermon this morning."

Dr. Talmage then proceeded with great force d impressiveness to deliver his discourse on e Bible, which has already appeared in this urnal.

PREDICTED LATTER-DAY MIRACLES.

piritualism and the Coming Antichrist. By Mr. E. J. Hytche.

orcery a Sin Characteristic of the Last Days—Antichrist Foremost in its Practice—Parallel in the French Revolution—A Golden Effigy—A Peculiar Doom—Infidelity turning to Pantheism.

It would seem that sorcery, or intercommunn with Satan, will be the special sin of the st days. How this will be effected it is as vain inquire as to try and discover how the witch Endor raised the prophet Samuel from the ead (2 Sam. 28). That such intercourse has bsisted we have ample proof in the God-made gulations of the Mosaic code. Hence capital nishment was to be inflicted on those who disbeyed this law (compare Deut. 18 : 10, 11, xod. 22 : 18, and Lev. 20 : 6 and 27). In spite such prohibition, too many Jews practised is fearful art, and, like the witch of Endor, ade it a source of emolument; while others, ul and Manasseh (2 Chron. 33 : 9), reposed it in the day of defeat.

This will be again—for the cycle of evil so rerns, that "the things that have been shall be." e cannot, indeed, help thinking that the atmpt at their intercommunion with the unseen orld by the pseudo-spiritualists is one sign of e approach of that fearful epoch.

The most prominent in this intercourse with e great foe of God will be Antichrist. Christ imself had been tempted to worship Satan Matt. 4 : 8, 9), but overcame the subtle mainations of the fallen spirit. Antichrist, hower, will owe his power solely to Satan (comp. an. 8 : 24; 2 Thess. 2 : 9; and Rev. 13 : 2), d therefore will not hesitate to pay the homge demanded as the price of universal dominn.

The world would naturally copy the example its great chief, and apostatize in the same anner. Nor let us think such a form of worip improbable. During the first French Revution, when men said, "There is no God," ey could replace His worship by that of a profgate woman. So when the mightiest of the ming age, even Antichrist, shall bow to Satan, hat shall prevent his followers from following s example? But irrespective of probabilities, is sufficient for faith to know that "the mouth the Lord hath spoken it."

The three years and a half reign of Antichrist ill be marked by miracles. They will be either rought by himself, or, what seems most probae, chiefly by his ecclesiastical agent, who by ay of pre-eminence is styled "the False Proet." (See Rev. 13 : 11–18.)

The details of the event thus broadly given e furnished by other prophets. For example, abakkuk refers to the golden image made by ne who can say to it, "Awake and teach" (Hab. : 19). Daniel, while referring to it, indicates at it is made at the bidding of Antichrist Dan. 11 : 38, 39); while John, in the Apocapse, more minutely describes how it deals death those who will not bow to Antichrist (Rev. 3 : 14, 15). In every case the judgment, which most immediately falls on its makers, points the times of Antichrist as the period when

THE IMAGE SHALL SPEAK.

It would thus seem that those whose light is ot yet changed into perfect darkness will not ecome full adherents of Antichrist until they e the miracles wrought by his image. Hence, here he is, they will personally worship; and here he is not, will adore his golden effigy. laced as it will be in the rebuilt Temple of erusalem, (comp. Dan. 11 : 21, and Matt. 4 : 15, 16), it can be seen but by few persons; ut as in the olden time, when the shrines of Diana were vended to her worshippers, so it is probable that smaller images of Antichrist will flood the nations, and the lamp burn before it night and day. Thus will idolatry—not of heavenly powers, but of a man—be re-established; and thus when the Lord comes will the prediction be of possible fulfilment, "The idols He will utterly abolish." For the day of its doom is pronounced by Him who will not revoke His judgment, for it is written, "As a dream when one awaketh: so, O Lord, when Thou awakest, Thou shalt despise their IMAGE" (Ps. 63 : 20).

Next in importance to Antichrist in the coming age is that "False Prophet" who, as his colleague in evil, will share the same peculiar doom of being cast alive into perdition (Rev. 19 : 20). It is he who will construct the great image of Antichrist, and cause it to speak, and kill the enemies of that potentate. It is he, too, who, in antagonism to the miracles wrought by "the Two Witnesses, will cause fire to come down from heaven in the sight of all men" (Rev. 13 : 13). Thus will he carry out the will of his great compeer in sin, and will, by his miracle-working power, be instrumental in the ruin of those who of that race apostatize.

Deceivableness will be the special characteristic of the last times. For though wealth, and art, and the external power of man will be developed to an unprecedented extent, yet it will be godless in its greatness. The apostasy commencing in denying God, then becoming Pantheistic, and saying that all are gods—it will end in deifying a man. And we can well imagine what a rush of worshippers there will be at the shrine of a man who to might and intellect will superadd the power derived from personal contact with the Great Spirit of Evil; for those to whom intimidation would be a thing of scorn, will fall on their knees when they see "times and laws changed," and physical nature mastered.

Yet these fearful glimpses of future history might have been unrevealed. The Church might have been left without any information on the subject; but how unprepared it would have been for events which, though fore-typed in Bible history, they had scarcely anticipated to reoccur in the last times. Like the Jews, not understanding "the signs of the times," the miracles would have come, but whether they came from God or Satan, from heaven or hell, how great would have been the doubt. As grateful, then, will the true disciple be for prophecy as for Scripture history, knowing that it was given mainly that the day of the Lord should "not take him unawares," and that he might not be, like Daniel's weak ones, overcome by the "deceivableness of all unrighteousness" (Dan. 11 : 35).

REV. JAMES A. SPURGEON,

Welcomed by the Baptist Ministers.

At the Baptist Ministers' Conference, September 15th, the Rev. James A. Spurgeon was introduced to the brethren by Rev. Dr. Elder, who referred eulogistically to the work in which the two brothers Spurgeon are engaged, and expressed the pleasure it gave Baptists and other Christians on this side of the water to greet at least one of the name.

Moderator Brouner welcomed Mr. Spurgeon, and referred to his clerical ancestry as something to be proud of, and expressed the hope that his visit to America would be so pleasant that his brother Charles would be induced to come over.

In reply, Mr. Spurgeon said: "I take pride in being the brother of my brother of the Tabernacle. I cannot help being Spurgeon's brother. I was born so. [Laughter.] My brother is called Mr. Spurgeon in London, and I am addressed as Mr. James Spurgeon, by way of distinction.

"When my brother is President, then I am Vice-President. When two men sit astride a horse one must sit in front; that is my brother's place. [Laughter.] The hind man must hold upon the horse the man who rides in front, and, besides he must guide the horse.

"For twelve years I have been my brother's assistant in every evangelical work undertaken, and I

CREDIT ALL THE SUCCESS

of our enterprises to our unfailing faith in prayer, and in God, who hears prayer. I will give you an instance which illustrates this. When Mr. Spurgeon was about to start his orphanage for boys and girls, many excellent friends, clerical and lay, sought to persuade him that he was overdoing the thing, that he would wear himself out, and that the expense was too great.

"One day the Rev. Dr. Brock, who is known also on this side of the water, was making special efforts to convince Mr. Spurgeon that his new enterprise would not succeed. But while thus conversing, a note from an anonymous friend was handed to the Tabernacle pastor, who, on opening it, found two £1000 notes in it. He handed the letter to Dr. Brock, whose lack of faith was so sufficiently reproved that he proposed prayer at once.

"We need now, for all our enterprises connected with the Metropolitan Tabernacle, $100,000 a year, and we receive it by a judicious combination of faith and common sense.

"The Moderator has spoken of my father having been a minister. The family came originally from Holland, when Duke Alva was persecuting the Church. In England my ancestors were Quakers, and well do I remember a Nonconformist minister. He wore a broad-brimmed hat, turned up all around in Quaker style, a broad-tailed coat, silk stockings, and big-buckled shoes.

MY GRANDFATHER,

"When 84 years of age my grandfather was asked to preach one Sunday morning, because my brother, now of the Tabernacle, had not come in time for service. The old gentleman had just given out the text, 'By grace are ye saved, and that not by faith, but by the grace of God which abideth in you,' when the grandson entered. 'I know that sermon,' he said, 'it's a good one—let him go on.'

"The sermon was a good one, and it was given with fire and effect. Then the appointed preacher (Mr. Charles H. Spurgeon) began his sermon. In the middle of it he came to treat on Christian experience. 'Hold on!' the old gentleman interrupted, 'I've had more of that kind of experience than you!' and the aged clergyman again addressed the congregation."

BURGOYNE'S SURRENDER AND CHARCOAL ARTISTS.

Mr. Spurgeon said he had been a week in this country, and yet he did not know as much as some of his countrymen who have spent a day or an hour in the chief cities and then hurried home to caricature Americans with voice and pen. He likened such scribblers to the fence or sidewalk charcoal artists, who must exaggerate everything to attract a little attention to themselves. "I was in Washington last week," said Mr. Spurgeon, "and saw the painting of 'Burgoyne's Surrender;' and, as I have had the honor to marry a granddaughter of that famous general, I felt a sort of family feeling rising within me. The Americans have received me very warmly, but I am bound to say they gave my wife's grandfather a much warmer reception. But I thank God that that surrender took place, and that the results to America and Great Britain and the world have been so grand and glorious." Mr. Spurgeon closed his admirable address with the poetic prayer:

America and England, long may they be United and happy and gloriously free.

Mr. Bain, a deacon in Mr. Spurgeon's church, was also introduced to the Conference and made a few remarks.

A Lesson from a Child.—On one Occasion a father found it necessary to punish his little daughter. But Mary climbed up into his lap, and throwing her arms around his neck, said, "Papa. I do love you." "Why do you love me, my child?" the father asked. "Because you try to make me good, papa."

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

A FRIEND IN ADVERSITY.

EDITH TEMPLE was the very best friend Effie could have had at her side at that terrible crisis. Her husband's flight completely unnerved the poor little wife, and she leaned on Edith for strength and direction. Edith calmly surveyed the situation, and she felt sure if Robert could be found and properly dealt with he would be glad to return. He would probably himself regret a step taken under the first impulse of shame and anger, if he had time to reflect over the consequences of his cruel desertion.

"Have you any idea where your husband would be likely to go?" inquired Edith of Effie, who remained in her crouching position on the floor at the lady's feet.

The only answer was a despairing movement of Effie's head.

"Who brought this letter to you?" inquired Edith.

Effie only gave a bewildered look, and put her hand to her forehead. Her brain was dizzy; the room appeared to her disturbed vision to be turning around her; she could hardly see, and was still less able to think.

Edith heard the sound of a lad's voice in the kitchen, and, rising, went thither to seek the information which the poor young wife was unable to give.

Edith found Mrs. Cross eagerly questioning the youth who had brought the letter from Robert. All the news that could possibly be drawn from the horse-boy the widow had already obtained, and was eager to impart to the lady.

"Dear, ma'am, isn't it shocking!" exclaimed Mrs. Cross, who was secretly enjoying the excitement; "I've got the whole story from this lad. Farmer Holland went to the 'Crown' this morning, sullen and silent as a bear. He gave no explanation to the landlord, though Cole is his most particular friend, but wrote a letter, sent here for his luggage, and then went off to London by the twelve o'clock train. Such a disgraceful affair I never heard of before in the course of my life! The man to desert such a dear little wife, and so soon after their marriage!"

Edith turned from the talkative widow and addressed the lad, who looked intelligent and bright.

"Did Mr. Holland give no clue whatever as to whither he was going?" she inquired.

"Farmer Holland said nothing to my master about it," answered the youth; "but I heard him muttering something to himself which sounded like before the May Queen starts."

"The May Queen!" echoed Mrs. Cross, "why that's the name of the vessel his sister is to sail in to-morrow. She said so in her letter."

"For what place?" asked Edith quickly.

"La! I can't remember either what place the ship was sailing from, or where she was going to," replied Mrs. Cross; "I don't think that was put in the letter, but the post-mark, I mind me, was Southampton."

This was the only clue which Edith could obtain from Mrs. Cross, but with it she returned to Effie Holland, with hope in her look and tone.

"All, by God's blessing, may yet be well," said the lady. "It seems, from what I gather, that your husband has a sister about to sail in a ship called the May Queen to-morrow, probably from Southampton. If you follow at once on his track you may yet be in time to prevent his leaving the country."

Effie sprang to her feet in wild excitement; "I am ready to go to Southampton—anywhere—to the ends of the world!" she exclaimed. "Oh! if I could but stop him!"

"Softly, softly, be calm, my poor child. You can only reach Southampton by passing through London, and the next train for the city does not reach our station for more than an hour and a half." Miss Temple looked at her watch as she spoke. For the breathing space given for preparation and consideration the lady was thankful, but Effie would fain have started off at once.

Miss Temple made the agitated young wife sit down beside her, and take some hartshorn and water now brought by Mrs. Cross as an excuse for entering the parlor. She was not suffered, however, to remain there, as her coarse pity and ill-concealed curiosity added to the excitement of Effie.

"Will you kindly leave us together for a little?" said Miss Temple with courtesy but firmness. Mrs. Cross, disappointed, returned to the kitchen and sat down to her dinner at the table, where she found Fred already busy with his.

Edith set herself to reflect on what course it would be expedient to her to recommend to the poor young creature, who seemed tacitly to place herself under the lady's protection. It was an unspeakable comfort to Effie to have some one to think for her, some one to advise her in this terrible crisis. She clung to her former teacher as if she herself were still but a Sunday scholar.

But Edith felt the difficulty and responsibility of giving advice while she remained so much in the dark as regarded preceding events. She very imperfectly understood what had induced Robert Holland to take a step so sudden, and, as it appeared, so cruel.

Edith had not failed to notice the words, "I forgive you," in Holland's letter. Effie must have done something, or said something, that had greatly displeased her husband. Miss Temple felt she must be given further particulars, much as she shrank from questioning Effie on so delicate a subject.

"Did your husband ever express any intention of emigrating?" inquired Edith of Effie, when the lady saw that the poor girl was more calm.

"Never," was the murmured reply. "This farm does not pay well, I know, but it is not trouble about money that has driven my Robert away. He would never have left me, never, if—if I had not foolishly, wickedly opened a letter directed to him, and so let out his sister's secret." It was a great relief to Effie to make a frank confession of her fault to a pitying friend, and she went on with her explanation, covering her face with both her hands as she spoke. "Of course Robert could not bear that Mrs. Cross and all the village should know that his sister had been thrown into jail for stealing her mistress' diamond ring."

"Diamond ring!" echoed Edith Temple. "Tell me, oh! tell me, Effie, what is the name of your husband's sister? Is she a widow? Was she ever in the service of my aunt, Mrs. Vernon? The questions were rapidly uttered; even Miss Temple's usually placid face wore an expression of great eagerness as she bent forward for a reply.

"Ellen Morris is my sister-in-law's name, and she attended Mrs. Vernon on her death-bed," was the answer of Effie. "I've heard that poor Ellen loved her mistress dearly, and it is not likely that she, my Robert's own sister, would steal a diamond ring."

"Ellen never stole it!" exclaimed Miss Temple. "I know and can prove her innocence! That diamond ring is at this moment in my possession. Oh, I thank heaven that I have been led to this place at such a crisis as this!"

But few words are necessary to explain what had occurred at Hastings in relation to the jewel which Mrs. Vernon had given to her niece.

Mr. Vernon, who was by no means either broken in spirit or softened in character by the death of his wife, had, even before her remains were consigned to the grave, missed her valuable diamond ring. His suspicions had fixed themselves on her faithful attendant, Ellen Morris, who had been Mrs. Vernon's sole nurse in sickness, hardly ever quitting her room.

Ellen was the only member of their household whom the Vernons had taken with them to Hastings. Ellen, on the accusation of her master, was brought before a magistrate on the day after the funeral. Various trifling circumstances seeming to confirm the suspicions of her guilt, she was fully committed for trial.

The innocent woman was tried at the County Assizes, found guilty, and condemned to undergo a term of imprisonment, with hard labor, in the jail at Guildford. On the agony of mind which Mary endured it is needless to dwell.

Her only earthly comfort was the sympathy of her brother, who never for one moment doubted her innocence, and who did all that lay in his power to help her to prove it.

On the day of her condemnation Ellen Morris made Robert Holland promise never to tell any one, not even his wife, should he marry, the secret of his sister's disgrace. The trial taking place in a county remote from Suffolk, Ellen hoped that the account of it might never reach her native village. Her friends and fellow-servants knew only that, after the death of her mistress, Ellen no longer remained in the service of Mr. Vernon.

There was nothing in this to cause surprise or suspicion. There was a general impression, shared even by Effie, that Ellen had entered another place, and almost immediately gone abroad with her lady.

No one in Ashley knew of Ellen's imprisonment save her brother and Mr. Vernon, and neither of these men was likely to utter a word on the subject. The silence of Robert would have been natural, even had he not been bound by promise. The philosopher, who aimed at being regarded as a benefactor of mankind, did not choose that his prosecution of his servant should be known more widely than he could help.

Had Mrs. Vernon died in her own home, it is probable that her husband would have contented himself with turning Ellen out of his house in disgrace, without delivering her up, as he ha done at Hastings, into the hands of the law.

So careful was the philanthropist not to los his character for philanthropy, that it was from words which he intentionally dropped in the presence of his other servants that the false rumo had arisen of Ellen s being "in another place," and that place "not with a lady in England."

Mr. Vernon had been harsh in his judgment and hard in his dealings, but intentionally unjust he never had been. He had believed that faithless servant, a hypocrite and a thief, ha deserved all that she had suffered.

It had been no small annoyance to Mr. Verno when the sight of the ring on the finger of Edit had convinced him that he had brought a fals accusation against an innocent person. Ha not Ellen's term of imprisonment at that tim almost come to a close, her late master migh have felt himself obliged openly to do her justice.

But Mr. Vernon was exceedingly anxious t hush up an affair in which his own conduct ha done so little credit to his wisdom or merc It would be vexatious for the world to discove that the clever man had deceived himself—th philanthropist injured the guiltless!

"I will find some other way of amply makin up to Ellen Morris for all that she has suffere and yet avoid lowering myself in public estimation," said the man full of worldly wisdom, a he thought over the matter.

But would it be possible to make up for all th anguish of heart, the shame, the unspeakabl misery which had been undergone by the inn cent Ellen? Could her prosecutor make up her for a blighted life? Could he blot out fro remembrance the dreadful fact that she ha stood in the prisoners' dock, received a crim nal's sentence, endured the punishment of felon?

Ellen's character was dearer to her than lif the wound which she had received was mo painful than a dagger could have inflicted; su a wrong as she had suffered could not be ca celled by gold!

THE TYPES EXPLAINED.

S. S. Lesson for October 12th.—Heb. 9:1-15.

Golden Text, 10:4. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR golden text is the true key-note of our subject, "For by one offering, He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." He hath. This is the accomplishment, the fulfilment of the types. The law had "a shadow of good things to come" (Heb. 10:1), but the substance of the shadow is in this blessed truth. "He hath" does not refer to that which is to come, but to the present power and blessing which flows to us from the "one offering." Our blessed Lord came into the world with only one purpose (Heb. 10 : 5-7)—to do the will of God. His was the first human body which had ever fully answered the purpose of his creation, to carry out the will and mind of God. Therefore it is written, "By the which will (God's will heard, received, fulfilled by Christ) we are sanctified by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all."

All the types prefigured this lifelong offering of Himself even unto death. The first type we meet with is "a worthy sanctuary;" the original is rather an earthly sanctuary. In Ex. 25 : 8 God commands, "Let them make Me a sanctuary that I may dwell among them." The human life of the Lord Jesus was such a dwelling place, God manifest in the flesh. The sanctuary consisted of a tabernacle, movable tent, not fixed upon the earth, having no foundation laid in the ground like a solid building. And this is a true type of the heavenly life which our beloved Lord led here on earth; and it is a type of the life which we also as His followers are privileged to lead.

Then the tabernacle was made up of curtains, pillars, boards, hooks, sockets, etc. (Ex. 26), and in order to make a sanctuary, a dwelling place for God, we who are Christ's disciples are called to be "members one of another" (Rom. 12 : 5), "fitly joined together, and compacted by that which every joint supplieth," Eph. 4. That we "all may be one" (John 17 : 21), as it is written of the type, "so it became one tabernacle" (Ex. 36 : 13). Unitedly alone can we represent Jesus. The tabernacle contained "the candlestick," which is called (Ex. 39 : 7) "the pure candlestick," in which was burned "pure oil-olive beaten for the light to cause the lamps to burn continually" (Ex. 24 : 2). All was pure; Christ as the Light of the world shone with a light so pure that no thing of darkness could remain in His presence. Let us not forget that as His Father sent Him into the world, so hath He sent us into the world to be also its light in His name (Matt. 5 : 14). And then, besides, there was "the pure table" whereon was the shew bread in two rows and "pure frankincense upon each row, that it may be on the bread for a memorial" (Ex. 24 : 6, 7). All-pure, all-holy, because it set forth the all-holy Son of God. As the bread of life He is figured in the shew bread that which satisfies God and gives life to us.

"And after the second veil, the tabernacle which is called the Holiest of all. This is the type of unbroken communion with God, a life like Enoch's with the testimony that we please God. Until Christ came "the way into the Holiest of all was not yet made manifest" (ver. 8). But now we have "boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, which He hath consecrated for us, through the veil; that is to say, His flesh" (Heb. 10 : 19, 20). O how responsible we are to take and to keep the glorious position thus made for us by Christ! and to walk, live, suffer, testify in the strength of it!

Under the law all was expectation, and all was imperfection; the very high priest who offered gifts and sacrifices was obliged to take the life of innocent victims and offer their life-blood not only for others, but for his own self also. Year by year he offered both gifts and sacrifices that could not make him that did the service perfect as pertaining to the conscience. The consciousness of inward condemnation remained, and the conscience was still unpurged.

"But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands—that is to say, not of this building, neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by His own blood He entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us." "It is finished," said our blessed Lord upon the Cross. "I have finished the work which Thou gavest me to do," He said to His Father (John 17 : 4). No hindrance remains; it is possible to live a life with a pure conscience, a life of pleasing God which God says He has perfected for ever them that are sanctified through Christ, because He sees the end from the beginning. Shall we, dare we, look away from His work to our wretched selves and say that that is impossible which Christ has spent His life and death to accomplish?

Self has no voice here, for Himself is our self, and our old self is buried with Him. Thus, and thus only, can we have a conscience void of offence toward God and toward man. Self-conceit has no room to develop in such a position. To consider self in any way is to leave our burial place; to think of past, present, or future, except in and through Him, is to come out from the covering of the blood, just as if an Israelite on the Passover night had left the house with its blood-sprinkled doorway, he would have been found within reach of the destroying angel. The blood of such an one would be justly on his own head. And what responsibility do we incur, who are within so blessed a possibility, if through unbelief we fail to experience it?

"Let us therefore fear lest, a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it." It is our blessed privilege and our bounden duty, because Christ has consecrated for us "a new and living way through the veil—that is to say, His flesh," to "draw near, with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water;" all our being pure through the unlimited grace of our merciful Redeemer.

How then in practical daily life can I find all these blessings assured to me? Simply by renouncing, I hope, or I try, I succeed or I fail, and adopting "He hath" according to the Scripture. The moment we leave the cover of the blood to cast so much as a glance at ourselves, the door is left open behind us for unbelief, discouragement, and sin. But while we hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering, and we allow ourselves to be led of the Spirit, moment by moment, we have nothing to fear, because "He is faithful that promised." And having considered Christ for ourselves, we can "consider one another" for Christ, "to provoke unto love and to good works" (Heb. 10 : 23, 24).

O while we are humble enough to take our right position in Christ and not in ourselves, and honest-hearted enough to "follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth," fully decided to let no consideration weigh with us but His supreme and blessed will, there is no need to remain sighing for a state of nearness to God which seems to escape our grasp. He hath "obtained eternal redemption for us, through the eternal Spirit;" He hath "offered Himself without spot to God;" He hath "entered into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us;" He hath "perfected for ever them that are sanctified." Now, is our stand on this which He hath done for us, or is it upon our own faith, obedience, etc.? O let us remember that while we are pledged by the very position we hold, to lead lives pure as He is pure, holy as He is holy, this is all impossible while we are ignorant of the perfection of His work for us. Patience can only have her perfect work in us as we see that it is not we, but Christ, who lives patience in us. Love can only gain ground, and we be rooted and grounded in love, as not we, but I live and work, and thus the shadow becomes the substance, and in us also is the type fulfilled.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Treaty of Peace between Great Britain and the Zulus has been signed, and Cetewayo the king has been carried to Cape Town to await instructions from the Home Government. The country has been broken up into sections, each to be ruled by its own chief, who signs the treaty of peace. One of the provisions of this treaty puts an end to the Zulu military system, whereby the young warriors of the tribes were not permitted to marry until they had served in battle and distinguished themselves by bravery. The chiefs undertake to prohibit the importation of arms into their territories, and promise to make no declaration of war upon other tribes without the consent of the British authorities at Cape Colony. This is probably the best arrangement open to the British; but it is doubtful how far a treaty of any kind will be observed by the desperate savages, or how far it will form a protection to the British colony in South Africa.

The British Resident in Burmah, India, has been withdrawn. The drunken orgies of the king of that country continue, and he is surrounded by young men who are reckless enough for any desperate crime. The Resident has not been able to check the cruelty and inhumanity of the king and his officers, and he has been treated by them with marked discourtesy. The English Government, warned by the murder of Major Cavagnari and his party at Cabul, have therefore prudently decided on being wise in time and withdrawing their representative before a hostile movement is made.

The Conference between Prince Bismarck and Count Andrassy has been the subject of general comment throughout Europe during the past week. It is one of those events capable of exercising a decisive influence over the future of all European nations. An alliance between Germany and Austria is said to have been the result of the interview, Germany guaranteeing to Austria her acquisitions of territory held under the Berlin Treaty, and Austria engaging to assist Germany if an attempt is made to wrest from her the spoils of the Franco-German war. The Alliance indicates that the two nations fear a combination between Russia and France. Its tendency is to divide Europe into two hostile camps. On the one side will be Germany and Austria, to which England will be drawn by her jealousy of Russia, and on the other Russia, France, and probably Italy and Denmark. With millions of men under arms, and a store of weapons of the most destructive character the world has ever seen, the elements of a great conflagration are all present. Students of prophecy see in this unsettled condition of affairs, which continues in spite of the best efforts of statesmen to restore quiet and prosperity, the steady approach of the certainly predicted crisis which is to herald the new dawn and the coming of the day of the Son of Man upon the earth.

A Russian City Destroyed.—A Furious Storm raged over the city of Kiev on September 3d, and during its continuance fire broke out in seven places simultaneously. Many women and children perished in the flames. It is supposed that the conflagration was the work of the Nihilists.

Lord Lawrence the Friend of Missions.—"The Free Church of Scotland Record, referring to the Late Lord Lawrence—whose portrait and life appeared in the CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 10, 1879,—says: "His death recalls us to the first seat of our missionaries in India. They had no warmer friend than the two brothers, descendants by their mother's side of John Knox, whom the Protestantism of Ulster sent forth from Derry to conquer and to save our Indian empire. Henry Lawrence was the first to help Dr. Duff after the Disruption, and he lies in the now sweet cemetery of the Lucknow Residency, described by himself as a man 'who tried to do his duty.' John Lawrence, not less generous and true, though of a sterner nature, was led by the solemn experiences of the Mutiny to do more for Indian missions than any other of its rulers has ever attempted. So the soldier-statesman who honor ed God lies in the nave of Westminster Abbey beside Livingstone, as Henry Lawrence lies not far from Havelock in the far East."

The Prime Minister of Madagascar recently said at a meeting: "I tell you, ladies and gentlemen, it is the wish of the Queen, and the desire of the Prime Minister that our people should know Jesus Christ and His salvation. In the time of persecution, and when Christians had to pray in secret, I heard them cry out to God, saying, 'Oh, when will there be a Queen in this country who will worship God?' God has heard their prayers, and behold now our Queen serves God, establishes her kingdom on Him, and urges her people to seek salvation through Christ. Here, under the very shadow of the place where we are assembled, there was a girl brought from Lazaina, and she was condemned to be thrown over the rock. When she got to the spot she cried out, 'Throw me over; for I am Christ's.' My father wished to save her; and cried out, 'Stop! she is an idiot.' But although my father would have saved her, the girl would not be silenced in her declaration that she was a servant of Christ."

Bishop Tirrell, who Lately Died in Australia, left $1,200,000 to the Episcopal Church Missionary Society, under which he had labored in that country for thirty years. He had not returned to his native land during all that period. How he came by so large an amount of money is not told, but it is a well known fact that many of the very wealthy in the Church of England are becoming more and more interested in the cause of missions. The gift meets the pressing needs of the Society, which ran in debt last year $105,000 making its entire deficit the large sum of $144,000.

An Ashantee Native on His Dying Bed was visited by a Wesleyan missionary, and thus addressed him: "I hear you preached last night about heaven. I could not be at your service, but I am going to heaven myself; and when I get there I will go to my Saviour and throw myself at His feet, and thank Him for His mercy in sending a missionary to this land to tell me of the truth. Then I will come back to the gate and sit down until you come, and then I will take you to my Saviour's throne, and say you are the man who first told me of the cross of Christ."

The Defeat by Locusts of a Russian Deta ment of infantry on the march from Goatsch is reported. It was assailed by a flight of locu twenty-two miles square, which arrested progress and compelled it to take refuge in military station of Dzigamskoi. Next day detachment made another attempt to conti its march, but was brought to a dead stand at a verst from Dzigamskoi by the locusts, wh had alighted in such masses upon the gro that the soldiers could not wade through th and they still filled the air, swarming upon men in countless myriads. In the hope of disp ing them by noise, Major Lazoff gave his men command to fire in the air, and kept up a se of volleys for nearly half an hour; but locusts paid no attention whatsoever to the r discharge of Russian musketry directed ag them, and the detachment was forced to ret for the second time to Dzigamskoi.

Stanley, the Explorer, is again in A under the auspices of the King of the Bel who is anxious to open trade with the nati the great Congo River. About the mid July last he sailed from Gibraltar for the Coast of Africa in a steamer. A steamer with goods has also been sent from Ant which will remain at the Congo till Stanle rival. The steamer has on board two or steam-barges in sections, in which to asce Congo, carrying these sections piecemeal a the Gellala Falls. The King of the Belgia manifested great interest and great ene thus being the first to gain a foothold the natives. A Curious Superstition is Exhibited in ern and Southern India, where the lands de by the famine of 1877 are now being rava a plague of millions of rats. These anima overspread the country like locusts, they the crops almost as thoroughly, and a more difficult to keep down. So grave l come the aspect of affairs that a "Rat Com has been appointed to inquire into the best of getting rid of these creatures. The na some places refuse to destroy the rats, believe that the souls of people who die famine have come back in the bodies of get the food they should have had in the ous existence. Thus we see how supe becomes its own scourge (Prov. 1 : 31).

Mr. George Müller, the well-known founder and director of the Ashleydown Orphan Houses, near Bristol, England, is one of the few persons of distinction who have never sat for their portraits or photographs, and consequently it is not easy to obtain a good portrait of him; but the one given on our frontispiece this week is considered to be a very fair likeness. His object in not having his likeness taken is simply in keeping with the main principle of this gentleman's life, which is to sink his own identity and let the power of God through Jesus Christ be apparent in all that he accomplishes. Our Saviour distinctly said to the Jews, "How can ye believe, which receive honor one of another, and seek not the honor that cometh from God only?" (John 5:44.) It is not possible to have full faith in God, and to work by His power, unless we allow the personality and presence of God to be seen through us as plainly as if we were not in the way at all. To do that is the highest standard of attainment set before believing Christians; and the following short history will show how Mr. Müller set himself to attain it.

This eminent man of God was born at Kroppenstaedt, near Halberstadt, in Prussia, on September 27th, 1805, and is therefore now exactly 74 years of age. This may surprise some who have noticed his erect carriage and the remarkable elasticity of his movements. At the age of ten years he was sent to a school at Halberstadt, and seven years later to a school at Nordhausen. Then at Easter in 1825 he became a member of the University of Halle with honorable testimonials, and thus obtained permission to preach in the Lutheran Established Church.

He was at that time, however, an unconverted man, and had sought the profession of the ministry principally to please his father, who himself valued it for no better reason than because of its respectability and chances of future emolument. Mr. Müller says of his state at that period: "I had no Bible, and had not read in it for years. I went to church but seldom; but, from custom, I took the Lord's Supper twice a year. I had never heard the Gospel preached. I had never met with a person who told me that he meant, by the help of God, to live according to the Holy Scriptures. In short, I had not the least idea that there were any persons really different from myself, except in degree." This shows how hollow the godliness of the church in Prussia must have been at that time.

It is well to correct here a common idea that persons who become eminent for power in prayer and nearness of communion with God, owe it to their natural excellence of disposition, or to favorable circumstances in their early education. The readers of that wonderful book, "The Life of Trust," or "A Narrative of the Lord's Dealings with George Muller," will remember that the subject of this sketch was, previously to his conversion, a wicked and despicable character much beyond the average run of youths, and that his studies in divinity had the effect of hardening him rather than doing any thing else.

HIS CONVERSION

was a miracle wrought by the almighty power of God. One Saturday evening in the middle of November, 1825, he was taken by a fellow-student to a prayer-meeting, and the Lord touched his heart there. He writes: "Now my life became very different, though not so that all sins were given up at once." Four or five months afterwards the God of Providence threw him into the society of a devoted young believer, whose example mightily stirred him, and he was able, for the first time in his life, fully and unreservedly to give up himself to the Lord.

Almost immediately afterwards Mr. Müller was filled with anxiety to embark on foreign missionary work, and was ultimately led to accept an invitation of "The London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews" to go to London to prepare in their institution for missionary work. He arrived in London on the 29th March, 1829. He had been happily and providentially exempted, three months before, from the Prussian requirement of three years' military service, on account of his weak state of health.

Toward the close of that year he was led to doubt the suitability of a servant of the Lord's working under the patronage of any earthly society; and therefore the connection between him and the London Society for the Jews was amicably dissolved. On December 30th, 1829, he went to spend a fortnight with some Christian people at Exmouth, on the south coast of England. He says: "I arrived at Exmouth on December 31st, at six in the evening, an hour before the commencement of a prayer-meeting at Ebenezer Chapel. My heart was burning with a desire to tell of the Lord's goodness to my soul. Being, however, not called on either to speak or pray, I was silent. The next morning I spoke on the difference between a Christian and a happy Christian, and showed whence it generally comes that we rejoice so little in the Lord. This, my first testimony, was blessed to many believers, that God, as it appears, might show me that He was with me."

At Exmouth Mr. Müller met Mr. Craik, his subsequent close friend and coadjutor, and began to preach in chapels in that neighborhood, finally settling down at Teignmouth as pastor of a congregation of eighteen persons who promised to give him a stipend of $275 a year.

In the spring of 1830 he became convinced, after a prayerful examination of the Scriptures, that baptism should be administered only by immersion, and submitted himself to the ordinance.

On October 7th of the same year he was married to Miss Mary Groves, sister of Mr. Groves, who relinquished a lucrative profession to become a missionary in China.

It is time now to tell how Mr. Müller entered upon what has become known over all the world as

HIS LIFE OF FAITH.

From the time of his conversion he had been very earnest in prayer, both praying about a greater variety of matters than other people do, and doing it more sincerely and fervently than most others do. Now from the time of Enoch downwards such a practice has never failed to be met by a special revelation of the Spirit of the Creator to the spirit of man. Consequently Mr. Muller was by degrees led into the habit of "asking counsel of the Lord" about every affair of his life, and experience soon taught him that he could never look to God in vain

When, therefore, for reasons known to his own conscience, he resolved, in concert with his likeminded wife, in the very month of his marriage, to give up his regular salary, and rely for his support on the voluntary gifts of his small congregation, he had an intelligent expectation that, however the Lord might test his faith, He could never overlook him and would never leave him in want.

His journal from that time contains innumerable instances of severe trials and miraculous providences. He was repeatedly reduced to his last halfpenny, or his last morsel of food, but in every case he was enabled to refrain from mentioning the circumstance to any human being, though he pleaded with God for deliverance; and positively in every case help came before the hour of the next meal. At the same time his experience was brightened by so many instances of direct and unmistakable interposition by God, that his faith became as firm as a rock He could say with David, "Bless the Lord, (my soul, and forget not all His benefits" (Psa 103:2).

Twenty-five years afterwards he deliberatel recorded the result of his experience as follows "Confidence in the Lord, to whom alon I lool for the supply of my temporal wants, keeps me when a case of distress comes before me, o when the Lord's work calls for my pecuniar aid, from anxious reckoning like this: Will m salary last out? shall I have enougn myself nex month? etc. In this my freedom I am, by th grace of God, generally at least, able to say t myself something like this: My Lord is no limited; He can again supply; He knows tha this present case has been sent to me; and thu this way of living, so far from leading to anxiety is rather the means of keeping from it.

"This way of living has often been the mean of reviving the work of grace in my heart, whe I have been getting cold; and it also has bee the means of bringing me back again to th Lord, after I have been backsliding. For it wil not do, it is not possible, to live in sin, and a the same time, by communion with God, t draw down from heaven every thing one need for the life that now is. Frequently, too, a fres answer to prayer, obtained in this way, has bee the means of quickening my soul, and filling m with much joy."

The Lord so abundantly honored Mr. Müller' faith in regard to his personal wants, that h was encouraged to indulge his benevolent hea by opening a house for neglected orphan childre and looking to God for the means of its support Having, with Mr. Craik, moved permanently t Bristol in 1832, he there opened his first Orpha House in April, 1836. Although thus starte without any money, the work never went bac one step. It has constantly enlarged, and roon has been added to room and building to building till the present time, when this obscur German preacher is the virtual master of whole range of stately stone-built edifices, i which more than are housed, fed, clothed, and educated. In addition to this he employs nearly 200 missionaries at home and abroad, and has 100 day-school in various places, with 9000 children in them and sends out every year 4,000,000 of tracts an 10,000 copies of Scripture.

This vast work, carried on by a man who i independent of every one but God, but wh never fails one day to take counsel with God involves an annual outlay of about which God sends him every year, in large sum and small, from all parts of the world. Th feeding of Elijah by ravens was nothing at a in comparison with this.

From the beginning Mr. Muller has strictl acted upon four principles, any one of whic would be considered suicidal according to th world's way of thinking. 1. He never publishe the name of a donor. 2. He will not incur a penn of expense unless he has the money in hand 3. He never appropriates to one purpose, eve as a loan, money which has been given fo another. 4. He makes no provision for tim to come. If there were no other evidence o God's presence in the earth, the Bristol Orphanages would demonstrate the fact to the condemnation of all unbelievers and scoffers. At th day of judgment they will be an awful witnes against thousands who are steeling their heart to the truth.

The readers of the Christian Herald wil be interested to read Mr. Muller's views on th state of the world at the

as he stated them in an apology for starting a Missionary Institution of his own when there wer already many others in operation. He wrote "The end which these religious societies propose to themselves, and which is constantly pu before their members, is that the world wil gradually become better and better, and that a hole world will be converted." To this is constantly reference made to Hab.

Isa. 11 : 9. "But that these passages key and I are soon leaving for Cleve-after that we go to St. Louis. We want this to be a blessed winter. I pray that this may be the most blessed winter America has ever seen: and why should it not begin right here this morning? Let us not be so anxious about others or about the church, but let it be the prayer of each one of us: Lord, bless me.

"The Christian Church has been on the defensive long enough. We want to enter on a war of aggression. The generals in the last war who were satisfied with acting on the defensive were a failure. But I think I hear a voice saying this morning unto the children of Israel, that

THEY GO FORWARD.

"You talk about the dangers of infidelity and scepticism, but I do not fear them half as much as this deadly coldness of Christian people.

"When the ladies at Baltimore came to me for advice last winter, I said, 'Don't get into some brick building, up in the second story, to pray. We have prayed long enough. It is time we put some work beside our prayers. Go on to one of the principal thoroughfares; get a store if you can, and give out that you are going to hold a Gospel meeting.' Well, they shrank from that; they were afraid of the publicity. But at last they opened their room, and there they prayed and sang. I tell you I have been to many meetings, but I have never been to meetings like theirs. Many men came in fresh from their bath, from their meal, from their work; some came in under the influence of liquor, and they heard those prayers and songs, and they said, 'Why, that reminds me of my mother; I remember singing that hymn when I was a child.' And those that we could not reach, these ladies got at. They were many of them ladies of wealth and position; but they did not shrink from the ragged, the depraved, and the dissolute. They worked there day after day, and they had fruit every day. I see a face from Baltimore near me, and I should like to ask Mr. Bliss how that work is going on."

Mr. E. W. Bliss, of Baltimore, rose and described the successful work now in progress in that city. Then Mr. Moody continued:

"I suppose, if I were to ask you Christian people what you desire above any thing else in the world, I believe you would say, 'I desire to be useful to God.' Is there any thing God desires more than that—to make us useful in His service? If, then we are agreed, what is there to hinder God from taking us out and making us more useful than ever before? Yes, there is just one thing that may hinder, and that is, sin in us. There has to be a letting go, a letting go of sin and of the world.

"We must be near to God if we would be used. God uses the vessel nearest at hand. If I am a great way off from God, God cannot use me. There are some Christians who have lost their hope and their joy. They have been rescued, and probably if they were to die now they would be safe; but God cannot use them. But these people may be stirred, they may be aroused. Samson lost his strength when he lost his hair; but the Philistines did not pull it up by the roots; it grew again, and as it grew his strength returned; so God can restore them to His service. If we are in this low state, the world will not be the better for our work. I don't believe the fault is on God's side; and the people who pray that the time, the set time to favor Zion, may soon come, do not see this. God is ready now.

"We must get our message from God. Why did our Lord commend Mary and not Martha, who was doing work and hurrying about the house? Because Mary sat at Jesus' feet receiving from Him, that she might go out afterwards and work for Him. That is the right way. We must get first before we can give. If we have not got an overflow of the Gospel in our hearts, we cannot give out to others.

"You hear men talk and talk and talk, and yet say nothing; how is that? It is because they are always talking of their old experience. They are always going back to the old times. Suppose I were to talk to my wife about how happy I was when I first married her, and how much I loved her then. Why, it would break her heart.

"But when we pray that God may fill us, we ought to ask ourselves whether we are not already full. There are some men so full of themselves, and of conceit and their own self-righteousness, that there is no room in them for the things of eternity. How can God fill such men? Let us all pray that God may empty us in order that afterwards He may fill us with His grace.

"There is one striking feature of these cold-hearted Christians: they always imagine every one else is cold. The cold man looks on every thing with a cold eye. He finds fault with the minister, with the singing, and sees defects all through the service. Remember, the quickest way to warm up a church is to get warm yourself. The sparks will fly out from you to other people.

"What we want is to have the life right—to have a life that God can sanction, a life that God can bless. If the life is not right, God will never bless our work for Him.

"A great many people wonder why God does not answer their prayers, as if the fault were God's. They read, 'the Lord's hand is not shortened that it cannot save; neither is His ear heavy that it cannot hear;' and they stop there. They do not read the rest of the passage; if they did they would find the reason. 'Your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid His face from you that He will not hear' (Isa. 59:1, 2). There is some little corner of our hearts being held for ourselves, or for the world. There is the secret of non-success. Before we get the blessing there must be an emptying of ourselves.

"But how shall we find out where this hindrance is, for there is nothing so blinding as sin in the heart? Let us all make the same prayer, for we all need make it: 'Search me, O God, and know my heart: try me and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me.' David felt that sin might be lurking in his heart in some secret place, and he says, 'I want God to search me, He will find it.' Let us every one make that prayer here and now. God looks into the mind. 'O God, know thou my thoughts.' My friends, make that prayer now, and after the search, if sin is found tear it off; if it is as precious as a right hand, as dear as a right eye, out with it.

"Then another hindrance to our usefulness is, that we are so easily discouraged. Mark this, God never used a discouraged man yet. Even Elijah got discouraged. At Carmel he was strong enough. He said, 'I will call on the name of the Lord;' but after that, when he thought he had lost a little reputation, he lay down under a juniper tree and wished he was dead. He said, 'I am no better than my fathers.' Well, we are too ready to lie down under the juniper tree; but God cannot use us there. He says to us, 'What doest thou here? Be up and at work.' The word comes to us as it came to Joshua; four times in one chapter God says to him,

'BE OF GOOD COURAGE.'

"I remember a few years ago I got under a juniper tree. I was discouraged. I had not seen any fruit for a month; and one Monday morning, after a barren Sunday, a friend came in to see me. I said, 'How did you get on yesterday?' 'Splendidly,' he replied; 'how did you?' 'Miserably,' I said; 'I think I shall not go on long this way.' 'I think it would do you good,' my friend said, 'to study up the life of Noah.' I thought I knew all about Noah. It was a short history anyhow; but I got my Bible and read how he had toiled for 120 years and never got discouraged. Well, I found there was much to be learned from Noah; and when I went to the noon-day prayer-meeting and heard the singing and the prayers, I thought, what would Noah have given to have heard that?

"We have got to realize that our encouragement lies at the end of the route; that man is no use who is always looking for his reward down here. And besides this, do not forget that a discouraged man does harm; he gives a bad impression of the service, so that people think from his looks that it is, Enter thou into the misery of thy Lord, not into the joy of thy Lord.

"This self-seeking is the curse of our time, as it has been of all ages. As Jesus went up to Jerusalem to die, there was a dispute among His disciples by the way which of them should be the greatest; but Jesus said, 'Whosoever would be great among you shall be your minister.' Let us seek great things for God—that is the way to keep self down.

"The character I like best of all is that of John the Baptist. When they sent to ask him, 'Who art thou?' he said, 'I am just nobody—only a voice; but there cometh One after me whose shoe-latchet I am not worthy to unloose.' He just preached up Christ: he had nothing to say of himself. Let us seek to make Christ great, not ourselves. God will work with us then. He loves that name, and when we preach that, He will stand by us, because He delights to see that name exalted.

"What, shall self-seeking stand in the way of Christ? Let self be cast utterly away. When Jesus had been telling His disciples of His crucifixion and of all that should befall Him at Jerusalem, they began disputing which of them should be the greatest. Think of that! The mother of Zebedee's sons came asking a favor of Him. What was the favor? That one might sit on His right hand and the other on His left; one to be prime minister and the other secretary of state! And even at that solemn hour of the last supper there was a dispute among them. What about? Why the same thing: which of them should be greatest. I think that was the most humiliating thing in the whole life of Christ.

"May God help us to stamp this viper out, for it has done more to keep back the church of God than any other cause. If it fixes itself on us, let us shake it off as Paul did the viper after the shipwreck, and let the fire of the Holy Ghost burn it up."

Mr. Moody delivered an address to Christian young men in the evening of the same day, which will be published in our next number.

THE DEMOCRACY OF RELIGION.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, Preached on Sunday Morning, Oct. 5th, 1879.

"And hath made of one blood all nations of men."

SOME have supposed that God originally made an Asiatic Adam, and a European Adam, and an African Adam, and an American Adam; but that theory is entirely overthrown by my text, which says that all nations are blood relatives, having sprung from one and the same stock.

A difference in climate makes much of the difference in national temper. An American goes to Europe and stays there a long while, and finds his pulse moderating and his temper becoming more calm. The air on this side the ocean is more tonic than on the other side. An American breathes more oxygen than a European. A European coming to America finds a great change taking place in himself. He walks with more rapid strides, and finds his voice becoming keener and shriller. The Englishman who walks London Strand at the rate of three miles the hour, coming to America and residing for a long while here, walks Broadway at the rate of four miles the hour. Much of the difference between an American and a European, between an Asiatic and an African, is atmospheric. The lack of the warm sunlight pales the Greenlander. The full dash of the sunlight darkens the negro.

Then ignorance or intelligence makes its impression on the physical organism. In the one case ignorance flattening the skull, as with the Egyptian; in the other case intelligence building up the great dome of the forehead, as with the German. Then the style of God that the nation worships decides how much it shall be elevated or debased; so that those nations that worship reptiles are themselves only a superior form of reptile, while those nations that worship the natural sun in the heavens are the noblest style of barbaric people.

But whatever be the difference of physiognomy, and whatever the difference of temperament, the physiologist tells us that after careful analysis he finds out that the plasma and the disk in the human blood have the same characteristics; so that if you should put twenty men from twenty nationalities abreast in line of battle, and a bullet should fly through the hearts of the twenty men, the blood flowing forth would through analysis prove itself to be the same blood in every instance. In other words, the science of the day confirming the truth of my text that "God hath made of one blood all nations of men."

I have thought, my friends, it might be profitable this morning if I gave you some of the moral and religious impressions which I received this summer, when through your indulgence I had Transatlantic absence.

I. And my first impression was—indeed, the impression carried with me all the summer—the thought already suggested,

THE BROTHERHOOD OF MAN.

The fact is that the differences are so small between nations that they may be said to be all alike. I had a good deal of trepidation about standing before an English, or a Scotch, or an Irish audience. I said: "I don't know these people; they are different from any class of men I ever addressed, and what might be appropriate in my country may not be appropriate here." But oh! how soon I found out that people are all alike.

If a man knows how to play the piano it does not make any difference whether he finds it in New Orleans, or San Francisco, or Boston, or St. Petersburg, or Moscow, or Madras; it has so many keys, and he puts his fingers right on them. And the human heart is a divine instrument with just so many keys in all cases, and you strike some of them and there is joy, and you strike some of them and there is sorrow. Plied by the same motives, lifted up by the same success, depressed by the same griefs. The cabmen of London have the same characteristics as the cabmen of New York, and are just as modest and retiring! The gold and silver drive Piccadilly and the Boulevards just as they drive Wall Street. If there be a great political excitement in Europe the Bourse in Paris howls just as loudly as ever did the American gold-room.

Three fourths of the inhabitants of the earth are engaged in a mighty struggle for bread. Nine tenths of the population hunger-bitten if they stop to rest. The same grief that we saw at our depots in 1862, when the troops left for the war, you could see this summer in England, Ireland, and Scotland, as the troops went forth to the Zulu contest. The same widowhood and orphanage that sat down in despair after the battles of Shiloh and South Mountain poured their grief this summer in the Shannon and the Clyde, and the Dee and the Thames. Oh! ye men and women who know how to pray, never get up from your knees until you have implored God in behalf of the twelve hundred millions of the race just like yourselves, finding life a tremendous struggle; for who knows but that as the sun today draws up drops of water from the Caspian and the Black seas, and from the Amazon and the Mississippi, after a while to distil the rain, these very drops, on the fields—who knows but that the Sun of Righteousness may draw up the tears of your sympathy, and then rain them down in distillation of comfort o'er all the world.

ONDERFUL TRIUMPHS OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION.

tide is rising, the tide of moral and spiritual prosperity in the world. I think that any man who keeps his eyes open travelling in foreign lands will come to that conclusion. More Bibles than ever before, more churches, more consecrated men and women, more people ready to be martyrs now than ever before, if need be; so that, instead of there being, as people sometimes say, less spirit of martyrdom now than ever before, I believe where there was once one martyr, there would be a thousand martyrs if the fires were kindled—men ready to go through flood and fire for Christ's sake.

TIDE RISING.

You who live at the beach know how the tide rises. You see the tide rise; the wave comes to a certain point and then recoils. A man from the inland who had never watched the sea rising might say, "Why, the sea is going down." It is not. The tide is rising. The next wave comes to a higher point and it recoils, and the next to a higher point, and it recoils. "It is going down," says the man from inland. "No," you say, "it is rising." The next wave comes to a higher point, and the next to a higher, and so on until it is flood-tide. So it is in the progress of truth in the world. The wave comes to a certain point and it recoils. You say, "The world is getting worse, the tide of Christian influence is going out." No, the next wave comes to a higher point and recoils for a few years. Then it comes to a higher point and recoils for twenty years. Then it comes to a higher point and recoils. Then it comes to a higher point and a higher point until it shall be flood-tide. "And the earth shall be full of the knowledge of God, as the waters fill the sea."

These ships that you see going up and down New York harbor are to be brought into the service of God. All those ships I saw at Liverpool, at Southampton, at Glasgow—all those ships are to be brought into the service of Christ. What is that passage? Ships of Tarshish shall be presents. That is what it means! Oh! what a goodly fleet when the vessels of the sea come into the service of God, no guns frowning through the port-holes, no pikes hung in the gangway, nothing from cutwater to taffrail to suggest atrocity. Those ships will come from all parts of the seas.

Great flocks of ships that never met on the high sea but in wrath will cry "Ship ahoy!" and drop down beside each other in calmness, the flags of Emmanuel streaming from the top-gallants. The old slaver, with decks scrubbed and washed and glistening and burnished—the old slaver will wheel into line; and the Chinese junk, and the Venetian gondola, and the miner's and the pirate's corvette, will fall into line, equipped, readorned, beautified, only the small craft of this grand flotilla which shall float out for the truth—a flotilla mightier than the armada of Xerxes moving in the pomp and pride of Persian insolence—mightier than the Carthaginian navy rushing with forty thousand oarsmen upon the Roman galleys, the life of nations dashed out against the gunwales.

Rise, O sea, and shine, O heavens, to greet this squadron of light and victory! On the glistening decks are the feet of them that bring good tidings, and songs of heaven float among the rigging. Crowd on all the canvas. Line-of-battle ship and merchantmen, wheel into the way. It is noon. Strike eight bells. From all the squadron the sailors' songs arise. "Surely the isles shall wait for thee, and the ships of Tarshish to bring thy sons from afar, their silver and their gold with them, to the name of the Lord thy God, and the Holy One of Israel."

No Tobacco, the Maker's Plan.—Bishop Huntington, of Central New York, has a farm in Hadley, Mass. The region is devoted to the culture of tobacco, but the Bishop's land is an exception to the rule. When urged to go into the culture of it, he replied, "God made this soil to yield something that will nourish man or beast, and, without sitting in judgment on my neighbors, I choose to follow the Maker's plan."

The Restlessness of Parisians is thus Described by the Paris correspondent of the Tribune: "It is a characteristic sign of the contemporary Parisian that he cannot stay at home of an evening. Great or small, rich or poor, he must go out, and that in all seasons. Formerly theatres, balls, or evening walks were the exception for the Parisians. After dinner they stayed at home a as rule; they kissed the children, who said 'Good-night' on leaving the dining-room and went to bed; the mother sometimes did not think it beneath her to put them to bed herself. She would then until about ten embroider or work tapestry by the light of the lamp that stood on the round table. Husband and wife would converse together about the small events of the household, or the great events of the day; or the husband might, perchance, read the evening paper aloud. In that way the evening passed, long or short, according to the entente—more or less cordiale—of the spouses. Those were modest and quiet evenings, which a friendly visit would interrupt from time to time. At eleven, at the latest, the friends separated, and the lamp was turned out.

"Nowadays, the quiet pleasures of home have disappeared. People go out every evening. They go and see all the new pieces, never miss a Saturday night at the circus, a Friday at the Besselievre concert, or a Thursday at the hippodrome. From time to time they go to the cafés Chantants—the Ambassadeurs, the Horologe, the Alcazar. They are everywhere, in fact, of an evening, except at home, and that is why public establishments swarm in Paris, why the keepers of cafés become millionaires."

It is a sad picture, and the results of the absence of home life must inevitably be bad. (Isaiah 57 : 20.)

A Sad Result of Sunday Travelling is Recorded by an English clergyman as follows: "I was asked to visit a young man who was at the point of death. He seemed unprepared, and I prayed with him and pointed him to Christ. He said he had not prayed to God since he was in my church many years before, when he was in the choir. I asked what led him to leave off going to church. He said, 'I hope you won't be offended if I tell you. About fourteen years ago I was sitting in a coffee-house in the Holloway Road, London, when I took up a paper and read that on the morning of the previous Sunday you had preached at W——, twenty miles off, and in the evening you preached at your own church. Thus I found that you had been riding in the train on Sunday, breaking the fourth commandment. I thought that if you rode on Sunday there could be no harm in my doing the same, and the following Sunday I went to Brighton and back, and have never darkened the church door since. It was, I see now, wrong of me to do so; but that was the beginning of my downward career.' 'My good friend,' I exclaimed, 'I well remember that Sunday. It was one of the most unhappy days I have ever experienced, entirely on account of that Sunday journey. I resolved then never to travel again on Sunday, because I felt it was inconsistent with the command of God. Forgive me the bad example I then set.'

Lines by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.—When Mr. Spurgeon was once travelling among the Alps, and saw many of the grandest phenomena of creation, such as glacier, avalanche, and tempest, he was so impressed with the narrowness of visible things in comparison with God that he wrote the following lines:

"The mirror of the creatures lacketh space
To bear the image of the Infinite.
'Tis true the Lord hath fairly writ his name,
And set his seal upon creation's brow,
But as the skillful potter much excels
The vessel which he fashions on the wheel,
E'en so, but in proportion greater far,
Jehovah's self transcends his noblest works.
Earth's ponderous wheels would break, her axles snap,
If freighted with the load of Deity.
Space is too narrow for th' Eternal's rest,
And time too short a footstool for his throne."

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

Percival Parts with Lucie—Drives to the Police Station—Mickey Haley at the Station Recognizes Percival and Begins to Feel Uneasy—Percival is Himself Arrested—Jemmy Mehaffy—Reflections in the Gaol.

As may be supposed, Percival was utterly confounded at the words, voice, and excited manner of his betrothed. Greatly alarmed, but not for himself, he looked earnestly to see whether any sudden aberration of mind had come to his loved one, and the very idea of this filled him with unutterable pain and terror. But, no, there was too much method in her excitement and loving tenderness in her eyes to afford ground for any such dreadful suspicion, so calming himself that he might thus the more easily calm her, he quietly asked the meaning of her exhortations.

Her statements in reply altogether amazed and perplexed him. He went back in his thoughts over his words and deeds for the last two or three years, to see if he could remember anything that could give ground for such a procedure of the authorities against him as his beloved had reported; but, no, he could not recall a single expression or act by which he had committed himself. His answer to Mitchell's appeal in Green Street Court House did not come to his mind, for it had been spoken in a sudden transport of enthusiasm.

The affair was, therefore, a mystery; strive to reason it out as he would, he could find no clue by which to explain it. The only supposition, namely, the true one, that a miscreant, to glut his low and malicious revenge, had stained his conscience with the crime of perjury to vex and injure him, did not enter into his thoughts; for, judging from himself, and, indeed, from those of his fellows which of late he had met, such a theory of explanation never occurred to him, and if it had he would have flung it aside as altogether improbable, if not quite impossible. He paused, his mind a blank, or haunted with what seemed a horrid dream.

In her anxiety, impatient of his want of promptitude, Lucie repeated in a still more energetic manner her counsel of flight, and, to initiate it, seized his hand, which she had let go, and made an effort to draw him in the direction in which she wished him to hasten. Smiling at her, Percival said, "Lucie, darling, the news you have brought me is so extraordinary that unless I had it from yourself, upon the authority of your father, I could not believe it, and even yet it appears almost incredible; but if there be, as you announce, a warrant out for my arrest, the best thing for me to do will be not to attempt flight—that would be vain—but at once voluntarily to surrender myself." "No, Percival, no, you must not do that," interrupted Lucie. "What, my poor Percival"—and with eyes full of pity and love she looked into his face—"shut up by cruel men in a cold and dark cell, perhaps never to come out alive again. No, it would break my heart—I could not bear it. No, Percival, dearest, do—do fly!" and she threw all her powers of persuasion into her entreaty. "Fly this moment!" she cried vehemently, "and none can overtake you."

"My dear timid, and shall I say foolish, little Lucie," he said playfully, to tranquillize her; "your fears, I am afraid, have overmastered your usual sound judgment and common-sense. My flight, darling, I repeat, would be utterly unavailing; the law has too many agents on its side to make it long possible. And do you not see, my darling, that to run away and hide myself would be construed into an acknowledgment of guilt? I am innocent, Lucie."

"Yes, I know you are!" she cried passionately.

"Then, dearest," he said, "my wisest plan will be to bring my past conduct to the test at once, and by proof of the wrong that is being done me, confound my accusers."

Percival, giving Lucie a kiss, which he could do, as the road they stood upon was retired, said, "Good-by, darling, take heart and be of good courage. God will not forsake me, and I expect our separation will be but very temporary. And then you know, my dearest one"—and Percival looked his devotedness—"absence will make the heart grow fonder, and our next meeting will be only more delightful and joyous from our short season of parting. One thing, however, do for me, dearest: send word to Alick of what has taken place. Perhaps your brother Arthur will take your message. I think he will, if not for my sake, at least for yours; he knows Alick's rooms, and when to find him."

When he had thus spoken, after another tender farewell, he turned down the road in a direction opposite from Mr. Lemaire's dwelling. Lucie stood with suffused eyes gazing at his retreating form, and did not begin to take her way home until Percival for some time had disappeared from sight.

Percival's first idea was to go to his lodgings and pack into a small bag a few necessaries. Upon reflection, however, he thought it better not to show himself in Rathmines. He might be recognized by those who had the warrant, and be arrested, and he wished not to be taken by a subordinate, but to boldly deliver himself up at headquarters, and a message, he supposed, could be sent any time to Jemmy to fetch him whatever he might require from Mrs. Spencer's. He therefore resolved to reach the city by Harold's Cross, a suburb parallel with Rathmines, about a mile's space lying between them. Every policeman he met was passed with more or less shyness; but without any interference he reached the suburb he wanted. There he called a cab, and told the man to drive to the Head Inspector's Office, Castle Yard, Dublin. Upon arrival, mounting the steps before the office door, he entered the great hall and asked to see the chief of the constabulary department. He was told the chief was very much engaged, but that he could see a subordinate.

"No," answered Percival; "I must see the chief himself; and I shall wait until he is at leisure."

"Very well," said a policeman acting as doorkeeper. "Please, sir, step this way into the waiting-room."

When he entered the room a man was standing in it, whom, perhaps, he ought to have recognized, but he did not. The man was Mickey Haley. Carried beyond the bounds of prudence, not content with his morning haul, he had come again to make a new demand for money upon the pretence of bringing further information. His altered dress doubtless hindered Percival's recognition of him; for, as we know, Mickey, since coming to Dublin, had discarded the blue swallow-tailed coat, corduroy knee-breeches, bright necktie, and brogues—the normal livery of an Irish piper—and had assumed a costume more in accordance, in his opinion, with his new calling of "litherary man."

He, however, instantly knew Percival, for recently more than once, as we know, he had seen him. Percival's coming into the room greatly disconcerted Mickey. He did not know how to account for it. He saw Percival was free, under no arrest, and had of his own free will walked, as it were, into the lions' den. The thought at once flashed upon him that his act of perjury had been found out, and that Percival had been sent into the room to identify him.

Greatly frightened, and of a craven heart, he was about to fling himself upon his knees before Percival and beg for mercy, but the next moment, with his quick glance and ready intelligence, perceiving that Percival did not recognize him, he changed his demeanor and walked with a great show of leisure and indifference towards the room door, passed out, and giving up all thought of making more money that day out of "the Castle fools," as he called them, hurried down the office steps and hastened t also its antiquity."

America, it is true, has no Pyra
Egypt; no Colosseum like Rome; no cathedrals like Winchester and Col libraries like the Vatican and the B seum; no universities like Oxford a no art collections like Paris and Flo poets like Shakespeare and Milton, or

Schiller; no philosophers like Plato and Aristotle or Leibnitz or Kant; no historians like Gibbon and Macaulay, or Neander and Giesler; no theologians like Augustine and Calvin.

America lives on the immortal works of genius which older countries and former generations have produced. She was discovered by an Italian sailing under the Spanish flag, and named after another Italian; she derived her language, laws, customs, and religion from England; her idea of a republican confederation from Switzerland and Holland; her population, books, and works of art from all parts of the globe. Without the preceding history of Europe she would be still an unknown wilderness, inhabited by savages. America has learned and claims a joint inheritance in the potent traditions and historic memories of all Christian nations, from whom she gathered her own population. The few of her historic spots, as Jamestown, Plymouth Rock, Independence Hall, Mount Vernon, touch English history in some of its most important epochs, and are as inseparably connected with it as the stem is with the root. The achievements and fame of Christopher Columbus, Sir Walter Raleigh, Captain John Smith, the Pilgrim Fathers, Roger Williams, William Penn, General Oglethorpe, Bishop Berkeley, John Wesley, George Whitefield, Count Zinzendorf, General Lafayette, Dr. Priestley, Louis Agassiz, James M'Cosh, and other distinguished men of modern times, are divided between their native Europe and their temporary or permanent home in America. In one respect we may term

A GREAT DEAL IN A SHORT TIME,

AMERICA A NEW EDITION OF EUROPE.

Human nature and Divine grace are the same in all ages and countries, and the great antagonist of God is as busy in the new world as in the old. There is nothing new under the sun. And yet there is nothing old under the sun. History never repeats itself. Every age and every nation have a peculiar mission to fulfil, and add to the capital of wisdom and experience. America is not a feeble echo of Europe, but is honoring her ancestry by making a profitable investment of her rich inheritance, and will transmit it doubled in value to posterity.

ITS ECCLESIASTICAL ORGANIZATIONS

are formed of all the churches and sects of Europe. It strikes its root in the most excited and interesting period of English history, in the first half of the seventeenth century, when all the leading English denominations, except the Methodists, assumed a separate organization. It embraces the Anglican Episcopal Church, the Congregational, the Presbyterian, the Baptist, the Methodist Churches, and the Society of Friends — of English descent. Ireland furnishes the chief material for the Roman Catholic Church; Germany for the Lutheran, German Reformed, and Moravian; Holland for the Dutch Reformed Church.

All the historical denominations are now represented in America except the old Greek Church, which numbers but one congregation in New York, in connection with the Russian Embassy, and another in Alaska territory, which was bought from Russia under President Lincoln's administration. But these churches are not, and probably never will be, moulded into one national American Church. They exist as separate independent organizations, on a basis of equality before the law, enjoying the protection of the Government, but deriving no support from it. They are self-supporting and self-governing.

CHRISTIAN CHARACTER OF THE AMERICAN NATION.

the religion of the American people may be judged from the number of churches and Sunday-schools, colleges and seminaries, from the extent of Bible-reading, Sabbath-keeping, church-going, liberal giving, and active charity, they need not fear a comparison with any nation in Christendom. The clergy are, upon the whole, the most respected and influential class of the community. They are invited to all public festivities, and called upon to open even political meetings with the invocation of the Divine blessing. Christianity is an integral part of the common law of the land, and enjoys as much protection in courts of justice as in any country under the sun. It is deeply rooted in national habits, which are even stronger than laws, and has a mighty hold on the respect and affections of all classes of society. A strict regard for

is a national American custom, and dates from the first settlement of the country, especially in Puritan New England. Law and custom go hand in hand. So general and deep-rooted is this sentiment in the American people, that President Lincoln, even in the midst of the civil war, when everything seemed to give way to military necessity, issued a memorable order enjoining the proper observance of the Sabbath upon the officers and men in the army and navy. The order, dated Washington, November 15th, 1862, said—

"The importance for man and beast of the prescribed weekly rest, the sacred rights of Christian soldiers and sailors, a becoming deference to the best sentiment of a Christian people, and a due regard for the Divine will, demand that Sunday labor in the army and navy be reduced to the measure of strict necessity."

The sanctity of the American Sabbath is threatened by infidels and foreigners from the Continent, who would like to turn it into a day of secular amusement, and to substitute the theatre and beer saloon for the church and Sunday-school. The Sabbath Committee of New York have done a good work in the direction of maintaining their time-honored institution, and have stimulated similar efforts in other large cities. The great British and Foreign Bible Society forms a common platform for ministers and men who widely differ in their theological views, and continues to send forth complete versions or portions in upwards of 220 languages, and in an ever increasing ratio.

Truly, England may be said to be— in no exclusive sense, however—the land of the Bible. Attempts have been made, no doubt, to dissociate education from religious teaching. The Government no longer grants pecuniary aid or subsidy to schools in respect of the religious teaching. Probably those who agitated for the change were guided by a cold philosophy rather than by any particular concern for the spiritual good of the people. Be that as it may, it is certain that the popular instinct still demands and prefers religious education. Parents have a feeling that the Bible is the thing for their children. Sunday-schools are more than ever flourishing and well cared for. Ladies and gentlemen and persons of humbler life also find their places as volunteer teachers. There is one ex-Lord Chancellor of England who has been all his life a Sunday-school teacher. The names of the most recent holders of the Great Seal, Hatherley, Selborne, and Cairns, vie with one another in religious as in legal excellence.

If England is the land of the Bible, it is undoubtedly the country of the Sabbath, in its most blessed sense as the Lord's day. Whatever may be the premises, whether kept more or less as a Jewish Sabbath or as a day of Christian liberty, whether from love or from fear, the conclusion arrived at is the same, to keep the seventh day holy. Most of us will recognize the perfect liberty of the Christian not to judge, or to be judged, in respect of a holy day; and I, for one, would even take my stand upon the Lord's most precious assurance that "the Sabbath was made for man." In proportion as that is recognized and understood I believe the mind of man will be in accordance with the mind of God, and the observance of the Lord's day must be happy and successful and well marked.

It is a grand fact—I hold it to be a great national fact—that the Sabbath is regarded by all thoughtful British Protestants as a Divine institution of the very first rank. I grieve to say that the modern facilities of locomotion and travel have made many of our people look to the Continent for some justification of a lax observance of the Sunday. But assuredly theatres, balls, bands of music, worldly pleasure-seeking of all kinds, par excellence upon the Sunday, must be distinctly contrary to the mind of God. The sanctification of the Sabbath, spoken of by Isaiah, points forward to the latter days. "If thou turn thy foot from the Sabbath, the holy of the Lord, honorable," etc. Great Britain has to a large extent reaped the blessing spoken of, and now desires that its voice may be heard gently but yet firmly protesting against the desecration of the Sabbath in other lands, while it longs sincerely that the blessing which has been realized in its own case may be extended in a still higher degree far and wide to all Protestant nations of the earth.

I have pointed out thus briefly what seem to be three of the favorable features in the present state of Protestantism in Great Britain—reverence for the Word of God, observance of the Sabbath, active Evangelization. Are there no

DRAWBACKS TO THIS HAPPY PICTURE?

I have observed that Ritualism and semi-Romanism are not likely to obtain a hold over the English people. They may, nevertheless, jeopardize the continued existence of the Church of England. It is certain that a most deleterious influence is continually exerted upon the younger clergy. High notions of apostolical succession and priestly power are germane to the human heart. The old Adam of Sacerdotalism is the Ritualists' New Man! While that church is doing a vast amount of good both at home and abroad, a strange apathy has hitherto prevailed in it generally concerning innovations which are the result of an organized conspiracy to undo the work of the Reformation in England, and to unite the Established Church with the Church of Rome.

There prevails, moreover, among many of the clergy who are not Ritualists an excessive spirit of clericalism, and an indisposition to hold intercommunion with other ministers. I know no such source of weakness to the Church of England as the exclusiveness of so many of the clergy. When the principles of the Evangelical Alliance are better understood among them, I shall have more hope of the continuance of this Church to which I belong as a great national establishment of blessing. If, however, the evils of Roman Ritualism and excessive clericalism are not soon seriously grappled with, and cast out, I freely admit it may be better for Protestantism at large that a disruption of the Church of England should take place, and Evangelical principles be more clearly vindicated in the next phase of its existence.

Upon the other hand, the too common introduction of political questions into spiritual controversy on the part of other religious bodies in England tends to make the position of the Evangelical clergy of the Established Church more difficult, and so to lessen the united force of Protestantism.

The Protestantism of Great Britain, and of the Continent too, loses for want of union and intercommunion. The fault is greatly, if not altogether, upon the English side. The harsh Act of Uniformity, passed in 1662, which required episcopal ordination in every case, operates to this day most unfavorably towards the great objects for which we are here assembled. Great and good men have ever deplored the coldness and exclusiveness which it has engendered. There is a church in every parish of England and Wales, but its pulpit to this day may not be offered to the pastor of another church, however distinguished. It results from this that, so far as the National Church is concerned, foreign churches are shut off from any official communion with it.

The grand object of our Conference here is to cement more closely together in love and union all those who love the Lord Jesus Christ, to whatsoever denomination of Christians they may belong, and to give fresh impulse to the fruits of faith everywhere, that the world may believe in Jesus.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Public Attention is Still Concentrated on the fall electoral campaign in New York, Massachusetts, and Ohio. As is usually the case, the representatives of both the great parties speak confidently of their prospects, but as yet no decisive evidence of the current of public opinion has made itself manifest. Apart from the personal merits of the candidates and local matters, the test questions on which they differ are principally those on which the last Congress were at issue with the President, and are included in the denomination of State rights.

Massacre by Indians.—Intelligence has been received that Major Thornburgh, with three companies of cavalry, was attacked on Monday, September 29th, while passing near a cañon near Milk River, Colorado, by several hundred Ute Indians. Major Thornburgh and 13 men were killed, and 20 or more were wounded. The Indians burned a wagon train and killed about three fourths of the horses of the troops. The white party fell back and intrenched. Troops are now being collected from all around that part of the West, and are being hurried forward at the utmost speed to the rescue of the command, which is in a position of great danger.

This calamity will no doubt arouse in the first instance a demand for vengeance; but it should call attention to the mode in which we have dealt with the Red man. It has not been such as to inspire him with respect for the white man's honor, justice, or religion. The President, by his recent warning to intending settlers on Indian reservations, has initiated a reform in these matters which for the sake of our own credit ought to be stringently enforced.

An Enthusiastic Reception was Tendered to Dr. Talmage on his return from Great Britain by his church and congregation on Friday last, October 3d. He arrived by the Cunard steamer Bothnia on September 30th, and was met by a party of private friends, who sailed down the bay to meet him.

The public reception on Friday was of the most cordial character, and showed the high esteem in which Dr. Talmage is held by the Tabernacle Church.

The interior of the Tabernacle, particularly the platform, was lavishly and tastefully decorated with flowers of every imaginable tint, the fragrance from them permeating the atmosphere. A large framed photograph of the pastor was conspicuous on the wall behind the platform, with an American and an English flag draped on either side, and the word "Welcome" formed in flowers beneath it. Flowers seemed to be everywhere; lining the stage, hanging from the lamps and galleries, in baskets, artistic designs, bouquets, and in pots. There were at least 5000 people inside, and a large number unable to obtain admission remained in the street during the whole of the exercises.

On the platform were the Hon. A. W. Tenney in the chair, the Mayor of Brooklyn, ex-Mayors Schroeder and Hunter, Judge Neilson, the Hon. John Winslow, the Revs. Drs. Lansing, Ingersoll, Peck, Sims, and many others. An enterprising publisher had printed the "Talmage March," as composed by George W. Morgan, and distributed it among the audience.

The editor of the Brooklyn Times delivered a congratulatory address, and other speakers vied with each other in expressing the pleasure with which they welcomed the pastor. Rev. John O. Peck, of St. John's Methodist Church, Williamsburg, said he united with the church in welcoming Dr. Talmage because "he was not a bigot, and, therefore, not a sectarian. He is too big a man," said he, alluding to the action of Dr. Talmage's enemies, "to be pocketed by a little Presbytery. And he is so orthodox that, under examination, not the least scintilla of heresy could be detected in him even by a jury of microscopes." He welcomed him to the throne which he had occupied as "a King and a Prince."

Dr. Talmage expressed his thanks for the cordial manner in which he had been welcomed on his return, and spoke in strong terms of the kindliness and heartiness of his reception by the British public. He alluded to the friendly feeling existing between England and America, and said: "In my first public utterance I put your hand in their hand, and declared the forms of eternal marriage between England and the United States. 'What God hath joined together let no man put asunder.'"

Dr. Talmage preached to overflowing congregations on Sunday, and his morning sermon reported for the CHRISTIAN HERALD will be found on another page.

The Sunday Law at Newark, N. J., will be a prominent question in the forthcoming elections. The Christian citizens of Newark are making a determined stand against the attempts of worldly men to turn the Lord's Day into a day of amusement and dissipation. They have made a brave fight, despising ridicule, and resisting the interested efforts of those who tried to evade the law. They now propose to make the question a test for candidates at the polls. The Republicans at a mass meeting passed a resolution to the effect that "it is the duty of the Republican Convention to adopt resolutions pledging the party to the enforcement of all laws relating to Sunday observance now on the statute-book."

The N. Y. Sunday-School Association calls attention to the days of special prayer for Sunday-school work the world over, which have been proposed by the London Sunday-School Union, and earnestly recommends the setting apart of Sunday and Monday, October 19th and 20th, for the purpose indicated. The following outline of services, prepared in 1877 by one of our best Sunday-schools, is appended for adoption or modification:

1. Sunday morning, 9 to 9.30, Special prayer circle of teachers: "Our Needs as Teachers"—holiness, knowledge, love.

2. Sabbath morning, 9.30 to 10, Special Sabbath-school prayer circle: "The Needs of the Unbelieving in our School"—a sense of sin, a will to accept Christ, a life for Him.

3. Sabbath afternoon, 5.30 to 6, Special private prayer: "The Needs of all Workers for God"—prayer for pastors, superintendents, and other officers, teachers, missionaries.

4. Sabbath evening, 6.45 to 7.25, Young people's prayer-meeting: "The Needs of Young Believers"—watchfulness, strength, joy.

5. Monday, 7 A.M., Special private prayer "The Needs of my own Heart"—personal confession.

6. Monday evening, 8 to 9, Special prayer circle for teachers: "The special needs of each teacher's flock"—as under home training (Christian or un-Christian), as affected by daily employment, as influenced by companions, as "le captive by the adversary," as still in God's lov and care.

The Yellow Fever at Memphis is now a thoritatively pronounced to be on the wane; r ports show that it is abating rapidly, and th the epidemic will soon cease. It is the opinic of the best informed physicians that the steac decline in new cases and in cases of death w continue, and that by the end of the presei month quarantine should be raised, if n sooner, as all danger will probably be over that time. No one can tell how many perso and churches have interceded with God for th result.

A Moral Leper Healed.—At a Meeting the Gospel Tent, New York, a convert said:

"I have been a moral leper for many yea and, like the leper, I was an outcast, dwelli without the limits of decent society. No c would touch me; though I was wounded a bruised, there was no good Samaritan for n All passed me by on the other side; or if so one chanced to stumble over me, he only kicl me out of his path as an utterly unworthy hopeless case. Not only my friends, but nearest kindred, had cast me off, and would see me or help me. I was homeless, helpl hopeless.

"I did not sink to this base level withou struggle. God only knows how often and h hard I fought to obtain relief from my terr malady. I have even gone before a police tice, and committed myself to the Island months. But it was of no avail; I was sinl lower and lower, till a good man told me of power of Jesus as a Saviour. I felt it was my chance. So, like the leper of old, I wen Jesus, and cried, 'Lord, if Thou wilt, Thou c make me clean,' and He put forth His hand touched me, (oh, how I thank God for touch!) and said, 'I will; be thou clean;' from that day to this I have been whole o disease."

The Socialist Convention at Cincinnati as not been a success. Only two hundred pe ns assembled. These, however, under the p dency of Elizur Wright, of Boston, adopted lutions demanding free admission to the ils for all books, pamphlets, and papers, irre tive of the religious, irreligious, political, nd scientific views they might contain; demai ng the repeal of the laws regarding obscene l ture until certain passages in the Bible a expunged; pledging the delegates to use th influence for candidates for public offices ho would publicly declare for the absolute secul tion of Government; and the President the League was authorized to call a National convention at his discretion to nominate cand ites for President and Vice-President in 1880.

A Modern Ruth.—A Young Physici in California was engaged to be married to a ung lady in a Southern State, and as a kee ake sent her a small nugget of gold. He was ros perous, and the wedding was fixed for a ariy date. But a sudden fall in his circums nces reduced him to poverty. Too honorable t hold the young lady to her promise in his alter cumstances, he reluctantly and with m y heart pang wrote releasing her from her e gage ment. But the young lady had a brave and resolved on keeping her promise in s te the change in her lover's position. he Semi-Millennium of the English Bible ll be completed in the year 1880, the transla- n of the New Testament by John de Wycliffe ving been issued in 1380. The American ble Society has been asked to signalize the oc- sion in some manner. When we reflect on e results which have followed that great work, d that America and England owe their pros- rity and civilization mainly to the fact that e Bible has been read, studied, and loved by the ass of the people, it will be clear that the an- versary deserves a public celebration. For arly half of those 500 years the civil and eccle- astical powers were combined to stamp out the nglish Bible with fire and sword; but the Word God has mightily grown and prevailed. (Acts : 20.)

"The Eighty-eighth Man" was Introduced Mr. Moody to the gathering at Cooper Union September 30th. His name is Mr. James ardiner, but he is known as the eighty-eighth an from the circumstances of his conversion. e had been blessed with a pious mother, but he grew to manhood her teachings were for- otten, and he became a drunkard and a profli- ate. Entering a church at Baltimore one day hile Mr. Moody was holding a meeting, his at- ention was caught by the chorus of the 88th ymn, "Come, oh! come to me." He was un- er the influence of liquor at the time, but the ords made a deep impression on him, and al- hough he tried every means to shake it off he ailed; for the Spirit of God riveted them in his eart. He returned to the church the next day, nd under Mr. Moody's guidance ultimately ave his heart to the Saviour. As he narrated he circumstances at Cooper Union, his voice roke down as he recalled the time when he tarted from home in the morning to spend the ay in carousing with his companions; his wife aying to him as he left, "O James, I am so hungry." "But now," he said, "the dark days are gone, my wife is a cheerful Christian wom- an, and I have the happiest little home in all Baltimore."

Wanganui, New Zealand, is One of the Numerous places to which the 170,000 weekly copies of the CHRISTIAN HERALD wing their way. Nearly fifty copies are sold there each week, and a resident writes that it has been blessed to many souls in that town.

A Scriptural Description Literally Illustrated.—Deborah Nott, mother of Samuel Nott, D.D., of Franklin, and Eliphalet Nott, D.D, LL.D., long President of Union College, was the wife of a farmer, whose ill-health prevented his taking an active part in the work of the farm, which in consequence was far from prosperous. They were very poor; and possessed but one cow and a few sheep. On one occasion one of the boys wanted a new suit of clothes in the dead of winter. They had no money, and the year's stock of wool was exhausted: so the good mother proposed that they should shear the half-grown fleece from one of their sheep, and to protect it from the cold make it a garment either of braided straw or the worn-out family clothing; all of which was accordingly done, and in one week from the shearing she had spun the wool, and her boy was provided with the clothing needed (Prov. 31 : 13-21).

One of her sons became one of the most successful college presidents, touching with a transforming power thousands and thousands of young men. The other was a faithful and successful minister of the Gospel for sixty-one years in the same parish.

A Tradesman Advertised for a Boy to Work in the store, run errands, and make himself generally useful. In a few hours the store was thronged with boys of all ages, wanting the situation. The man only wanted one boy, but to get the right one was the difficulty. He thought he must find some plan to lessen the number of applicants, and give him a better opportunity of selecting a good one. So he sent them all away, and thought the matter over a little. The next morning the papers contained the following advertisement: "Wanted, a Boy who obeys his Mother!" And how many do you suppose did come? The story is that there were only two of all the boys seeking employment in that big city who felt that they could honestly come and say, "I obey my mother." Many people overlook the sternness with which God insists upon obedience to parents.

A Postal Race Round the Earth.—A Gentleman in Sweden despatched on the 18th of April last two post-office cards, the one to the British consulate at Madras, and the other to a commercial firm at San Francisco, with the request to forward them on to himself, the former via Japan and San Francisco back to Ljungskile, Sweden, and the latter via Japan and Madras back to Ljungskile, the one eastward and the other westward, the object being to ascertain which of the cards would come back soonest to the sender. The result has been that the card which went eastward returned on the 11th of August, and the other on the following day, the former after 116 days, and the latter after 117 days' journey round the world.

Two Mice Imprisoned in a Glass Ball.—A gentleman at Elizabeth, N. J., lately found two brown mice securely entrapped in a hollow glass ball, such as is used by marksmen. A barrel of balls had been stored nearly all summer for occasional practice, and the other day it was emptied for cleaning. In picking out the balls the gentleman noticed that one near the bottom of the barrel felt heavy, and found the two bright-eyed little creatures securely imprisoned inside, and with none too much room to turn about. It is supposed the mice crept in through the small opening when they were young, and finding grain in the ball to eat, remained until they had grown too large to return by the aperture. So men have been led by the delights of this world to occupy positions in which their souls have been held captive by Satan.

Ask and Ye shall Receive.—The following extract, telling of four distinct answers to prayer, is from a letter recently received at the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting: "Some time ago I sent a request asking your prayers for a revival in our church. Your prayers were answered. Then I asked prayer for the conversion of a sister and her husband, and they have since been converted and baptized and joined the same church. Then I sent a request for prayer for the recovery of a neighbor who was sick and seemed past all hope of recovery. She has been restored, and her health is now good. Please to return thanks to God and give Him all the glory."

The Portrait and Life of the Late Dr. J. Parrish Thompson, formerly pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle Church, New York, who recently died in Berlin, will appear in the next number of the CHRISTIAN HERALD.

THE KING-PRIEST.

A New Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"He shall sit and rule upon His throne; and He shall be a priest upon His throne: and the counsel of peace shall be between them both."—ZECHARIAH 6 : 13.

Historical Setting of the Text—I. The Glorious Combination of Offices—The Royal Posture—Indicative of Rest—Of Permanence—Of Right—1. The Kingly Priest—In his Offering—A Priest to Save and a King to Rule—Royal Pleading—Not as in the Garden—The Invitation from the King-Priest—2. The Priestly King—A King with a Priest's Tenderness—With a Priest's Mercy—The King Priestly in his War—II. The Happy Result—Peace in Heaven and on Earth—III. Action in Harmony—Precious Materials—"Make Crowns"—Memorials of Men.

LET us first look at the historical setting of this passage. It would seem that three Jews of the captivity had come from Babylon with a contribution towards the building of the temple at Jerusalem under Zerubbabel and Joshua. Their names are given in the tenth verse of the chapter before us.

Now, the Jews at Jerusalem had become exceedingly exclusive, and in some measure rightly so. They would not accept help for the building of the temple from the Samaritans because they were a mixed race, but they said to them, "Ye have nothing to do with us to build a house unto our God, but we ourselves together will build unto the Lord God of Israel." Possibly they had begun to feel some coolness with reference to the captivity at Babylon, that inasmuch as they did not come back to their own land their descent must be proved before they acknowledged them. If they would not quit the ease and comfort of the towns in which they were settled and come up to Jerusalem to work with their brethren, could they be sure that they were really Israelites. At any rate, there would need to be some inquiry into their pedigree that they might not be receiving help from Samaritan pretenders.

There was, however, no difficulty about the acceptance of the offerings in this case, for the prophet Zechariah was bidden to hasten down that same day and meet the three worthy Jews from Babylon. He was to accept for the Lord the tribute which they had brought, and make of it crowns of silver and gold. He was then to go with these brethren and Josiah, the son of Zephaniah, their host, down to the temple, call for the high priest, Joshua, or Jesus, the son of Josedech, and place these coronets of silver and gold upon his head. This was to be done, not as an honor to the individual, but as a prophetic token that there would in due time arise One who would be a priest crowned with many crowns.

This illustrious personage, who is called "the Branch," was to spring out of the decayed house of David, like a shoot from a tree which has been cut down even to the stump: according to the prophecy of Isaiah, "And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his roots" (Is. 11 : 1). He was to be both a priest and a king, even as David had prophesied in the hundred and tenth Psalm: "The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek." Now Melchizedek combined the king and the priest in one person, as also doth our Lord Jesus of whom Zechariah spoke. This royal priest was to build the real temple of God, which the temple at Jerusalem could never be, for the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands.

It was also intimated by the prophet that as at that particular time men had come from afar, and had brought offerings to the temple, so in the days of this great priest-king many should come from the uttermost ends of the earth, and should themselves be built into the temple of the Lord God. This is the historical setting of our text: now we have to learn its spiritual lesson. May the Holy Spirit be our instructor.

I shall try this morning to set our Lord Jesus before you, as far as I can, in that double glory which is peculiar to Himself: in the majesty of His royalty and the holiness of His priesthood. Such lights meet not in any other star. To no one else belongeth the royal priesthood, save only that he reflects his own brightness upon his brethren, whom he hath made to be priests and kings.

The subject will run thus: first let us consider the glorious combination of offices in the person of Christ; secondly, let us notice the happy result of it—"the counsel of peace shall be between them both:" and then, thirdly, let us suggest the action on our part which is harmonious thereto—make crowns and set them upon the head of Jesus.

I. First, then, I want you to consider at this time which is found in the person of Jesus Christ our Lord.

THE GLORIOUS COMBINATION

Note, first, that he is King, and of Him as King it is written, "He shall sit and rule upon His throne." One has the idea of ease suggested by the expression. Few kings have been able to sit and rule, but they have been forced to rise and rush hither and thither to defend their sovereignty. No other seat in the world is so uneasy as a throne.

We have seen monarchs elevated by their soldiery, or borne aloft by the fickle throng; bayonets or ballot-boxes have been the frail supports of their thrones. The later centuries have been a sorry time for kings. As once men feared to be thought prophets, so might men in revolutionary times have cried out each one, "I am not a king nor the son of a king." But our Lord Jesus sits upon a throne which knows no trouble; once for all has He bled and died, but now He has gone into His glory never to be disturbed again.

Sitting is the posture of abiding as well as resting. Jesus reigns on, and will reign on so long as the moon endureth. "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever." Even we, who are yet young, have seen dynasties come and go, and we have seen the kingdoms of the earth moved and tossed to and fro as the waves of the sea, yet the throne of Jesus has not been shaken, for it is written, "The Lord sitteth upon the flood; yea, the Lord sitteth King for ever." "The Lord is great in Zion, and He is high above all the people." "The Lord shall reign for ever and ever." Hallelujah!

As a King, He is described as sitting upon His own throne. He has not usurped the throne of another, but His right to sovereignty is indisputable. He has well deserved to be King of men, since He is their Redeemer. His Father hath given Him a crown as the reward of the travail of His soul, even as He promised: "Therefore will I divide Him a portion with the great, and He shall divide the spoil with the strong, because He hath poured out His soul unto death." He sits upon a throne which He has won by conquest, for He has vanquished the powers of darkness, and led captivity captive.

His right to His throne can never be disputed, for it is accorded to Him by the enthusiastic suffrages of all His people. Do we not sing,

> "Bring forth the royal diadem,
> And crown him Lord of all"?

There is no monarch so secure as He. He is really and truly King by right divine. He is King by descent, for He is Son and heir of the Highest. He is King by His own intrinsic excellence, for there is none to be compared to Him. And He is King by His own native might and majesty, for He Himself holds the throne against all comers, and shall hold it till all enemies shall be under His feet. Thus is He spoken of as King.

A hint or two is given as to His position as priest—namely, that He is first priest before He is King, for so was the type in the text. Jesus, the son of Josedech, was already high priest, and then He was crowned with the gold and silver crowns. Now, the kingdom of which we speak to-day is not that of Christ's essential royalty as by nature divine, and therefore Lord of all, but that which His Father hath given Him, because, "Being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross."

We note, too, with regard to our Lord's priesthood that He is said to sit, for if He sits as king it is implied that He sits as priest: indeed, it is expressly said, "He shall be a priest upon His throne." Now, of no other priest is it said that he sitteth, for the apostle saith, "Every priest standeth, daily ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins." There was no seat provided within the holy place for Aaron, or for any of the priests; they were servants of God, and they stood daily ministering. "But this man, after He had offered one sacrifice for sins forever, sat down on the right hand of God; from henceforth expecting till His enemies be made His footstool. For by one offering He hath perfected forever them that are sanctified."

Jesus sitteth still for evermore in quiet expectancy, for all His work is done: no merit to be wrought out to complete His righteousness, no sufferings to be endured to perfect His atonement. "It is finished," He said as He gave up the ghost, and it is finished; and in token thereof Jehovah saith unto Him, "Sit thou at my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool." So far, then, we have a glimpse of the King sitting on His throne, and of the Priest, crowned, and resting from His labors.

THE ROYAL PRIEST.

Thus far we have seen each office, now we are to see the two combined in the Lord Jesus: and to make the combination clear we shall notice, first, that as a priest He is royal; and then, secondly, that as a king He is priestly.

1. Consider, now, that as a priest our Lord is royal. He was a priest when He honored the law by His own death; He was a priest when He took upon Himself our sin, and bore it, offering His own soul as the victim upon the altar of His body: He was to the full a priest when He presented His one sacrifice for sin; but never let it be forgotten that even then, in His nature, He was a king. The sword of vengeance awoke against the man who was Jehovah's fellow even when He bled.

The laws which He vindicated had been ordained by Himself; and it adds a special glory to His priestly work of atonement that it was wrought by the royal Lawgiver Himself. The subject broke the laws, but it was the King who bore the penalty. He that is under law offendeth, but He that made the law came under the law that He might make amends to the injured honor of His own justice. This was a notable deed of love and of justice combined. Let us confide the more surely upon the sacrifice of our great High Priest, because of the dignity of His nature, and the supremacy of His rank, even when He made Himself of no reputation and took upon Himself the form of a servant.

Our Lord stooped to the lowest service for our sakes when He was acting as a priest among us in these lower realms. He presented Himself as an offering for sin, and men scourged Him, and spat upon Him, and hung Him up like a felon, and in all this shame and suffering we look to Him as our Saviour. Thus He made expiation for sin. But though we are to look to Him in that capacity for the pardon of sin, as men sought cleansing of a priest, we must never forget that now He expects homage from us, and we must come to Him for government as men pay obedience to a king.

O you that come to Him to-day laden with guilt and full of fears, to wash yourselves in the fountain which He filled from His own veins, you must also come to obey Him, and to walk in His statutes. You may not come to Him merely that you may get your sins forgiven, you must come to be cleansed from the power of evil, and to yield yourselves unto God. Jesus was given that He might be a Leader and a Commander to the people, as well as their Deliverer and Saviour.

A true disciple looks to his Master for ruling as well as for teaching, and he expects to render obedience as well as to receive instruction. There may be no separation between these two points: our Priest to save must ever be regarded as our King to rule. He puts away sin, but He expects to reign over the forgiven spirit; He washes our feet, but He looks that we also practise His precepts and example of love, for He says, "Ye also ought to wash one another's feet."

At this moment in heaven, if your eyes of faith can see the Lord Jesus, you perceive that He is pleading for His people as a priest. It is a priest's duty to offer intercession for those over whom he is appointed; and this Jesus does continually. Hath He not said, "For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest"? He ever liveth to make intercession for them that come to God by Him. But do not forget that our Lord does not make intercession otherwise than royally. There is no prostration now amidst the olives of the gloomy garden, no bloody sweat, no strong crying and tears. He saith not, "Not as I will, but as thou wilt," but He urges His suit in another fashion.

As a priest our Redeemer not only pleads with God, but He blesses the people. It was the work of the high priest to pronounce the benediction over the house of Israel. Jesus does that, but He does it royally; I mean He does i with the power of a king as well as with the commission of a priest. He does not merel wish us good, but He works us good. There i omnipotent sovereignty at the back of the priestly benediction. He that speaks and declare His people to be justified, accepted, preserved and blessed, is He who can make good Hi words. The benediction of Jesus the Priest i the benediction of Jesus the King. Let us rejoice and be glad in this.

And now, beloved, it is as a priest that Jesu sends out His Gospel to the ends of the earth In that Gospel He invites men to come to Hir that He may purge them from their uncleannes To-day He speaks by us, His ministers, an bids men come to the great Priest that He ma heal them of their leprosy, and deliver them fror all manner of defilement; but, mark you, it is a invitation from a King as well as from a Pries and he that rejects it shall be counted guilty c disloyalty and high treason. "He that believet not shall be damned."

2. THE PRIESTLY KING.

Thus I have put forward the combination i one form, and testified that Jesus as a priest right kingly in all that He doth. Let us no turn the other side of the truth towards th light, and see that as a King he always retai His priestly character, and in the deeds of H sovereignty He acts not otherwise than as th high-priest of His people.

The Lord Jesus Christ is King over all at th very moment. He reigns over the whole worl and, notwithstanding all this hurly-burly of a fairs, this perpetual clamor of wars and rumors wars, His kingdom ruleth over all. Our Lord Master of the game, and He shall surely win the end. "The government shall be upon H shoulders."

But, blessed be His name, our Lord's king majesty is ever softened and sweetened by H priestly tenderness, else He would have crush this world out of existence long ago. If ru had been all, and mercy had not claimed h share, justice would have swept away this reb lious race. If Jesus were not Priest as well King, He would say to His angels, "Go and smi that nation which refuses my Gospel. Go ar scourge that favored nation which, having th gospel of peace, yet chooses war, and with hig looks and lofty words provokes bloodshed." H does not destroy, because His office is to forgi and save.

Think of this, my brethren. Do not low Christ's sovereignty, but at the same time lea to see it shining with gentler beams through t medium of His priestly character.

When His servants were about Him here on earth, He not only gave His commands to them, but He prayed for them that they might be kept from disobeying in the hour of trial, and He restored them when they had fallen. He not only ruled His little band of followers, but He kept them in the name of the Lord. He was their King, and their priest too. Read the commands of Jesus with becoming reverence, for He is your King ; but let them not distress you for He knows your weakness and will help you to do what of yourself you are incapable of doing. He is a King, but the priestly garment is always over the kingly vesture ; whatever the ornaments of His imperial splendor, He is still clothed with a garment down to the foot. The priesthood covers all, and removes all cause of dread from every believing mind.

The same is true of our great King when He goes out to war. He is the Lord, mighty in battle ; in righteousness He doth judge and make war. But the wars of Christ are not like the wars of earthly monarchs. His sword is not in His hand, but it goeth out of His mouth, and with this He smites and rules the nations. He is clothed in a vesture dipped in blood, but it is His own blood. Every battle of the warrior is with confused noise, and garments rolled in blood ; but this is a warfare of another fashion, for He wrestles not with men, but with their sins ; not with princes and armies, but with falsehood and iniquity. His victories are not those of mighty men who return from the fray, amidst the groans of widows and the cries of orphans ; but His bloodless triumphs make glad the poor and the oppressed, and only crush down principalities and powers and spiritual wickednesses in high places, bringing good to all who seek His face. He is a King, but evermore the patron and true priest of men.

Such is your Lord. May your view of Him be clear, your faith in Him be firm, your love to Him be fervent, your joy in Him be overflowing, and your obedience to Him be constant. Trust the Priest and serve the King, and ever pay your vows unto Him who is "a Priest upon His throne."

II. Secondly, and very briefly, we shall now meditate upon of all this. The text says, "The counsel of peace shall be between them both." I confess myself unable dogmatically to interpret this passage, for there are no less than three possible meanings. I must give you them all, and leave you to judge for yourselves.

The most natural reading, to my mind, is this —that when we shall see in the person of Christ the king and the priest combined, the counsel of peace shall be between them both. These offices, the king and the priest, being combined in one, shall make a deep and lasting peace for us, a peace arranged by the deep thought and counsel of God, and therefore full of wisdom, truth, and certainty. When we see the Lawgiver Himself making atonement for our transgressions we have peace indeed : when Ruler and Saviour meet in one person the rest is sure and profound.

But it is thought by some wise men that the text means the counsel of peace shall be between Jehovah the Father and the Son. I am not sure that such a meaning would suggest itself to every reader, and as the most obvious meaning is generally to be preferred, I will not contend for this second meaning. However, as an interpretation it is certainly not too far-fetched, and, even if it cannot be sustained, it is certainly a very great truth.

But there is a third meaning, and although I am not sure of it as the sense here, it is assuredly a blessed truth, and appears to me to be congruous with the connection. Let me go back to the historical circumstances. Here were these three men that had come from Babylon. The prophet is to take them to the house of a Jew resident in Jerusalem. There might be some little differences between these men and the Jerusalem Jews. These Babylonian Jews had not come up to dwell in Jerusalem : but Josiah, the son of Zephaniah, was a resident there, and he might have demurred, and have said, "We cannot take your present to the temple because you do not bring yourselves and come to abide with your own people."

No, but they were to go up, together, bearing the gold and silver crowns, and put them upon the head of the priest. They were to go up in unity and love, and they were to furnish in their own persons types of other far-off ones who should come to the great crowned priest whose coming the prophet had foretold. Thus said the prophet, "They that are far off shall come and build in the temple of the Lord, and ye shall know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me unto you."

Now, certainly, it is in Jesus Christ the Priest and King that the Jews who were nigh, and the Gentiles who were afar off, are brought together, and made one. In Him the middle wall of partition is broken down, and the counsel of peace is between us both. The day shall come when our glorious Lord shall be more clearly manifested than now in the glory of His second advent, and when the Jews shall behold Him as the priestly king, and bow before Him ; then shall the fulness of the Gentiles also be gathered in, and the Lord Jesus Christ shall reign over the whole earth. May that day speedily dawn ! We have reason to expect it ; therefore, let us pray for it and strive for its on-bringing. Jesus the Priest and King is the uniter of the divided nations. Jew and Gentile are, after all, of one blood, and one God is the Father of all ; why should they not become one ? "One touch of nature makes the whole world kin ;" but one touch of Jesus Christ shall do it infinitely better, shall do it once for all.

ACTION IN HARMONY.

III. I close with the third point, which was this, the action which is harmonious with these truths. The connection of our text suggests to us to do exactly what the prophet Zechariah advised the Babylonian Jews and Josiah to do. I will read you what he said : "Take silver and gold and make crowns and set them upon the head of Joshua" or Jesus. This is what is to be done.

First, "take." "Take silver and gold." That is, bring the choicest things you have. If Jesus Christ be a Priest, should you not bring your offerings to Him ? If Jesus Christ be a King should you not bring tribute to your King ? If you have gold and silver, bring them, for to Him shall be given of the gold of Ophir. If you have talent, which is much more valuable than gold and silver, bring ability, tact, genius ; bring all the acquisitions of learning, all the acquirements of experience, and all your natural gifts, and consecrate them all to Him. Whether you have these or not, bring your heart, which is more precious by far, the very essence of your being ; make this a crown for Jesus. Come, bring your soul, your life, your all. Has He redeemed you ? Then be His forever. Is He your King ? Do not mock Him with a half-hearted service ; be loyal to such a sovereign, and serve Him with spirit, soul, and body. Take silver and gold and bring them unto Him. Bring your whole being to Him.

What next ?—"Take ;" then "make :" "make crowns." Come, my brethren, I invite you to this occupation. You say, "We are neither goldsmiths nor silversmiths." Nevertheless, make crowns. Try your hands this morning, and make crowns for Jesus with such material as ye have. Fashion the crown of memory. Think of what He has done for you from the first day until now. Interweave and intertwist the recollections of the past : hammer out the gold of gratitude, set in it the gems of love, and make a coronet for His dear head.

Make crowns by holy contemplation and thought. Think how great your Lord is, and how great He deserves to be—how blessed, how ever blessed. Then make crowns of purposes of what you hope to be and do. Plot and plan within your spirit something you have not yet done, which you are able to do before you go home to heaven. Look out some child you may teach, some sinner you may woo and win, some treasure you may spend for Jesus, some precious promise you may whisper in the ear of the distressed, some holy enterprise you may suggest to earnest youth. Make crowns !

It seems to me so sweet that it should be said, "Set them upon the head of Jesus." Brethren and sisters, let us crown Him ourselves. We hope to do so in heaven : let us do it here. Our love shall be the gold, our praise shall find the gems, our thanksgivings and our humble labors shall furnish the silver, and then we will set the golden chaplets about His brow, which once was rent with thorns for us. Coronets for Jesus ! Coronets for Jesus ! Crowns for our priestly King ! Let us make and bring them.

And what is said last ? It is said that this should be a memorial to those three men and to the brother who had entertained them. I suppose these crowns of silver and gold were hung up in the temple, and when anybody said, "What are those crowns yonder ?" it would be answered, "Those are coronets which were made by order of the prophet Zechariah, by Heldai and Tobijah and Jedaiah, who came from Babylon, and they are in memorial of those men, and in memorial of the hospitality of Josiah, the son of Zephaniah, who entertained them at his house when they came. They are hung up in the temple in honor of the coming priestly king, and in memorial of those four men who presented an offering to the Lord."

It seems very wonderful that God should allow in His house memorials of His servants, but He does so ; and our great priestly King allows memorials of His people in His temple now. We shall never forget, shall we, while the world standeth, the sacrifice of Paul, and how he made crowns and set them on the head of Jesus ? Never while the earth lasts shall we forget the sacrifice of John, and Peter, and James. Nay, the Church will not forget the sacrifices of Luther, and Calvin, and Zwingle, and Wycliffe, and the holy lives and ardent ministries of Whitefield and Wesley shall not be forgotten in the Church, because they made crowns and set them on the head of Jesus.

"Oh," say you, "but we must not remember men." "Nay," say I, "but we may remember men, and women too, for our Lord has set us the example. 'Wheresoever this Gospel is preached there shall this which this woman hath done be mentioned for a memorial of her.'" My Master thinks much of His people, and in the plenitude of His great goodness the little things which they do for Him are had in remembrance. Did He not say of Cornelius, "Thy prayers and thine alms have come up as a memorial of thee" This is sweet to think upon.

While our King-priest shall have the crowns, and wear them, yet we, if we bring love-tokens and honorable spoils to Him, shall be remembered, too, in that day when He shall award the praise to His people, saying, "Well done, good and faithful servants." The Lord whom we serve will immortalize our service by uniting it with His service. We shall rest from our labors, but our works shall follow us. The righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance, they shall shine forth as the sun when their Lord's glory shall be revealed. Their priest shall make them priests, their king shall make them kings, and they shall forever be filled with the vision of the priest upon his throne. So may it be with us. Amen.

THE RECOLLECTIONS OF A CHRISTIAN SAILOR.

A Death at Sea—A Thief Caught—A Furious Hurricane—Cast Adrift.

A few years ago I was engaged on board a whaling vessel off the coast of Africa. During the voyage there occurred

A DEATH AT SEA.

Death in any place produces a feeling of solemnity; but I think the feeling is more noticeable at sea than on land. In a city or a town fresh faces are seen every day, people come and go, and we are accustomed to changes in the personnel of our acquaintance; a gap is speedily filled up, and the memory of the dead soon fades away. But at sea the crew form a circle almost like that of a family; there are no new comers, and if one member falls out of his place a vacancy is left which every hour recalls the lost comrade to the memory. I became painfully aware of this fact while on board a whaler off the Island of Madagascar. A young shipmate was there taken from our midst.

He was a strong, active sailor, full of life and energy; he had kept to his work right up to the last, and long after he was unable to do more than drag himself wearily about the deck. Sailors have the reputation of being a hardy set of men, and it is a reputation they are reluctant to lose. It is considered effeminate to give way and complain of sickness, and my young shipmate would not admit his illness until the very day of his death. On that day he fell down insensible on the deck, and when we carried him below we all saw that he would never again come up alive.

The poor fellow died, and we sewed him up in his own hammock, as is the custom on board ship, before committing his body to the deep. He had not been a good man, and there was evidence that he had led an immoral life, so that we could have no hope in his death. That was a gloomy evening, and the most careless and reckless man on board felt a solemn sadness not to be shaken off. They brought him up from below and laid him on the tryworks ready for the final plunge, and we all felt singularly depressed by the sight of the motionless figure lying there, its tightly sewed covering rendering the shape of the dead man distinctly visible.

The next day the burial took place, and it was a strange sight to an inexperienced seaman. The ship's course stopped, the crew gathered with uncovered heads around the plank on which their dead messmate lay, with his feet towards the sea. A bag was attached to them filled with shot or some heavy substance, to insure the sinking of the corpse. Then the captain read the burial service and a chapter from the Bible, the end of the plank was raised, and the dead man slid off to his last resting-place at the bottom, to await the day when the sea shall give up its dead.

The sound of that last plunge was in my ears for many days afterward. Looking over the side I saw the familiar figure sinking down—down on its sad and lonely journey, the weight attached to the feet keeping the body erect as in life. It was a gloomy day on board, and scarcely any one among us could shake off the unwonted depression of spirit. As for me, the conviction that my messmate's soul was eternally lost disturbed the stolid indifference in which I was then living. I could not help asking myself what was to be the end of my life, and if death had seized me as it had the poor young fellow whose remains we had just committed to the deep, where would my soul then be? The recollection of home teaching gave me no encouragement to hope, and my conscience bitterly accused me. Looking back at this distance of time, I know that it was the Holy Spirit pleading with me as He had pleaded with me in the storm to be reconciled unto God. But then it appeared to me a gloomy state of mind, and I was anxious to shake it off as quickly as I could.

A THIEF CAUGHT.

On the west coast of Madagascar is St. Augustine's Bay, which we visited while in those latitudes. Here a native chief known as Prince Willie came on board, with a demand for a present of muskets and ammunition; he presumed we should need water, fresh meat, and provisions, and this he considered entitled him to ask as an acknowledgment of his authority from us. He was also very careful to stipulate that any women of the tribe, who might have provisions or curiosities to sell, should have free access to the ship as long as she remained in the bay. We could not then understand his anxiety on this point, but the cause became apparent later. The women of his tribe were the most unblushing thieves I ever saw. Everything that was movable and portable they could lay their hands on unnoticed, they carried off.

They had a fancy for pieces of metal of all descriptions. Bolts, pins, etc., vanished in large numbers during a visit from these native peddlers. The cook, who had felt the annoyance more than the rest of the crew, having lost several of his cooking utensils, resolved to teach them a lesson. He thrust a bolt into the fire as soon as he heard a party of natives were alongside, and as soon as it became red hot he laid it aside to cool, putting it in a conspicuous position. Soon the iron assumed its usual appearance, although it was still very hot. It had not lain there many minutes before horrible yells told that the trap had caught. One of the women had taken up the treasure with her fingers and was in an agony of pain and fright. The cook explained his trick to his mates, but the women seemed to think there had been some sorcery practised, and it was not thought necessary to enlighten them.

We did not remain long at St. Augustine's Bay, but crossing the channel visited Delagoa Bay, on the eastern coast of the African continent. This is a noted place for the capture of the female whales, and that fact being pretty well known we found ten other vessels stationed there on the same errand as ourselves. Two, or even three, whalers might have done well there, but so many of us racing down the bay in the early dawn frightened the whales, and we thus ruined our own enterprise. Several times while on this ground we had to camp out on shore in rough style. A storm coming on would prevent us returning to the ship, and we would run our boats ashore, and pulling two of them up on the beach we would tilt them up with the edges together, and bank the sand up to keep out wind and water; then with an old sail as a carpet we would creep under and pass a day or two snugly, if need were. The natives would come to our temporary shelter, bringing us fresh fruit and provisions, which in our isolated condition were very acceptable.

On one occasion of this kind we came across a large area of land completely covered with human bones bleached dry and white in the sun. It must have been the scene of some desperate battle between the rival tribes. I turned over one of the skulls which were lying about in profusion, and in it there was coiled up—a scorpion! A strange home for the venomous creature to have found. It was very suggestive, and I wondered what kind of brain had occupied that head when it was the centre of thought and life. I could not help thinking that there were many men whose mental faculties were employed in a service of which the effects were as injurious to their race as those of the scorpion's sting.

The dress of the natives of this coast is remarkable. It consists of a short strip of cloth, which depends from a flexible tube made of variegated grass plaited in a fancy design, the tube being long enough to form a girdle. They wore not another shred of clothing on any part of the body. They seemed to possess very little intelligence, and to be almost as far from civilization as the monkeys which scampered about the forests close at hand. Except for the faculty of speech they might easily have been set down as a superior breed of apes.

The whaling season over, we left the African coast and sailed for St. Paul's Island, in the Indian Ocean. On our voyage we encountered and it was for a long time doubtful if the old ship would weather it. The heavens grew black as midnight, and though it was about noon it was impossible to see even a hand before one's face. The waves came dashing against the devoted ship, descending on the deck with overwhelming force, and the men who were at work pumping had to be lashed—i.e., tied—to the pumps to keep them from being washed into the sea; it was a solemn time, for the roaring billows seemed to be ready to swallow us up. Death stared us in the face. At last a gigantic wave carried the ship over on her beam-ends, and we were just getting out the axes to cut away the masts in order to save the ship, when, with a suddenness I never saw before nor since, light broke out, the old vessel righted herself, and the storm cleared. But the old hull had weathered her last storm. She leaked dangerously, and when we put in at St. Paul's for repairs it was found that it would cost more to patch her up than she was worth. We therefore sold the small cargo of oil to the captains of the vessels in port for lamp-oil, and abandoned the ship to be sold for the benefit of the insurers. I was thus thrown upon my own resources, with little money and no friends, in a foreign land.

CHRIST'S SECOND COMING.

By Rev. Henry Varley.

The Doctrine not a Sentiment—Revealed in the Bible—England a Representative Nation—Growth of Scepticism—England Hated by China—The Signs of the End—Words that Must not be Spiritualized—Prophecy Literally Fulfilled—Two Great Facts—The Place of the Doctrine in the Bible.

The Second Advent of Christ is no question of sentiment or opinion, but a great fact which the Lord Himself has revealed. Let us seek to answer the question, not by any trick of argument, but by the application of God's own Word to the subject. You have only to get two men clever on either side of their argument to confuse their audience. That is not my desire, nor did I get the deep conviction I have on this subject from reading the books of men, but by simple and earnest study of God's Word.

If people would only get the Word and study it for themselves, how many questions would be settled at once! Let us search the Scripture, and we shall see the fact of the Lord's second coming, and in that study we shall find good reasons for believing that under present agencies we shall not see any improvement in the governmental policy of the world.

Verily do we believe that human rule has nearly run its course. "The six thousand years are nigh their close," and are consummating the highest ever known.

Without egotism it may be said that England is the representative nation of the earth. Her power is the might of a highly civilized and intellectual people, and she has gradually come to her meridian life side by side with an open Bible, and the wonderful privilege of the dispensation of the Holy Spirit. No other nation on the face of the earth has known, to anything like the same extent, these high privileges, and we are watching with intense interest the result.

Is it too much to say that the intellectual culture of England is throwing aside the Bible as the Word of God, thus rejecting the testimony of the Holy Spirit, and while complimenting the Lord Jesus Christ upon His system of morals and the tone of His personal life, nevertheless arraigns Him before the world as guilty of the most awful blasphemy, by denying His Godhead and impugning His creative power? That this unholy spirit will increase, and ripen into an intellectual scepticism that will ere long deny openly both the Father and the Son, the Word of our Lord solemnly declares (1 John 2 : 22); and at this point let me say there are no reserves of power to be put forth by the mighty God—His Son, His Work, His Word, His Spirit, His Ministry, all have been given, and the chief nation in the world rejects His government, and is rejecting His grace.

This momentous experience and history marks, as we believe, the crisis of this world's course, and the end of the age. Should centuries again be given there are no other nations of the earth to rise higher than England, and if it were so, what reason have we to suppose that they would receive the Lord to reign over them?

Seeing that human nature is the same all the world over, and that the most powerful and intelligent nation of the earth, having come to maturity in its national life, has rejected, and is now rejecting, the Lord, His Word, and His Spirit, with deeper emphasis than ever sending the insulting message to the Lord God of Sabaoth, "We will not have this man to reign over us," we may be assured that the insults offered to His grace and government will bring speedily the great day of His power, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God and they that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ (2 Thess. 1 : 7, 8.)

THE EVIL INFLUENCE OF ENGLAND.

But what is the influence of England at the present time among the nations of the earth, morally considered? I am in the habit of receiving news from China relative to the China-England Mission. Mr. Hudson Taylor informs me that the English are despised and hated by the Chinese, and that the Chinese would, if they could, drive them out of their land. A few years since England sent her ships of war, and by force of arms opened the ports of China for the sale of that terrible drug, opium.

And mark the result. At the present time there are hundreds and thousands of Chinese dying like rotten sheep. The English, for mere money gain, forced this shameful traffic upon the Chinese, a traffic which, but a few years before, was held to be a capital offence in China. England by force of arms coerced the people. Mr. Taylor also tells me that if the missionaries can get away into the inland towns, where there are no Englishmen, they much rather prefer to go there. Young Englishmen have gone to ports and cities of China, and it is a notorious fact that they buy the Chinese girls from their mothers for a few dollars, for purposes of the worst character; and the name of Englishman is an offence to-day in China. The same may be said to a large extent of India.

I do not say that my countrymen carry no blessings with them; but I affirm that evil predominates immensely. England, I may add, is the first nation that ever came to her manhood life side by side with the open Bible. No other nation has known to anything like the same extent this high responsibility. How little, for example, does Germany, France, Austria, or Italy know of the Bible, as compared with England? The testimony of Jesus Christ Himself shows that His Word should be rejected, and the witness of His Spirit despised, and that this dispensation should be closed in solemn judgment, as in the days of Noe and Lot.

These are the words of Christ—"And as it was in the days of Noe, so also shall it be in the days of the Son of Man. They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and the flood came and destroyed them all. Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of Man is revealed."

Let us now look at the fourteenth chapter of John. "Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in Me. In My Father's house are many mansions." Mark these words; they are deeply interesting, "I go to prepare a place for you." My object in leaving the world is to prepare a place for you. And notice, "I will come again, and receive you unto Myself." Mark the form of the expression. We are not to receive Him; but "I will receive you unto Myself."

Passing from this, let us notice Acts 1 : 9, "And when He had spoken these things, while they beheld, He was taken up; and a cloud received Him out of their sight. And while they looked steadfastly towards heaven as He went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel; which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven."

WE CANNOT SPIRITUALIZE

that verse, nor explain it away by metaphor. This is in keeping with the testimony of Jesus Himself. Angels have come to confirm His testimony to the fact of His coming again.

These words were in this book before I came here; this is no incorporation of mine. It is simply for you to come in contact with the Word of God to know these great truths. We have no liberty to attempt to spiritualize away the plain statements of the Scriptures. There is in Scripture very much metaphor, but always intended to convey to our minds great facts. For example, you ask, Do I believe in material fire? I believe there will be positive suffering. These are the expressions of Christ: "Where their worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched." "Better for thee to cut off thy right hand than that thy whole body be cast into hell."

These words stand against all argument, and defy all attempts to controvert them. How literally Scripture prophecies have been fulfilled may be gathered from the following. It is written they shall cast lots upon Christ's garments. This is the quotation of that text, "They parted My garments among them, and upon My vesture did they cast lots." Mark this, "Behold thy King cometh, sitting on an ass's colt!" Was that prophecy fulfilled? Did not He send two disciples to loose the colt and say the Master hath need of him? He rode upon that colt. Remember those words have been fulfilled.

Again, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but My Word shall not pass away till all be fulfilled." I hear people explain His coming as though it referred to our death. By others it is said, "Christ's coming! oh, He is always coming; it is spiritual." Surely no words could be more literal: "This same Jesus that was taken up into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." Look a little further, Hebrews, 9 : 27, 28, "And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment, so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many, and unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation."

We have

TWO GREAT FACTS:

there is nothing more certain than death and future judgment. As certainly as these two great facts are before the world, so surely will the Lord appear. Listen: "So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many, and unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation." We cannot explain that away; it is of literal significance. Turn to one of the great strongholds of this important truth, 1 Thess. In every chapter of the first epistle there is distinct allusion to the coming of the Lord.

It is interesting to know that one verse in every thirty from Matthew to Revelation has reference to the fact of Christ's coming. Observe 1 Thess. 1 : 10: "And to wait for His Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, even Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come." Now we have in 1 Thess. 4 : 14 the great fact of the coming made by the Lord Himself, verses 13 to 18: "But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him."

Mark the expression, "If we believe that Jesus died," etc. Again, "For this we say unto you by the Word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent (go before) them which are asleep. For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words.'

Notice the first epistle to the Thessalonians was written especially to the Church, and is full of instruction, comfort, and guidance. The second epistle is written, indeed, for the Church; but it is the testimony of the Holy Ghost concerning the future history of the world. The first epistle is written for the comfort, instruction, guidance, and help of the Church until the coming of the Lord.

The second epistle is written to the Church, the history of the future of the world after the Church has been taken away. Chap. 5 : 1, 2: "But of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you; for yourselves know perfectly well that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night." When does a thief come? When you expect him? Does he appoint a time of coming? "The day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night."

Some one will say, "I agree with you that the Lord will come, but I do not see any ground in Scripture for His coming a second time." Do you believe He will come for judgment to the wicked; to raise the dead? Yes. Is there a word about it here? Did I read anything about that? Listen: "The Lord Himself shall descend; the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive shall be caught up to meet Him in the air."

Is there anything about the resurrection of the wicked there or their judgment? No; not one word. It is the taking away of what is peculiar to this dispensation—the Church of Christ. This is why the Bridegroom cometh: to take His body, the despised Church, out of this sinful world. These passages will then be fulfilled: "Two shall be in one bed: one taken, the other left. Two men shall be in the field: the one taken, the other left." Suddenly, and without warning, the converted daughter sleeping with her Christless sister shall be taken away.

A Revival at Darlington, in England, Issuing in the conversion of about 500 souls, has arisen from a visit of the now famous Salvation Army. Some weeks ago some female evangelists, headed by Miss Rose Clapham, began to hold religious services in Livingstone Hall, Darlington, in the name of the Salvation Army. Every night since then (excepting at the Friday meetings for Christians only), and twice every Sunday, the hall, which is the largest in the town, has been filled with overflowing audiences, a large proportion of whom were evidently unaccustomed to attend religious services of any kind. Hundreds have been repeatedly turned away from the doors, and there is seldom any diminution in the numbers present until after ten o'clock. On Saturday night, August 23d, no fewer than 112 converts addressed the crowded congregation, giving their experience, and urging others to follow their example.

The Rev. Dr. Edersheim, vicar of Loder, Bridport, states that the first fruits of the Salvation Army there were the conversion of the worst family in the place. The father was known as "Hell-fire Tom," and they never entered a place of worship. Four daughters were arrested the first evening, and went home converted; then the father, and then the mother. The whole family of outcasts, the plague of the place, have become children of God, and are now steadfast in the faith.

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

A DISTRESSING JOURNEY.

Who should accompany Effie on her expedition in search of her husband? That was the question now uppermost in Miss Temple's mind. As she thought of it the name of Mrs. Cross escaped her lips in an undertone, but Effie's wildly uttered "No, no!" showed that she had overheard it.

"Effie, I must go with you myself," said the lady.

Effie took the hand of her friend and fervently kissed it; this was her silent way of expressing the thanks which she could not speak.

Edith had proffered a kindness which would cost her no light effort. The expense of the double journey was what the needy lady could ill afford. Edith had indeed in her purse almost the whole of her quarter's income, but that must last her for the next three months, and how difficult it would be to make it do so Miss Temple knew but too well.

The thought crossed her mind, inflicting a pang, "I may find it needful to part with my dear aunt's last gift." Then the journey itself, and the search which was to follow it, were formidable to a delicate lady, already weary, and longing for quiet and rest. But Edith saw a plain path of duty before her, it was her mission to "strengthen the weary," and all consideration of self was quickly dismissed from her mind.

Miss Temple now persuaded the anxious Effie to take some food, that her strength might not fail in the journey before her. The lady then accompanied Effie to her room, and helped her to make the little preparations needful for her departure.

"You and I will not burden ourselves with much luggage," said Edith, cheerfully; "I trust that our absence will be but a short one." The smile which accompanied the words was as a gleam of sunshine to Effie.

Robert's wife brought the little supply of money left for her use by her husband, and entreated Miss Temple to take charge of it. Edith placed it in her purse with her own; she saw that it would be a real relief to Effie for her companion to keep accounts for them both.

Miss Temple took with her the diamond ring, thinking it undesirable to leave so valuable a jewel behind her in an almost empty farm-house.

Effie Holland had not hitherto shed a tear since receiving her husband's letter; grief seemed to have dried up that fount which was usually so ready to overflow; she was denied the relief of being able to cry. But as Effie finished packing her small travelling bag, her glance chanced to fall on the picture over the mantelpiece, the wedding gift from her uncle, and the sight of that picture, the memories which it recalled, unsealed the font of weeping, and, throwing herself on the floor, Effie wept as if her heart were breaking.

Edith let grief take its course; she did not then attempt to utter a word of comfort. The passionate outburst soon was over, and Effie arose, with eyes heavy from weeping, but a manner more collected and calm.

"I forgot," she faltered; "(I forget everything but my misery now!) I must tell Mrs. Cross that my husband gives up the farm."

"If I might counsel you I would say, do nothing in regard to giving up your home till you have seen your husband," said Edith. "His letter was written under strong excitement, and when he thought that he was about to quit the country. Your husband may entirely alter his views when he finds that his sister's character is cleared from all disgrace, and he may wish to offer Ellen a home in England. Do nothing in haste, dear Effie." The young wife submitted at once to a judgment more clear and calm than her own.

While Effie and her friend were up-stairs, her uncle arrived with the donkey-cart containing the luggage of Miss Temple. Mrs. Cross saw Alec coming, and went to meet him at the gate. The lodger would not willingly have missed the pleasure of being the first to tell disagreeable news; not that Mrs. Cross had any wish to give pain, but that her coarse, selfish nature found its delight in gossip.

"Oh! Mr. Stewart, such doings as we have had here! such doings!" cried the widow as Alec lifted the latch of the gate.

"What? how? anything the matter?" asked the old man, abruptly.

"I never expected that things would go right after Holland took to leaving his pretty little wife to go jollifying and drinking at the Crown," continued Mrs. Cross, spinning out a pleasure which resembled that which a cat finds in teasing a mouse.

"Can't you speak out plainly, woman, and tell the worst at once?" said Alec sternly. "What has Holland done?"

"Absconded—deserted his wife!" replied Mrs. Cross. "He's gone off to Australia, or the Indies, or no one knows where, with his sister, who's fresh out of jail; and Effie, poor thing! she's going to rush after her runaway husband. She's not likely to catch him, I guess, unless she has the wit to set the police on the scent."

Alec waited to hear no more, but roughly brushing past the speaker, whose portly form well-nigh blocked up the narrow path, he made his way into the house.

Mrs. Cross turned and followed more slowly, muttering to herself, as she walked up the path, "If the Hollands expect me to stop here and look after the cows, pigs, and poultry, while they go rushing about the country, they're very much mistaken. I'd as lief live in a desert as in this Salem, as they call it, with no one to keep me company but Fred."

"I'll be off with him to London to-morrow, and pay a long-promised visit to my cousin, and see all the sights and shows at this gay time of the year. Live here, indeed, with the rooks and the crows, with neither hostess to cook the dinner nor host to pay for the mutton; I'm not the simpleton to do that!

"Let the Hunts look after the farm; if it go to rack and ruin (it's likely enough that it will), I'll get the advice of some sharp lawyer to bear me clear out of the smash. I'm sorry for Effie, poor thing! I'd do her a good turn if I could—but a sensible woman must never forget to take care of Number One.'

Meanwhile Alec had met in the kitchen his young niece, who, bag in hand, and dressed for a journey, had just come down from her room. The cocoanut has a hard shell, wrapped in rough, unsightly fibre, but within are the soft milk and sweet kernel. Alec's hardness was all outside, and when he saw the pale, tearful face of poor Effie he took her into his arms and pressed her to his heart as if he had been her father. Neither of them spoke for some moments, and then Alec asked, in a husky voice, "Where are you going, poor child?"

"To London—to Southampton; he has gone there," faltered Effie, who was scarcely able to speak.

"The heartless villain!" muttered Alec; but the look of pain which the words raised on the face of Effie made her uncle bite his lip to keep in the further expression of his strong indignation.

"It was my fault—mine—not his!" gasped the poor young wife. "I am going to bring Robert back."

"You're not fit to go, child," said Alec, with a little of his natural roughness of manner. "If it were not for the snakes," he muttered to himself, "I would go and collar him myself."

Had the occasion been a less sad one, the idea of such a messenger as Alec being sent to recall an angry husband might have provoked a smile. Effie simply said, "Miss Temple is going with me."

Edith, who now entered, was struck by the look given her by the old servant of her uncle; it was a look so expressive of gratitude, from eyes that were moistened with tears.

"It is done for Him, and He will reward it," murmured Alec, as he walked towards the window, where he stood for some time with his back turned towards the rest of the party, of which Mrs. Cross now made one.

The widow's voice, telling of her intended visit to London, and making officious offers to do anything there for Effie, was the only one heard in the place.

Alec was not standing apart in idle thought; he was emptying his old brown purse of every piece of money which it contained—silver, copper, and one bit of gold. Then going up to his niece, and drawing her aside, Alec silently pressed into her hand what he had held in the palm of his own, and, without waiting for thanks, turned away to ask Miss Temple what were her orders regarding the luggage which he had brought in the cart.

Edith limited herself to one small travelling-bag for the journey before her; the rest of her little property would be left at the farm till her return. It was now time to start for the station, which was near enough to be reached on foot. Effie dared not look back as she passed through the gate of her little Salem, weeping, bowed down with sorrow, and thinking of the picture of the wreck.

Thankful was Effie to find herself in the train, borne on swiftly towards London, though she remembered with bitterness with what different feelings she had last travelled on that railway line, how full of hope and delight she had been, and how eagerly she had leant forward to catch a glimpse of her future home, visible in the distance! Now she turned her face from the window; she had no wish to see the pretty gable-ends peeping from between the trees.

The train in which the travellers journeyed was a full one; there was much interchange of passengers at the various stations through which it passed. Now a mother with half a dozen children, and at least as many packages, crowded the narrow second-class carriage almost to suffocation; and after that party had left, and breathing space on that sultry June afternoon had been restored for a while, a number of young men, almost too late, scrambled into the vacant seats, just as the train was about to move on.

The party of shopmen, for such they seemed, were returning from some wedding in the country, as was evident from the nosegays stuck into their button-holes, and the favors pinned on their coats. The men were in high spirits, and more than one of the party appeared to have been drinking freely at the wedding-breakfast. The talking, laughing, and jesting which went on were incessant, and increased the headache from which poor Effie was suffering.

How the noise and the mirth jarred on the ear of the pale woman who sat so sad and silent in the corner of the railway-carriage! It seemed a very long time to Effie and her companion before the London station was reached.

Then came the drive in a hack across London. Never had the great city seemed to the travellers in such a distracting whirl of mingled business and pleasure as it did on that summer afternoon. Some grand pageant was going on, and the usual tide of traffic was swelled by hundreds of gay carriages, and many a crowded omnibus, bearing their pleasure-seeking occupants to or from some point of general attraction.

Effie knew not and cared not what that point might be: she only knew, to her misery, that it was scarcely possible for the vehicle in which she was seated to make its way through the streets. Effie was in a fever of impatience to get on; she longed for the speed of the eagle, which wings its flight above all the obstructions of earth, and it was as if she were condemned to creep like a snail on the ground.

Three times the hack came to a complete stop, the road being blocked up by carts, carriages, and vans; once the wheel was locked in that of another conveyance. The shouting, cracking of whips, pressing and pushing, backing and turning, with the multifarious noises with which London citizens are familiar, seemed fie like the giddy whirl of waters against some helpless swimmer, borne backwards e opposing tide, is struggling in vain.

)h ! if we should be too late for the train to ampton—if we should be too late !" often from Effie's lips ; repeatedly she felt in- l to quit the cab and try to force a passage ot through that bustling, noisy throng that ucted her way.

THE TRIUMPHS OF FAITH.

esson for Oct. 19th. Heb. 11. Golden Text, v. 37. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

ay's subject begins with a definition of y the Holy Ghost, who is its alone Au- "Faith is the substance (or foundation) gs hoped for, the evidence of things not Abraham staggered not at the promise (that he should be a father of many) "through unbelief, but was strong in iving glory to God ; and being fully per- that what He had promised He was able perform," although all hope grounded on and experience was at an end (Rom. 1). Thus faith is believing God's Word any respect to past or present experi- nd without taking into account either ity or probability in the future.

first exercise of our faith to which this calls us is to believe that the worlds (or ere formed by the Word of God. "By the of the Lord were the heavens made : and ost of them by the breath of His mouth" : 6). There is creative power in the word living God, "For He spake and it was le commanded and it stood fast" (Ps. To believe in the intrinsic power of the God honors Him, and at the same time out of reach of men and circumstances gs ; what He says is being wrought out all unconsciously, and all the ill-will all the malice of devils, cannot prevent gs from working together for good to at love God. He has said it, and noth- turn Him from His purpose.

th the first sacrifice was offered. Hu- ure would have said that the fruit, and or bestowed upon it by Cain, must acceptable to God than the blood of an lamb ; but God's thoughts are not as ughts. All must be set radically right im : not the present life alone conform- s will, but the conscience also cleansed. And thus there must be confession of sin, and an acknowledgment that death was its due. Thus Abel knew, and therefore his sacrifice was better than Cain's, who followed reason instead of faith, and this was why Abel "obtained witness that he was righteous." And without Abel's faith all other faith must fail. No man is in a position to exercise faith continuously in God's loving fatherhood while his conscience is uncleansed : the more he seeks to please God the more intense will be his sense of condemnation, and he will obtain no witness that he is righteous except in the crucifixion of Christ in his place.

Our next lesson of faith is a marvellous one—a man who by faith escaped death, as those will do who are taken away to meet the Lord in the air at His second coming. But let us not forget that this man walked with God, and had this testimony that he pleased God. If the thought of some who have studied the prophecies is correct—namely, that the "first fruits" of Rev. 14 : 4 will be taken away first—it is clear from that passage, and from the title which is told us of this patriarch, that they must have an Enoch character. Enoch "walked with God," and they "follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth." Enoch "had this testimony that he pleased God" "in their mouth was found no guile, for they are without fault before the throne of God." He that hath the power of death—that is, the devil (Rev. 2 : 16)—toucheth not those who by grace thus keep themselves (1 John 5 : 18). And such a walk is not by effort, but by the faith of the Son of God (Gal. 2 : 20), for "without faith it is impossible to please Him."

The faith of Noah follows. "By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house." He saw the world in its present and in its future, with God's eyes, and through God's revelation, and thus he "condemned the world." All his occupation, all his words, testified that he believed God was true, and that he did not look upon things according to the appearance ; thus between him and the condemned world came a God-made separation. And the Word of God makes use of his example to teach us the meaning and importance of baptism. "Buried with Him by baptism unto death" (that we may cease from our own life), and have "the answer of a good conscience toward God, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ" (Rom. 6 : 4 ; 1 Pet. 3 : 20, 21).

Our next example of faith is he who is called "the father of all them that believe" (Rom. 4 : 11). The first test of his faith was that "when he was called (by the God whom his fathers knew not) to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed ; and he went out, not knowing whither he went. By faith he obeyed, by faith he went out. His only guarantee of safety, of inheritance, etc., was his firm reliance on the promise of God, without any warrant either from his own or from anybody else's experience. By faith he sojourned in the land of promise," etc., and by faith he ooked for a city which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God.

By faith both Abraham and Sarah believed in God, "who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were, who against hope believed in hope," for the fulfilment of God's promises regarding his posterity ; he "considered not his own body," bht looked to the unwavering fidelity of his God. "Therefore sprang there of one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars of the sky in multitude and as the sand which is by the sea-shore innumerable. These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraceb them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth."

Dear reader, are you a son or a daughter of Abraham ? Are you persuaded of God's promises, so that you hold any other things as more probable than that He should break His Word ? Do you judge your life through God's word, bringing every thing to its searching test ? and do you embrace the promises of God as a personal inheritance which you honor Him by appropriating ? and do you wait before Him with an unfulfilled promise in the absolute certainty that He must cease to be God rather than fail in that which He has spoken ?

It is this which makes us strangers and pilgrims upon the earth, where time and sense govern all who are around us. Men are everywhere seeking to bind God by laws which they seek to discover, forgetting that the region of faith is a fellowship with Him who made His own laws, and who is Master of them, able to suspend them at His will. Men call it fanaticism to expect of God that He will do what He has said, but faith and fanaticism are divided by the two-edged sword of the Word of God. To look for what seems impossible without the warrant of His Word is indeed fanaticism, but when, according to His Word, it is faith.

It is written of those men who counted upon God, and who were content to live for the future, in the light of eternity and not of time, "wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God ; for He hath prepared for them a city." There is something great in the thought of God calling Himself by the name of those who honor Him by faith. Let us apply the lesson, and ask, Would not God be ashamed to be called my God ? The God of Abraham ? Yes ; of Elijah ? Yes ; of Daniel ? Yes ; but the God of such as I ? —Abimelech saw the blessing of Abraham, "God is with thee in all that thou doest ;" and of Isaac, "We saw certainly that the Lord was with thee" (Gen. 21 : 22 ; 26 : 28) ; can it be seen thus that the Lord is with us ? And if not, why not ?

"By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac, and he that had received the promises (in which the life of his son was involved) offered up his only begotten son, of whom it was said that in Isaac shall thy seed be called." But how was this possible ? To believe that Isaac should be the father of many nations, and to be yet ready at the call of God to slay him with his own hand ? Yes, for he accounted "that God was able to raise him up even from the dead, from whence also he received him in a figure." Abraham had learned a great lesson by bitter experience. Once he tried hard to help God ; went down into Egypt in the time of famine without God's leading, and returned with the shame of having denied his wife. He listened to Sarah's counsel, and took Hagar as his wife, to hasten the fulfilment of God's promises ; it did not succeed, and family trial set in until Hagar and her son were cast out. Now he would doubt God no more, and help God no more, but would honor God's word at any cost.

Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, were men of faith, and the parents of Moses had the same blood in their veins when they risked the anger of the king of Egypt by hiding their son. "By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharoah's daughter, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt, for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward." Present good and present honor had little weight with him, for "he endured as seeing Him who is invisible."

And this is the secret of continuous faith under any and every circumstance of soul or body, just to see Him who is invisible. Under the veil of what is outward to detect God's presence and God's working and God's mind. And this can sustain under any trial of our faith whatsoever, even though it were the persecution unto the death of verses 35 to 37. And they who thus live with God and honor Him, who thus subdue kingdoms, obtain promises, out of weakness are made strong, etc., what says the Lord about them ? "Of whom the world was not worthy." God leads us by the Holy Ghost to this sublime life of faith that the world may be unworthy of us too ; this, and this alone, is worth living for.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The News from Afghanistan this Week must be disquieting in England. It is to the effect that General Roberts's column, advancing on Cabul through the Shutargardan Pass, has been surrounded by the hill tribes. Reinforcements were hastening to its assistance, but the natives are so warlike that a sanguinary engagement is almost certain to take place before the enemy are driven off and General Roberts's communications reopened. Some fears are entertained that the British force may be annihilated, as a force of 3000 men was destroyed to the last man but one, in the invasion of 1842, by the same savage tribe—the Ghilzais—which has surrounded the British now. But this is unlikely to happen, as the British profited by their experience of thirty-seven years ago, and have been proceeding with caution.

This reverse has come inopportunely; for General Roberts was within fifty-five miles of Cabul, and expected to attack the capital last Sunday. Yakoob Khan, the Ameer, despairing of suppressing the revolt himself, had fled to the British camp, on the Indian side of the pass, and was looking to the British to set him on his throne again. This conduct greatly incensed his subjects, who, without being too loyal or obedient to him, are exceedingly resentful at foreign interference.

A Forgery of Mr. Gladstone's name was recently made in England by some person not a teetotaller, who wrote a postal card in the ex-Premier's name, and made him say that he did not favor the new coffee-room movement, but thought it better to let the British laborers alone with their beer. Mr. Gladstone now declares that the printed statement was a forgery, and that he is a friend and helper of the coffee-houses, which, he says, are experiments toward giving the mass of the community a better chance than they have had to choose between alcoholic and non-alcoholic liquors.

The Extremity of Subservience to Fashion must have been reached in Paris. A French correspondent says: "Since the introduction of mediæval styles, all juveniles wear their hair flowing. Mothers hearing the luxuriance of a rival juvenile's hair greatly admired will not be outdone, and either add a whole additional fleece on the comb or ribbon which keeps it out of her child's eyes, or tack a scalp in its hat." Children thus early infected with the hypocritical ways of the world are in danger of growing up with no ideas beyond this life, with its vanities and frivolities.

Queen Victoria's Delicacy of Feeling, and her desire to avoid wounding the feelings of any of her subjects, has found an expression hitherto unnoticed. An American, lately passing in Windsor Great Park the Culloden monument raised by the Duke of Cumberland, was greatly struck by the splendid growth of ivy round the base of the column. A remark upon its beauty called out the reply: "Yes, that is by the Queen's orders, in order that the ivy may hide the inscription recording the defeat of the Highlanders."

William Ringgold Cooper, one of the most daring forgers that ever preyed upon society, has just been arrested in England. He is an American by birth, who fled to the other country about a couple of years ago, after committing a series of daring and ingeniously contrived forgeries at Washington, Columbus, Miss., and at San Francisco. For the first of these, committed about fourteen years ago, he was arrested a few hours after his wedding, while on the train to Philadelphia with his bride, and was sentenced to five years' imprisonment. Since his flight to England he has been carrying on a similar course of high-handed crime. He was finally arrested at a bank in London, where he had had the foolhardiness to show himself after drawing a forged check for $20,000.

The detectives found that he had been leading a sumptuous life at a beautiful country-seat in Hertfordshire. He had six horses, a drag, carriages, traps, three liveried menials, a number of other servants such as any rich gentleman would desire to have. He followed the hounds and hunted and shot with the neighboring gentry; he attended the village church with regularity; gave grand dinners and parties, and donated liberally to the poor of the parish. He kept an account at the village banking-house, he paid his bills promptly, and his house was filled with valuable books and pictures, bric-a-brac, and was superbly furnished throughout. He was known and highly respected in the entire district. Now he inhabits a felon's cell in an English prison, with the prospect of a long period of penal servitude. "As righteousness tendeth to life, so he that pursueth evil pursueth it to his own death." (Prov. 11 : 19.)

London Society has Lately Received a Fresh warning of the uncertainty of life by the sudden death of one of its idols, the young and beautiful Miss Moffat, of Worton Manor-house, Isleworth. Tall, handsome, and singularly accomplished, she seemed to have the world at her feet when thus cut off as in a moment. Among girls of her own age she was regarded as a sort of Admirable Crichton. She was a skilful horsewoman, well known in Hyde Park; a capital sailor, and often used to take the helm of her own yacht. She was also an admirable musician, painter, and dancer, and highly intellectual, and of an amiable disposition which endeared her to all her friends.

But "the fashion of this world passeth away," and on a deathbed earthly accomplishments appear as nothing, and the great matter then is the possession of Christ in the soul and the enjoyment of His presence and love. Then, too, the recollection of deeds of benevolence and piety, such as Sunday-school teaching and district visiting and ministrations to the sick are looked back upon with far more satisfaction than participation in balls and concerts and worldly gayeties.

Emancipation in Havana.—A Telegram from Havana states that three slave-holders, owners of 4000, 1200, and 800 slaves respectively, have emancipated them, and contracted with them for their services for five years, and that other slaveholders intend following their example.

The late Dr. JOSEPH P. THOMPSON, formerly Pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle, New York.

DR. JOSEPH PARRISH THOMPSON,

Formerly Pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle Church, New York.

His Birth and Education — Early Call to New Haven Church—Pulpit and Literary Labors there —Revival of the Church—Invited to New York —His Work at the Tabernacle Church—Journalistic and Pastoral Work—His Popularity as a Preacher—Removal of the Church—His Conduct in the National Crisis—A Son Dead on the Battlefield—A Night Vigil—Failing Health—Resignation of the Pastorate—A Testimonial—Residence in Berlin—Literary and Political Work in the German Capital—Death.

THE earnest preacher, the indefatigable Christian worker, the refined and accomplished gentleman, who has recently passed away from the church militant to join the ranks of the church triumphant before the throne, has left behind him a name and a memory held in reverence by all who knew him. As a preacher he was earnest and faithful ; as a writer brilliant and logical ; and as a Christian citizen intelligent and patriotic. He has gone to his reward ; henceforth he rests from his labors, and his works follow him.

Joseph Parrish Thompson was born in Philadelphia, August 7th, 1819. He studied at Yale College, where he graduated A.B. in 1838. Thence he proceeded to the Andover and New Haven Theological Schools. Here he devoted himself with the ardor which characterized him all through his life to theological study, and gained the admiring respect of his tutors. He had not completed his two years' course and was not twenty-one years of age when he received a call from the Chapel Street Congregational Church at New Haven to become its pastor. He delayed sending his acceptance to the call until after his twenty-first birthday, doubting whether until that had passed he was legally competent to bind himself to a contract with any church. He was in October, 1840, and at once entered upon his work, the youngest pastor in the State of Connecticut.

One who knew him well in those early years says of him : "I was a witness of his early efforts and of the little troubles and sorrows incidental to his position. He entered upon his work with the eager enthusiasm of a gifted boy and with the steady strength of a well-trained man. With little of the wisdom which comes from experience, he had much of the instinctive wisdom which comes from good sense and kindly sympathy, combined with resolute adherence to right principles."

His people could not but love him, and soon they began to be proud of him. They saw that their young pastor, with his high ideal of what his work in the pulpit ought to be, and of what the relation ought to be between a pastor and all the families of his flock, was not only their pastor, but also their fellow-citizen. With the beginning of his ministry began the steady growth of the church, which now, under the ministry of Dr. John E. Todd, is one of the most prosperous and useful of the New England churches.

The church had been formed less than two years and was embarrassed with difficulties arising from the circumstances in which it had its beginning, but the blessing of God was signally manifest on the labors of the young pastor, and the difficulties syeedily melted away. New hopes, vigorous Christian activity, appeared among the members of the church, and numbers of those who were outside the fold were drawn in and proclaimed themselves on the Lord's side.

Diligent in his pastoral duties and giving much time to the preparation of his sermons, Dr. Thompson yet found time for literary work. He was anxious that the denomination he served should be educated and supplied with a pure and wholesome literature, and desirous too that the principles of the denomination should be known and respected by members of other religious communities. He therefore took an active part in establishing The New Englander, a quarterly review dealing principally with questions of interest to Congregationalists. To this review he regularly contributed, and the productions of his pen are remarkable for their logical acumen and the brilliancy of their style.

During the period of his New Haven pastorate, Dr. Thompson also published a memoir of Timothy Dwight, the eldest son of President Dwight, besides furnishing articles for various publications in other cities. He soon became widely known as a Christian minister of distinguished ability, and as a scholar. New York heard of him and sought him out.

THE TABERNACLE CHURCH,

then worshipping in a building on the east side of Broadway between Leonard and Worth Streets, invited him to accept the pastorate, and Dr. Thompson, seeing before him an enlarged sphere of usefulness, accepted the call, much to the sorrow of his New Haven church.

In New York Dr. Thompson at once entered on a career of popularity which few men attain at so early an age. The Tabernacle became a great centre of religious interest. The vast edifice was often thronged by a congregation composed of strangers, young men, and those who had no regular place of worship. It was soon found necessary to increase the accommodation to admit the crowds of eager listeners attracted by the fame of the young pastor. The society therefore determined to sell the Tabernacle in 1855, and the new church was built at the intersection of Broadway, Sixth Avenue, and Thirty-fourth Street.

This building was completed in 1859, and dedicated April 24th of that year, the services being preached by the Rev. Dr. Edward A. Park, of the Andover Theological Seminary. Dr. Thompson himself offered the prayer of dedication, prefacing it with a short but beautiful address, in which he presented "this new temple to the service of the Triune God—the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." Under the ministry of Dr. Thompson the church flourished exceedingly. When the new building was dedicated there was a debt upon it of $65,000. No pews were sold, as it was resolved that there should be no private ownership in the building, but in 1863 the society paid off $25,000 of this indebtedness. The remaining sum of $40,000 was paid in March, 1864.

To the Tabernacle Church Dr. Thompson ministered for a period of twenty-seven years, covering a time full of event both to the Church and the nation. It was the era of the anti-slavery movement which culminated in the war, and Dr. Thompson took a prominent part in the pulpit and the press in the discussions of the day.

On the outbreak of

the Tabernacle Church, animated by the spirit of the pastor, equipped a regiment, and the pastor's son entered the army. The death of that son in battle was a serious blow to the worthy minister. He hastened to the seat of war, and himself searched the battlefield for the body of his boy. He found it late in the evening, and he was then without means of bringing it to the camp. He threw himself on the ground beside his son's dead body on the damp soil, and remained there till morning. It is thought that his grief and that long night exposure fatally injured his delicate constitution, and brought on an illness which eventually prostrated him and put an untimely end to his ministerial work. A souvenir of the dead soldier, entitled "The Sergeant's Memorial : by his Father," appeared at an early date, and was widely read. It breathed all the love and tenderness of the Christian minister and father, and as a literary work received the highest encomiums of the press. An abridged edition was subsequently published and was circulated in the army, Dr. Thompson hoping by this means to stimulate Christian life among men exposed to many dangers and much temptation.

In New York as at New Haven, Dr. Thompson's pen was ever busy. In 1845 he printed a "Memoir of David Hale, late Editor o Journal of Commerce, with Selections fro Miscellaneous Writings"—a work which p through various editions. In 1846 appear "Young Men Admonished," afterward in s quent editions, which were numerous, en "Lectures to Young Men." "Hints to ployers" appeared in 1847, and another e in 1851. "Stray Meditations" was publish 1852, and in 1857 there was a revised edi entitled "The Believer's Refuge."

He was one of the first editors of The pendent, a well-known religious newspap New York, being associated in that service the Rev. Dr. Storrs and the Rev. Dr. Baco

In 1852 he originated the plan of the A Congregational Convention. He also serv a manager of the American Congregat Union and of the American Home Missi Society. In 1852 he went abroad, visiting estine, Egypt, and other Eastern lands. gave an Oriental cast to his subsequent st and writings, and he became well known authority in Egyptology. Many of his wri upon this subject appeared in The North A ican Review, The Bibliotheca Sacra, The Jo of the American Geographical and Stati Society, in Smith's "Dictionary of Biblical raphy and Antiquities," and the revised ed of Kitto's "Cyclopædia of Biblical Literat He published "Egypt, Past and Present, 1856.

FAILING HEALTH.

In 1872, Dr. Thompson was compelled ill-health, to sever the relation which he so long maintained with the Tabernacle Ch One night, while working in his study, he agined that he heard a terrible crash, as if whole house were falling, and he remem nothing more until he regained consciou at three o'clock in the morning. The best ical skill in this country and in Europe fail afford him relief, and he decided, though great reluctance, to resign his charge. His giving effect to this decision was a model of erous feeling, of self-forgetfulness and a sup regard for the interests of his church.

A pastor so beloved could not be allow depart without a tangible expression of th teem in which he was held, and a testim was immediately commenced, which ultim amounted to $30,000 and was presented to along with $20,000 given by wealthy indivi connected with him in public life.

Dr. Thompson then took up his residen Berlin, where he lived until his death. He led to this step to some extent by his desi be near his old friend Lepsius, the emi Egyptologist, and to obtain the benefit of libraries of German lore to aid him in his lite work.

IN BERLIN

he became the centre of a circle of learned genial men who knew how to appreciate friendship of the accomplished American di During the controversy between Bismarck the Pope, at the request of the Prussian Min he prepared and published a work on the tions of Church and State in America, for w he received the personal thanks of the Emp William. The work had a large circulation, supplied an amount of useful knowledg which Germany at that period stood great need.

At the time of the Berlin Congress he pre ed the document laid before the Congress on protection of the missionaries. At the reque Lord Derby he expressed his views on this ject, and they were published in The Pall Gazette. He would have been a delegate to London Convention on International Law, the Evangelical Alliance, but ill-health preve his attendance in both cases. The paper w he had prepared on "Religious Liberty Turkey" was read at the meetings of the ance. The mail brings a private letter f Mrs. Thompson, in which she says that, on ceiving word that his memorial had been acc ed by the Alliance, he looked down at his r s oration occasioned by the death of Mr. rd Taylor, the American Minister, delivered erlin, was a beautiful and much admired uction. When Mr. Taylor died, Dr. Thompas spoken of as his successor. It is known when the rumor reached his ears, he wrote he could not accept the position, and coned himself unfitted for it.

s only ambition seemed to be to add to the which he had done in America any service d for which God might open the way, to the which he had left, to the land which had med him with abounding hospitality. ardent patriot, Dr. Thompson devoted a part of his time to thorough presentation, the Continental mind, of the facts essen the removal of prejudices and the formaof correct views in regard to the United s. To this end he prepared with great elaborate lectures, which he delivered in ost important cities to invited assemblies e most eminent philosophers, statesmen, ivilians, whose influence would promote ffusion of the views he presented.

MY BROTHER AND HIS WORK.

A Lecture, by Rev. James A. Spurgeon, at the Young Men's Christian Association, New York, Oct. 10th.

A Visit to Longfellow—The Innkeeper and the Sign-Painter—Mr. Waddy's Sleepy Congregation—Historical Associations of the Metropolitan Tabernacle—An Unwilling Vendor overcome—How the Risk of the Contract was covered—Early Preaching—The Publican entertaining the Preacher—A Preacher who Killed a Pig—Three Ways of Stopping a Preacher—The Tabernacle Pastorate—Twenty Thousand Souls—The College—~~A Wager about a Sovereign~~—The Orphanage Projected—The Secret of Success—A Live Man—An Organizer—No Passengers Wanted.

Two or three days ago I did myself the honor of calling on one of your greatest men, I may say one of the world's greatest men—the poet Longfellow. He immediately asked me, what I think every American I have met since I landed has asked me ; "How is your brother?" I had the great privilege of informing him of some particulars of my brother and his work, and I now have the distinguished privilege of repeating it to you.

I am more used to preaching than to lecturing, so that I shall have some difficulty in keeping the sermon out of the lecture. A minister on one occasion was invited to some public meeting, and prepared a speech for delivery. But he arrived late, and was asked to offer the closing prayer. He said I had intended to have made a few remarks, but as the hour is so late I will throw them into the prayer. That was bad anyhow, but I will try this evening to throw my remarks into the form of a lecture.

AN INNKEEPER

once applied to a sign-painter to paint a sign for the front of his house. Now the painter was accustomed to paint red lions, and was great on that animal. But the innkeeper wanted a white cow. The painter tried to persuade him to have his favorite beast, but the innkeeper said there was already a red lion opposite and one in the next street. Well, said the painter, "I will paint you a white cow, but it will be marvellously like a red lion." So my lecture will probably be marvellously like a sermon.

But I will try that it shall not send you all to sleep. I have known in England of cases where people have fallen asleep during a sermon. But that was in England. In America, so far as I have seen, the people are awake all day and the mosquitoes all night.

A SLEEPY CONGREGATION.

Mr. Waddy, who presided over the Wesleyan Conference in England, relates that he once preached to a country congregation, and observed one after another dropping asleep ; he proceeded with his sermon until all were asleep, and then descended the pulpit stairs, and walked down the aisle and out of the door, continuing his sermon as he went ; and the congregation were not aware of the exit of the minister.

An old Scotch preacher reproved one of his hearers for regularly sleeping during his sermon, and advised her to take a pinch of snuff to keep her awake. She asked whether he could not put the snuff into his sermon. So I will take the warning and try to put a little snuff into my lecture.

Let me take you to

not far from the old Tabards Inn, from which Chaucer describes his pilgrims as starting on their journey. It is in the borough of Southwark, and at the place where formerly existed the archery ground or butts now known as Newington Butts. There stands the largest building belonging to the Baptist denomination in the world, the edifice with which my brother's name is identified, the Metropolitan Tabernacle.

On the identical plot of ground martyrs were burned. Not far from the same spot stands the old parish church, and in that church Bishop Bonner, called "the bloody bishop," from the virulence of his persecution of dissenters, used to preach. In the very room which Bonner had once used as a library, and where he had committed to prison and to death many of the Lord's faithful people for their love of the Bible, the Bible Society lately held their meetings, while their own building was under repair. Such is the failure of persecution. If I am speaking to-night to any young man who suffers for truth's sake, remember this fact and hold on. "Greater is He that is with us than they which are against us."

The plot of land on which the Tabernacle stands belonged originally to the Fishmongers' Company, a corporation which ~~had~~ commenced as a trades-union, but now chiefly devoted to the giving and eating of good dinners. We found they had no power to sell the land. What was to be done? We went to prayer, and as He always has done, God answered it.

I remember

in a country village needed a plot of land on which to build a new chapel. The only site that suited them belonged to a butcher who bitterly hated the people of God. There seemed no hope of inducing him to sell his land, but the brethren held a prayer-meeting about it, and afterwards a deputation waited on the butcher to propose a purchase. "Never," said the obdurate man ; "I will never part with my land for such a purpose as long as I live." "Then," said the representative of the Methodists, "You will soon die. God always gives us what we ask for ; we have asked Him for this land, and if you stand in the way, you will be removed." The Methodists got the land, but I do not know how long the butcher lived.

Well, we went to prayer, and we got an act of Parliament empowering the purchase. On this land the Tabernacle was built. It contains 4500 let-able sittings, with odd accommodation for 1000 more. On one occasion 8000 persons assembled in the building at a meeting presided over by a man honored in this country as well as his own—John Bright. That was a dense packing. The ordinary congregation is 7000. The place was opened free of debt, for my brother refused to preach in it while any debt remained. It was a great undertaking, for $125,000 were required to complete the building, and we had only $25,000 at the commencement. It needed strong faith, for my brother had not so many friends nor supporters so wealthy at that time as I am happy to say have gathered about him since.

Who would sign the contract?—that was a serious question, for it involved a grave responsibility. But a good brother came to the pastor, and asked, "How much is the Tabernacle to cost?" My brother told him. "How much are you deficient?" "$100,000." "Have you any idea where so much money is to come from?" "No, but it will come." "Well," said the good brother, "here it is." And he laid the money on the table. He said he did not expect to pay more than his fair share, but he provided the whole and was willing to bear the whole if the subscriptions did not come in.

My brother went to the building committee and the contract was signed. "Do you think we shall get the money?" they asked. "Well," said my brother, "I have faith." It was not very difficult to have faith, as he had the money in his pocket. He kept the matter a secret by the request of his friend, but at his death it came out. That faith was an easy matter, but he has been equally ready to trust God when the way seemed closed.

MY BROTHER WAS BORN

in 1834. As I was not born until four years afterward, I cannot be expected to have any recollection of the event, so you must take the statement as I do, on trust. As a boy I used to look up to him as my big brother, and he has been my big brother all my life.

He has always been a diligent student, and his tutor, who still lives, says of him that he never recollects having a learner whose classical and mathematical attainments were superior to his. I mention this because I have heard my brother spoken of in this country and in England as an ignoramus, because he had not received a college education. But a sound education may be had without the college curriculum, and it is not always the result of it. I have known fathers who have paid large sums for the college expenses of their sons, who have said with Aaron, "I cast the gold into the furnace, and there came out this calf" (Exodus 32 : 24).

My brother began to preach at sixteen years of age. Too young, some people will say. Well, it may be, but then the Lord had begun to bless him.

HIS FIRST SPHERE

was at a little place called Waterbeach. He was entertained by the members of the church on his weekly visits, but I have heard him say that he had made up his mind not to dine twice at the same place until he had been all through the village, taking house by house. There was a public-house in the village kept by an irreligious man, and much curiosity was excited as to what my brother would do when, in his progress through the village, he should come to the public-house. The publican, though having no sympathy with the young preacher, did not like the idea of being left out of the list, and as the pastor came nearer to his house he began to speculate what he ought to do in receiving him. He finally thought it would be a good thing to go and hear him preach, and one Sunday he appeared among the congregation. The sermon that day was blessed to his soul, and not long after he was received into the church.

One of our preachers has followed out the same plan, and amongst the inhabitants of the village where he labored was a man who said he would never receive him into his house. The preacher, going up the village one day, saw this man leaning over his gate in a disconsolate manner. He inquired what was the trouble, and found that the man had arranged with a butcher to come and kill his pig, and the man had the hot water and every thing ready for the operation, but the butcher had not arrived. The preacher offered to solve the difficulty by killing the pig himself, and he did it. He was invited into the house, and the acquaintance thus formed led to a spiritual change, and the man who had formerly been the leader of opposition is now an active deacon in my friend's church. The moral of this is, "Be all things to all men, if by any means we may save some."

The earnestness of my brother attracted attention in London, and he was invited to New Park Street Chapel. Why it was called New Park Street no one can explain. It was not "new," and there was no "park" there. The church was small; there were barely a hundred members. But the history of the church was a remarkable one. The books date back 250 years, and there have been several eminent men among its pastors.

A COUNTRY VICAR.

It is related of one of those pastors that he went to preach in a country village, and met the vicar. The vicar was very angry with him for his intrusion in his parish, and concluded some offensive remarks by saying roughly, "You ought to be stopped." "That would be difficult," was the reply; "it would be easier to stop your preaching." "Why so," inquired the vicar. "Because," said the preacher, "there is but one way of stopping me, and there are three ways of stopping you. If I took away your book you could not preach; if your pay were stopped you would not preach; and if your gown were taken off you dare not preach. But the only way to stop me would be to cut my tongue out."

These pastors were men who all died in harness. When people talk of my brother failing I tell them, No, he is only just at the beginning of his work. He has been at it twenty-five years, but that is only a slice off the usual length of the pastorate, as shown by the church books.

His success has been very great. There is now a membership of 5156, while at first there were less than a hundred. I could, with the proper book in my hand, tell you the name of each of those members, tell you where they live, tell you how many times each has partaken with us of the Lord's Supper, and give you a little sketch of their history. Then see what these 5000 members represent, and you get an idea of the pastorate at the Tabernacle. Though you grow the corn you must remember we grow men.

Each of these members may be considered to represent a family of at least four, so that the pastorate includes twenty thousand souls. There are ten deacons. One of them has a family of fourteen children, and he says that is better than having a large family. I am one of seventeen children, and my mother was the twenty-second child of her mother. So that you see I am not overestimating when I place the number of the Tabernacle pastorate at twenty thousand. It is difficult to realize that so many are in one way or another under our guidance. The idea, the awful responsibility of the position, is oppressive, and I do not wonder that my brother's health breaks down, and he has occasionally to go away to Mentone.

A great point of interest in the Tabernacle work is

¶ THE COLLEGE.

Our great aim in that department is to turn out preachers. Other colleges give a superior classical and mathematical education; they turn out scholars, and I would not for a moment disparage the value of their work. But our aim is a different one. We endeavor to train young men to preach the Gospel, so we call it "a Pastors' College."

There are many men who have good ideas, who know what they want to say, but have not the power to say it in an effective manner. So we try to help them to a vigorous expression of their thoughts. There is a great deal in the way any thing is offered to the people. It may be offered in such a way that they do not recognize the value of it, and are not eager to receive it.

I remember hearing of a case in which a man laid that he would stand for an hour on London Bridge, the most densely crowded thoroughfare in London, and offer to sell a gold sovereign, worth about five dollars of your money, for a penny (two cents), and no one would buy it. He dressed himself in old, tattered garments, and took a basket, in which he placed the sovereign, surrounded by a lot of wretched articles not worth a cent, and in a whining voice begged the charitable public to buy any article in his basket for a penny. He waited the hour, and left the bridge with his sovereign unsold.

I do not suppose that could have been done in America, and it could not have been done in England if the man had shown the sovereign for the valuable thing it was, and not have placed it among worthless surroundings. We think sermons often miss their mark in the same way.

There is so much in the sermon that is worthless, that the true gold of the Gospel is not discovered by the hearers. That is the point we impress on all our students, that the grand old story of the cross should be brought to the front, and that people should see it and know its value.

I have heard people raise the objection to the college that the students imitate my brother, that they are likely to develop into nothing more than little Spurgeons. But I do not see the harm; they might imitate a worse model; and after all, at the beginning of their career most men are to some extent imitators. Young artists go to Rome and spend years in copying from the old masters, until they have learned how to give expression to their own conceptions and to use their own talents.

There are some men who imitate mannerisms and weaknesses, but that is because they fail to see wherein the power of their model lies. I remember a young man who took for his model a great London preacher, Dr. Binney. Dr. Binney had at times a peculiar way of making l pauses before and after a remark of unus depth of thought. His imitator copied Dr. l ney's pauses without Dr. Binney's reason, one Sunday, having preached in a cour church, a good deacon thanked him for his mon but deplored the hesitancy of his man "It is not hesitancy," said the young preach "that is my style. Pauses like those are grand secret of Dr. Binney's success." He copied the Doctor's weakness, and by that act had shown his inability to detect the se of his success.

I think the students do imitate my bro somewhat. But we hope they will get ou that, and that we shall see them magnifying Lord and saving souls.

In addition to the college is another inst tion of as great or even greater interest. Th

¶ THE ORPHANAGE.

A good lady wrote to my brother some t ago, saying she desired to found an Orphar under his management, and she wished to him £20,000 ($100,000) for the purpose. brother's work was then very extensive, an orphanage involved a considerable additio it, and he tried to persuade her to give it good friend George Müller. But the old was determined that her money should be s exactly in the way she had proposed. Afte it requires some resolution to refuse $100, and at last we agreed to accept the trust.

An orphanage requires a constant influ money in considerable sums, and we thought by many good men to be undertaki work that had more in it of presumption tha faith.

Dr. Brock, among others, was expostula with us on the subject one day, and repres ed very strongly the risk we were runr While he was speaking, a letter was brough and handed to my brother. He opened it, found inclosed a contribution for the new ect amounting to $10,000. He silently ha the letter to Dr. Brock and watched its e Dr. Brock read it with wondering eyes, without a word of comment said, "Le pray." Opposition and remonstrance died after that, but it is beginning to be whisp again now; for we are beginning a new orp age for girls like that for boys. We re $25,000 a year for the boys, and we shall the same sum for the girls. But we have st faith that the funds will come in as they needed.

I was once at

and I noticed one intelligent man sitting sil all through. One after another spoke, bu neighbor remained silent. I said, "Does no Spirit move thee to say something?" He solemnly, and said: "I have a talent, and it, but not in speaking; my work is to money for the Lord." That was all he said, then he sat down. I found afterwards th was a very successful business man, and tha liberality was equal to his business capacit have often thought of his short speech and I think that if it does not require muc ent to make money, it requires a great de give it to the Lord. But there are many find their happiness in that work.

You must have many such great and li souls in your great country, for I have no wherever I have gone that the noblest edific all the cities are those consecrated to reli The finest buildings are houses of prayer, think that is a very significant fact. I hop pray that such generosity may continue abound.

¶ There is also another institution to wh can only allude briefly, and that is the Co tage. We have ninety agents always empl in selling pure and wholesome literature, a testifying to Gospel truth.

There are other departments of work, but they are such as you have here in gr perfection than ours. We have Sunday-sc and tract societies, but in those we cannot t

I shall go back to tell some stories of work in those and other departments that will excite wonder at the Tabernacle.

It will be something like what happened to me once, when I had returned from a long journey and was relating to a friend something I had seen. He said, "Yes, wonderful indeed. You would not have believed it if you had not seen it yourself." I said, "No, I should not." "Well, then," he said, "as I did not see it, you will excuse me believing it."

My brother has already done

A GREAT LIFE'S WORK.

What is the secret of the achievement? I can only give the honor where my brother would give it. It is God's work—that is the secret. But there are peculiarities in my brother's character which account for God's blessing his labors. He is what you call in America

A LIVE MAN.

If he ever came here, he would feel just at home with you. There is such a lot of "go" here, and my brother is a man of immense go.

I was in a train in Scotland once when it came to a standstill away from any station. We waited patiently for some time, and then one of the passengers went to inquire the cause of the delay. "Have you run out of coal?" "No, we have got plenty of coals," said the engineer. "Got no water?" "Yes, plenty of water, but it na boil." That is the cause of delay very often in religious work; but I never knew my brother have to wait to get up the steam. He throws his whole soul and energies into what he does. God blesses that kind of work. He never blesses a man who works with only one hand.

He has also a great faculty for setting other people to work. Some men treat lay laborers as outsiders, and like to do every thing themselves. But my brother and I never do what we can get done as well by other people. There are some things only the leaders can do, but there are things they ought not to do. This is organization, and it is an important matter in a large church.

One question I always put to candidates for church fellowship—and I examine every one of them—"Now, what are you going to do?" Our church is a row-boat, every one must work, and we have no room for any passengers.

There are many ways of helping on the work. I will tell you one that was originated by a good man at the Tabernacle. He took seven sittings and bought seven hymn-books. A little while before the commencement of service he went into the street to look out for young men. When he saw one coming, he would accost him with "Have you a seat at the Tabernacle?" "No." "Well, will you take mine? And here is a hymn-book: I will ask you for it after the service." That gave him an opportunity for saying something for the Lord when he went for the book. We have noticed the results of that work, and there have been no less than fifteen young men added to our church as the result of that scheme.

There is so much in this principle of getting the people to work. A deacon wrote to my brother once for "a student who would be sure to fill the church." My brother replied that he had not one big enough. He would send a good man, and if they fed him well, he might fill the pulpit in time, but they must fill the church themselves.

Then my brother has another characteristic with which you will be in sympathy. He is never at rest. I have never known him to be without some new project he was considering and elaborating. Never neglecting the old ones or allowing them to flag; but as you would say he is always going out into the far West to break up new ground.

These are the prominent characteristics of my brother and his work, about which you and all the Christian people I have met have expressed so kindly an interest. We ascribe our success wholly to God's blessing, but we work in faith and prayer, and seek to make the best use of all our opportunities for service.

SYMPATHY.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, October 12th, 1879.

"Send thee help from the sanctuary."—PSALM 20 : 2.

What is the Church?—Different Conceptions—What it ought to Be—An Omnipotent Help—The Business Man at Church—I. Help from Music—Earthly Music a Rehearsal for the Heavenly—A Dying Englishwoman—More Volume Needed—Only a Few Hymns—The Hymns do not Wear Out—Sing for Others—An Incident at a Siege—The Bell at St. Paul's—II. Help from the Sermon—Young People Need Sympathy—Older People Need It—Help for Every One Somewhere—III. Help from Prayer—Three Prayers Wasted—The Old Church will not do—Not a New Gospel—How the Church Doors should be Set—"Mary, follow"—A Tree in Switzerland.

IF you should ask fifty men what the church is, they would give you fifty different answers. One man would say, "It is a convention of hypocrites." Another, "It is an assembly of people who feel themselves a great deal better than others." Another, "It is a place for gossip, where wolverine dispositions devour each other." Another, "It is a place for the cultivation of superstition and cant." Another, "It is an arsenal where theologians go to get pikes and muskets and shot." Another, "It is an art gallery where men go to admire grand arches, and exquisite fresco, and musical warble, and the Dantesque in gloomy imagery." Another man would say, "It is the best place on earth except my own home." "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem! let my right hand forget her cunning."

Now, my friends, whatever the church is, my text tells you what it ought to be: a great, practical, homely, omnipotent help. "Send thee help from the sanctuary." The pew ought to yield restfulness for the body. The color of the upholstery ought to yield pleasure to the eye. The entire service ought to yield strength for the moil and struggle of everyday life. The Sabbath ought to be harnessed to all the six days of the week, drawing them in the right direction.

The church ought to be a magnet, visibly and mightily affecting all the homes of the worshippers. Every man gets roughly jostled, gets abused, gets cut, gets insulted, gets slighted, gets exasperated. By the time the Sabbath comes, he has an accumulation of six days of annoyance, and that is a starveling church service which has not strength enough to take that accumulated annoyance and hurl it into perdition.

The business man sits down in church headachey from the week's engagements. Perhaps he wishes he had tarried at home on the lounge with the newspapers and the slippers. That man wants to be cooled off and graciously diverted. The first wave of the religious service ought to dash clear over the hurricane decks, and leave him dripping with holy and glad and heavenly emotion. "Send thee help from the sanctuary."

HELP FROM MUSIC.

I. In the first place, sanctuary help ought to come from the music. A woman recently dying in England persisted in singing to the last moment. The attendants tried to persuade her to stop, saying it would exhaust her and make her disease worse. She answered: "I must sing: I am only practising for the heavenly choir." Music on earth is a rehearsal for music in heaven. If you and I are going to take part in that great orchestra, it is high time that we were stringing and thrumming our harps.

They tell us that Thalberg and Gottschalk never would go into a concert until they had first in private rehearsed, although they were such masters of the instrument. And can it be that we expect to take a part in the great oratorio of heaven if we do not rehearse here?

But I am not speaking of the next world. Sabbath song ought to set all the week to music. We want not more harmony, not more artistic expression, but more volume in our church music. The English Dissenting churches far surpass our American churches in this respect. An English audience of one thousand people will give more volume of sacred song than an American audience of two thousand people. I do not know what the reason is. Oh! you ought to hear them sing in Surrey Chapel. A few weeks ago I had the opportunity of preaching the anniversary—I think the ninetieth anniversary—sermon in Rowland Hill's old chapel, and when they lifted their voices in sacred song, it was simply overwhelming; and then, in the evening of the same day, in Agricultural Hall, twenty thousand voices lifted in doxology. It was like the voice of many waters, and like the voice of many thunderings, and like the voice of heaven.

> "The blessing thrilled through all the laboring throng,
> And heaven was won by violence of song."

Now, I am no worshipper of noise, but I believe that if our American churches would with full heartiness of soul and full emphasis of voice sing the songs of Zion, this part of sacred worship would have tenfold more power than it has now. Why not take this part of the sacred service and lift it to where it ought to be. All the annoyances of life might be drowned out of that sacred song.

Do you tell me that it is not fashionable to sing very loudly? Then, I say, away with the fashion. We dam back the great Mississippi of congregational singing, and let a few drops of melody trickle through the dam. I say, take away the dam, and let the billows roar on their way to the oceanic heart of God. Whether it is fashionable to sing loudly or not, let us sing with all possible emphasis.

We hear a great deal of the art of singing, of music as an entertainment, of music as a recreation. It is high time we heard something of music as a help, a practical help. In order to this, we must have only a few hymns. New tunes and new hymns every Sunday make poor congregational singing. Fifty hymns are enough for fifty years. The Episcopal Church prays the same prayers every Sabbath, and year after year, and century after century. For that reason they have the hearty responses. Let us take a hint from that fact, and let us sing the same songs Sabbath after Sabbath. Only in that way can we come to the full force of this exercise.

Twenty thousand years will not wear out the hymns of William Cowper, and Charles Wesley, and Isaac Watts. Suppose now each person in this audience has brought all the annoyances of the last three hundred and sixty-five days. Fill this room to the ceiling with sacred song, and you would drown out all those annoyances of the three hundred and sixty-five days, and you would drown them out forever. Organ and cornet are only to marshal the voice. Let the voice fall into line, and in companies, and in battalions, by storm take the obduracy and sin of the world. If you cannot sing for yourself,

SING FOR OTHERS.

By trying to give others good cheer, you will bring good cheer to your own heart.

When Londonderry, Ireland, was besieged many years ago, the people inside the city were famishing, and a vessel came up with provisions, but the vessel ran on the river bank and stuck fast. The enemy went down with laughter and derision to board the vessel, when the vessel gave a broadside fire against the enemy, and by the shock was turned back into the stream, and all was well. Oh, ye who are high and dry on the rocks of melancholy, give a broadside fire of song against your spiritual enemies, and by holy rebound you will come out into the calm waters. If we want to make ourselves happy, we must make others happy.

Mythology tells us of Amphion, who played his lyre until the mountains were moved and the walls of Thebes arose; but religion has a mightier story to tell of how Christian song may build whole temples of eternal joy, and lift the round earth into sympathy with the skies.

I tarried many nights this summer in London, and I used to hear the bells, the small bells of the city, strike the hour of night—one, two, three, four, and after they were done striking the hour of night then the great St. Paul's Cathedral would come in to mark the hours, making all the other sounds seem utterly insignificant as with mighty tongue it announced the hour of the night, every stroke an overmastering boom. My friends, it was intended that all the lesser sounds of the world should be drowned out in the mighty tongue of congregational song beating against the gates of heaven. Do you know how they mark the hours in heaven? They have no clocks, as they have no candles, but a great pendulum of hallelujah swinging across heaven from eternity to eternity.

"Let those refuse to sing
Who never knew our God;
But children of the Heavenly King
Should speak their joys abroad."

HELP FROM THE SERMON.

II. Again I remark that sanctuary help ought to come from the sermon. Of a thousand people in this or any other audience, how many want sympathetic help? Do you guess a hundred? Do you guess five hundred? You have guessed wrong. I will tell you just the proportion. Out of a thousand people in this audience there are just one thousand who need sympathetic help.

These young people want it just as much as the old. The old people sometimes seem to think they have a monopoly of the rheumatisms, and the neuralgias, and the headaches, and the physical disorders of the world; but I tell you there are no worse heartaches than are felt by some of these young people. Do you know that much of the work is done by the young? Raphael died at thirty-seven; Richelieu at thirty-one; Gustavus Adolphus died at thirty-eight; Innocent III. came to his mightiest influence at thirty-seven; Cortez conquered Mexico at thirty; Don John won Lepanto at twenty-five; Grotius was attorney-general at twenty-four; and I have noticed amid all classes of men that some of the severest battles and the toughest work comes before thirty. Therefore we must have our sermons and our exhortations in prayer-meeting all sympathetic with the young.

The young will not come to church because it is a mere matter of cold duty. Make our services sympathetic and people all come; and I must say this last week there is nothing that has pleased me so much as what is told me, that a great many of the young people of this city are coming and desiring a religious home here, desiring sittings in the church and a place where they can worship God Sabbath after Sabbath. I do not say come to this church, but I do say all these young people should have their spiritual home in some of the beautiful and glorious churches of this city, the "city of churches."

And so with these people further on in life. What do these doctors and lawyers and merchants and mechanics care about the abstractions of religion? What they want is help to bear the whimsicalities of patients, the browbeating of legal opponents, the unfairness of customers, who have plenty of fault finding for every imperfection of handiwork, but no praise for twenty excellences. What does that brain-racked, hand-blistered man care for Zwingle's Doctrine of Original Sin, or Melancthon's Synergism, or Augustine's Anthropology? You might as well go to a man who has the pleurisy and put on his side a plaster made out of Doctor Parr's treatise on medical jurisprudence.

While all of a sermon may not be helpful alike to all, if it be a Christian sermon preached by a Christian man, there will be help for every one somewhere. We go into an apothecary store. We see others being waited on; we do not complain because we do not immediately get the medicine; we know our turn will come after a while. And so while all parts of a sermon may not be appropriate to our case, if we wait prayerfully before the sermon is through, we shall have the divine prescription. I say to these young men who come here Sabbath by Sabbath, and who are going to preach the Gospel, these theological students—I say to them, We want in our sermons not more metaphysics, nor more imagination, nor more logic, nor more profundity. What we want in our sermons and Christian exhortations is more sympathy.

When Father Taylor preached in the Sailors' Bethel at Boston, the jack tars felt they had help for their duties among the ratlines and the forecastles. When Richard Weaver preaches to the operatives in Oldham, England, all the workingmen feel they have more grace for the spindles. When Doctor South preached to kings and princes and princesses, all the mighty men and women who heard him felt preparation for their high station.

HELP FROM PRAYER.

III. Again I remark: that sanctuary help ought to come through the prayers of all the people. The door of the eternal storehouse is hung on one hinge, a gold hinge, the hinge of prayer, and when the whole audience lay hold of that door, it must come open.

There are here many people spending their first Sabbath after some great bereavement. What will your prayer do for them? How will it help the tomb in that man's heart. Here are people who have not been in church before for ten years; what will your prayer do for them by rolling over their soul holy memories? Here are people in crises of awful temptation. They are on the verge of despair, or wild blundering, or theft, or suicide. What will your prayer do for them this morning in the way of giving them strength to resist?

Will you be chiefly anxious about the fit of the glove that you put to your forehead while you prayed? Will you be chiefly critical of the rhetoric of the pastor's petition? No. No. A thousand people will feel, "that prayer is for me," and at every step of the prayer chains ought to drop off, and temples of sin ought to crush into dust, and jubilees of deliverance ought to brandish their trumpets.

In most of our churches we have three prayers—the opening prayer, what is called the "long prayer," and the closing prayer. There are many people who spend the first prayer in arranging their apparel after entrance, and spend the second prayer, the "long prayer," in wishing it were through, and spend the last prayer in preparing to start for home.

The most insignificant part of every religious service is the sermon. The more important parts are the Scripture lesson and the prayer. The sermon is only a man talking to a man. The Scripture lesson is God talking to man. Prayer is man talking to God. Oh! if we understood the grandeur and the pathos of this exercise of prayer, instead of being a dull exercise, we would imagine that the room was full of divine and angelic appearances, as when Miss McFarland was dying she cried, "Wings! wings! wings!"

But, my friends,

THE OLD STYLE OF CHURCH

will not do the work. We might as well now try to take all the passengers from New York to Buffalo by stage-coach, or all the passengers from Albany to Buffalo by canal-boat, or do all the battling of the world with bow and arrow, as with the old style of church to meet the exigencies of this day. Unless the church in our day will adapt itself to the time, it will become extinct. The people reading newspapers and books all the week, in alert, picturesque, and resounding style, will have no patience with Sabbath humdrum.

We have no objections to bands and surplice, and all the paraphernalia of clerical life; but these things make no impression—make no more impression on the great masses of the people than the ordinary business suit that you wear in Wall Street. A tailor cannot make a minister. Some of the poorest preachers wear the best clothes; and many a backwoodsman has dismounted from the saddle-bags, and in his linen duster preached a sermon that shook earth and heaven with its Christian eloquence.

police official, from his throne of power, calmly, comfortably, and philosophically this doctrine. We wonder, however, had en as Percival, the victim of the wrong, he have spoken so oracularly, and felt so acently?

H, not exactly," replied the police official, hat embarrassed, for it was an awkward d. "You see, sir, the fact is I have not per here; it is in another office." h, ah, yes!" were expletives which again from the police official's lips at Per- question. "You see, sir, we are now in extraordinary times, extraordinary indeed," he repeated. "Open insur- n is afoot, and even lives have been sac- — lives sacrificed," he reiterated, as h echoing his words. "In ordinary of course, sir, there can be no arrest and onment without trial; it would be very , sir—in fact, couldn't and daren't be but I suppose you know, sir, the Habeas s Act is suspended? A harsh measure, I admit, but, I assure you, sir, one now most necessary;" and, after a short pause, he added, "to us, the police, at all events, for it empowers us, sir, very comfortably to put troublesome gentlemen out of the way of doing mischief for a time—gentlemen who, though they may have committed no overt act, you know, are yet, sir, rebels in heart, and dangerous to the general safety."

"It may be comfortable for you and your agent," answered Percival, with some warmth, "but I know it makes possible dreadful discomfort to others. The suspension of the act you speak of, sir, puts a tremendous and irresponsible power into the hands of men like you; and I must tell you candidly, sir, I fear that you and your compeers, whoever they are, are borne away by present untoward circumstances, and too easily listen to the words of disreputable men and pestilent informers. You are doing so, I tell you plainly, sir, in my case, and, as a loyal and free-born Briton, with all my soul I protest against it."

The conversation was becoming rather too bold and personal for the man in power, and it may be that Percival, irate at the unjust proceedings taken against him, also looked and spoke beyond the bounds of moderation. The police official seemed to think so, for he cut the interview short by summoning a policeman into his presence, and said to him—

"Take that gentleman," pointing to Percival, "in a cab, and lodge him in Richmond Bridewell."

"Yes, sir," said the policeman, as he gave a military salute, and hastened at once from the room to carry out his orders.

It was not long before Percival found himself within the massive and iron-studded doors of the large and gloomy prison which has been mentioned. Within its walls Daniel O'Connell in former days had been incarcerated, and since Percival's sojourn there, namely, in 1865, the notorious Stephens—the Fenian Head Centre, as he styled himself—was there imprisoned. It is a matter of history that from his trebly-barred cell, in the strongest part of the gaol, this latter individual, favored by a secret Fenian turnkey, escaped, and never afterwards fell into the clutches of the English executive.

A short time before Percival's coming, another prisoner had been lodged in the great building—one who would have interested Percival far more than either Daniel O'Connell or, could he have anticipated history, James Stephens himself. Our readers will at once have suggested to them the individual of whom we speak. It is no less than Jemmy Mehaffy. Sworn against by the police before the magistrate sitting in the police office in Rathmines for assaulting them in the discharge of their duty, he was committed to the same lodgings as his master.

When Jemmy was taken inside the prison gate, and into the lofty vestibule, and then along the great corridor to his cell, he was filled with admiration and wonder.

"Shure," said he to himself, "they go to a power of ixpince and throuble in Dublin for the entertainmint of them that bates the poliss, as that lyin' peeler swore of me. Begorrah, it's as fine a place amoast as must be the Queen's paliss. Plinty o' room to look about ye anyhow and to brathe in, and it's as clane as a new pin, too; and, more nor that, here are dacent min, with their big kays, so grand-lookin' to attend on ye. Why, I feel as proud as a gintleman, and if it warn't that the masther 'll want me and can't do widout me, begorrah, I'd be contint, sending for Janie, to spind here the rest o' me days in pace and quietness. Musha, if it's a grand place like this wan's put into for batin' the poliss, it's a wondher all out to me they haven't every day o' their loives broken heads and bloody noses.

"Dacent man," said Jemmy to the turnkey who was walking beside him, "is all thim dures along there in a row that I see the hall-dures o' thim that have giv' it hot to the poliss? And purshuin' to me, if there aren't little windows in thim,"—these were the ventilators and spyholes—"for the postman to dhrop aisy inside their newspapers and love letthers in the mornin's. Shure it's the very hoight o' kindness, no less, of the poliss to thrate their inimies in this way. As I've hard the masther say, 'It's Christian loike, for shure it's nothing else nor returnin' good for evil.'"

The turnkey gave a rapid glance at Jemmy to learn if he were not what he called "a natheral." He perceived, however, in a little that his talk sprung not from want of reason, but downright simplicity. When he stopped at Jemmy's cell door to open it, and the poor fellow, not knowing he was to wait, was advancing further down the corridor, the turnkey dashed after him, grasped him roughly, pushed him through the cell door, and locked it fast behind him. "Where did ye learn yer manners, me good man?" ejaculated Jemmy, so as to be heard through the door. "Is thim the way ye attind gentlemin in this place? Begorrah, if I had ye for a week at the masther's I'd larn ye betther.

"A nice, clane, dacent, comfortable little room though," he soliloquized, as he glanced around his cell. "I don't onderstand how the poliss can afford to do it so respectable, and all for nothing—bates all to tatthers the wit o' Jemmy Mehaffy; shure, it bates the enchantment o' the fairies."

How Jemmy felt, however, next day, after several hours of solitary confinement, we will not now say, only that it was widely different from the present moment. We must postpone a description of his experience until we put before our readers the case of him who was in "durance vile" near him, and whom he styled "the masther." We say near him, for it so occurred that Percival was placed in a cell the very next to that which held in confinement his faithful Jemmy.

It was about half an hour after Jemmy's incarceration that Percival, in a cab, with policemen accompanying him, arrived at Richmond Gaol. Conscious of innocence, with a somewhat elastic step he left the vehicle, the policemen keeping close to him, passed inside the prison wall, and thus, de facto, surrendered his freedom. The governor met him in the vestibule, and, so far as his office permitted, received him considerately and graciously—in fact, treated him as a prisoner of the first class.

Percival, therefore, did not at all feel his new position of captivity until he was taken to a room where his height, weight, the color of his eyes and hair, and his whole general appearance were carefully registered. His likeness also was photographed. His own dress was not changed for a prison costume, because he was in custody, not as a condemned felon, but merely as a prisoner in safe keeping without trial, and that because of the temporary suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; and several other persons in the same predicament were in the gaol.

The governor, chatting upon general topics, put off as long as possible an unpleasant moment, but at length passed, as though casually, into a corridor, showing by a gesture that he expected Percival to follow. Leaving the registration room some distance behind, he proceeded to a great iron grating with a door in the centre, which was ominously locked behind them. They both advanced until a warder was met, to whose care the governor transferred the captive, saying kindly, "Well, sir, I must now say 'good-by.' This is not the most desirable place, I confess, for you to find yourself in, but we shall do all that the rules of the prison will allow to make your sojourn here, which I trust, sir, will only be a short one, as little irksome as possible."

He then turned away, and Percival found himself alone with the subordinate janitor. "Please step this way," said the man. Cell 55 was soon reached; with a motion of his hand the warder indicated that his prisoner was to enter it. Percival crossed the stone threshold, the heavy iron door, with a loud noise, was locked behind him, and he was in a living tomb.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Indian War.—The Small Band of U. S. Troops under the command of Capt. Payne, at Milk River, which were known to be in a critical situation, have been relieved. General Merritt, aware of the urgent necessity of promptitude and that the lives of brave men depended on the speed with which help could be afforded them, pushed forward as rapidly as possible for their intrenchment. The troops marched all the night of Saturday, October 4th, and when they halted they had placed more than seventy miles between them and Rawlins, whence they had set out. The next day they reached the intrenchments, and after relieving Captain Payne, visited the scene of the disaster to Major Thornburgh's command. General Merritt then proceeded to fortify a new camp, where he intended to await the arrival of the fresh troops on their way to him. There had been skirmishing every day since Merritt's arrival. The information received by Merritt was that the Utes had collected 700 warriors in the front, which would certainly indicate their large enforcement from the Western and Southern tribes. Various reports have been in circulation as to the cause of the outbreak. Secretary Schurz believes the trouble arose from the encroachments of white settlers, and especially miners, who were prospecting for gold and silver mines. The Indians said they were gradually losing their reservation, and they grew despondent about it. The appearance of the soldiers was the signal for an outbreak.

The Government and individual settlers have acted towards the Indians in a manner unworthy of a Christian people. The tribes have been cruelly driven from their lands, and have been shamefully deceived. The Board of Indian Commissioners in its last report reviews the systematic bad faith of the Government toward the Indians, especially in the matter of treaties. "The simple and shameful truth is," so the report runs, "that we have neglected and forgotten our part of these compacts. Many Indians, believing that we would keep faith with them, have selected their tracts of land and made improvements, but have waited nearly a quarter of a century in vain for the promised security of title. We cannot recover the millions of treasure lost, nor restore the lives sacrificed by our broken faith, but we may deal honestly and justly in the future."

It is time Christian men spoke out in this matter, for our character as an honest and just dealing nation is jeopardized by our Indian policy. It is contrary to the law of God and degrades us in the eyes of the world.

Another Blow to Polygamy.—Acting Secretary Bell, of the Interior Department, has rendered a decision that polygamists are not entitled to land as homestead settlers. The decision was rendered in the case of Hugh Lyons against Rachel Stevens, of Salt Lake City. Rachel Stevens is one of the many wives of a John Holman, and the decision is to the effect that no woman who voluntarily maintains and acknowledges her position to be that of a "plural wife"—that is, one of many wives of the same husband—should be permitted to make a homestead or pre-emption entry of public land. It will be a good thing if polygamists who set at defiance the law of God discover that their conduct forfeits their privileges as citizens.

Rev. Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., preached briefly to his people last Sabbath morning, when he was warmly welcomed home from Europe. He had returned on Tuesday with Dr. Talmage. His health is improved, but he is required to lie by for a few months longer, when he hopes to resume his full measure of labor.

Desecration of the Lord's Day.—Christian people in Philadelphia have been deeply grieved by the opening of the Permanent Exhibition Building on Sundays. It was understood at the opening of the exhibition that it would always be closed on that day, and a member of the Sabbath Alliance on that assurance opened the inauguration ceremonies with prayer. But in defiance of the protests of the friends of the Sabbath, and of the law of the State, it speedily came to be opened on that day; and the Christian public were not a little amazed at the declaration of the Chairman, that a chief object in this Sabbath opening was "the moral good of the people"! Specious pretences of this kind deceive no one. Money is to be gained by the practice, and that is the true motive. "The moral good of the people" is never secured by breaking the law of God, and those who allege that object as the motive for their sin are false philanthropists and dangerous enemies of the people's welfare.

A Sad Incident is Communicated to us by an Iowa pastor: "Last Saturday a young man came to my study to tell me that his wedding-day was fixed, and to request me to perform the marriage ceremony. To do so would interfere with my own plans; but as I was greatly interested in the young man, and the bride-elect was a member of my choir and a choice Christian girl, I consented. It seemed fixed that in a few days I was to marry these young people—even the wedding fee, in certain anticipation, was placed in my hand. I can recall so vividly the fluttering joy of my young friend as he unfolded to me the plans and hopes of his young manhood.

"But, ah! how frail the bark which bears the hopes that sigh for earthly realization. Only three days had passed when the news was brought to me that the fair young woman who was so soon to have been a bride was dying, and ere the sun had set that day she had passed from earth. On the next afternoon a surprised and sorrow-subdued company crowded the church where the memorial services were held, and where the last look was taken at the face so lately bright with glad anticipations, now bereft of animation." How wise the warning, "Boast not thyself of to-morrow"! (Prov. 27 : 1.)

A Balloon and its Occupants are Supposed to have been lost in Lake Michigan. Professor Wise, an aëronaut of fame, accompanied by George Burr, teller of the St. Louis Bank, St. Louis, Mo., made an ascent in a balloon from Lindell Park, in that city, on Sunday, September 28th, and both are missing. The balloon was last seen about twenty miles south of Chicago, and it is feared that its occupants met their death in Lake Michigan.

As each day, moreover, makes it more probable that Wise and his companion have been lost, the disaster recalls the similar fatal ascension Donaldson, and the strange pamphlet wh Wise published a year after the death of t daring aëronaut. This purported to be the di of Donaldson on the voyage, but it was writ by Wise from his own experiences, and his c jectures of what Donaldson and his hap companion, Grimwood, might have said. seems curiously to forecast the fate which probably overtaken the writer. Wise dedic that pamphlet as follows:

"To all reckless aëronauts, who run t cloud-scraping coaches with a disregard of co quences, or who, in other words, essay to without making due calculations and prep tions to alight, this little narrative is dedicat

A Successful Testimonial.—A Boy recently applied to the captain of an American vessel for employment. He was a poor lad, the son of a widow, and his earnest face and entreating voice won a hearing from the kindly captain. But the boy had no letter of recommendation, and the captain made the production of such a letter an indispensable requisite before giving employment to any strange boy. Deeply disappointed, the widow's son was turning away when a bright thought struck him. He put his hand in his pocket, and drew forth a Bible which he handed to the captain, and pointed to the fly-leaf on which was written "Willie Graham; presented as a reward for regular and punctual attendance at Sabbath-school, and for his blameless conduct there and elsewhere. From his Sunday-school teacher."

The captain was instantly moved, and clapping Willie on the shoulder said:

"You are the boy for me; you shall sail with me, and if you are as good a lad as I think you are, your pockets shan't be empty when you go back to your mother."

The California Chinese Mission shows an aggregate membership in its schools of 554, with an average attendance of 280. Nine schools are in operation. Nineteen teachers are in service, five of whom are Chinese missionary helpers. A large amount of additional service is rendered by volunteer helpers, both American and Chinese. Four cases of conversion are reported, and several others of apparent conviction concerning the truth of the Gospel, and interest in it. The membership and average attendance in the schools are increasing. The large and continuous immigration of the Chinese renders this work one of the important movements of the day, and deserves the prayers and hearty good wishes of all Christian citizens.

The Reply of a Boy to the Question whether his father was a Christian was very significant. He said, "Yes, he is a Christian, but he is not doing much at it now." Mr. Pentecost in relating the incident at the Cooper Union last week, said that mechanics and others who did not "do much at" their business did not get on; and he thought the reason Christians did not progress in the divine life was very often because they did not "do much" at their high calling.

Born in a Liquor Saloon.—"My Father was a tavern-keeper, and I was born in a liquor saloon," said a man at the Gospel Tent in New York lately. "From my earliest childhood I was given to drink. At the age of thirteen years I was a confirmed drunkard. I have been repeatedly arrested at a period in life when other children were going to school and enjoying the blessings of childhood. As I grew older I became more addicted to drink, and every other vice it begets, till I was an outcast, spending my time between the low saloon and the Island. I entered this tent and heard men tell what God had done for them. A longing desire sprang up in my heart. I was told God could save any one—even to the uttermost. This seemed too good to be true. But to-night I know it is true, for I am sitting at His feet, an humble, penitent, pardoned sinner."

The Wealth of the Rothschild Family, which is supposed to be the richest family in the world, has been the accumulation of a comparatively short time. It is said that the founder of the family fortunes once travelled to a country fair to dispose of a roll of cloth which constituted his sole stock in trade. On the way he was overtaken by another pedlar, going the same road, with an ass to carry his stuff. He said to Rothschild, "Ease yourself of that burden, and put it on the ass." This was done, and they journeyed on till they came to a deep and narrow ravine, across which a single plank served as a bridge. The ass was going over, when the prudent Rothschild said, "Wait a moment; I will take back my cloth; it is all my fortune, and accidents often happen at such places as this." So saying he took his load from the ass's back. The ass and his master stepped upon the plank, which sank under their weight, and they disappeared into the chasm. M. Rothschild remained in safety on the bank, bearing with him that single bale, from which has grown the enormous fortune of his family now so large as to control the policy of nations.

Why Not Take It?—On One Occasion as I was coming out of a preaching service, I saw an old man looking very unhappy. I said, "My friend, you are not happy." "No," he replied, "I am not." I added, "You are not saved." "No," said he;" "I have been praying for it for twenty years." "What!" I said; "praying for it for twenty years! Let me tell you a story, for you remind me of the circumstance:

"I saw a gentleman the other day who was paralyzed on one side, and was wheeled about in a Bath chair. As he was out one day he saw a poor man sitting by the roadside afflicted in the same manner, and calling out, 'Oh, give me a hapenny!' The rich man told his servant to wheel him over to the poor man. He did so, and the gentleman held out half-a-crown to the beggar. But the blind man still kept crying, 'Oh, give me a hapenny!' He was blind. The gentleman said, 'Here, my poor fellow, is half-a-crown for you.' But the man was deaf, and still kept calling out for a halfpenny. The servant wheeled the gentleman nearer; and at last he made the poor man hear, and then he thankfully took the half-crown.

"Now, my friend, this is just what you are about. God is offering you salvation, as a free gift, through the blood of Jesus Christ; but instead of taking it, and thanking Him for it, and rejoicing in it, you keep on asking for it." "What!" said he, interrupting me, "can I have salvation without asking for it?" "Of course you can," I replied. "The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord; and the thing to do with a gift is to take it, not to pray that you may have it. 'He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life.'" "Oh, sir; I see it all now!" he exclaimed, and turned away comforted.

A Converted Irishman in Boston, after remaining true for a year and a half, came to a meeting, showing signs of a recent fall, but he had a new experience to relate. He had not left his old dwelling-place, and one time, before he well knew how, he awoke on a chilly November morning in the gutter. His reflection in that position was "bad 'cess to you, child of God, what are you doing in the gutter? and I went home and asked the Lord how it was." The result was that he found he had been the victim of old appetites which he thought were dead, but they were only wounded. He learned that the Christian life must be a continuous battle, and that it is ever needful to watch and pray.

THE GLORY OF GOD IN THE FACE OF JESUS CHRIST.

A New Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."—2 COR. 4:6.

Paul's Trusteeship of Knowledge—I. The Subject of that Knowledge—1. Historically—The Birth, Life, Death, Resurrection, Ascension, and Second Advent of Jesus Christ—2. By Way of Observation—Christ's Veiled Splendor—His Attributes—His Great Heart—II. The Nature of that Knowledge—We Know it by Faith—By Consideration—By Inward Consciousness—III. The Means of that Knowledge—How we have come at it—IV. The Responsibilities of that Knowledge—Scatter the Light.

THE apostle is explaining the reason for his preaching Christ with so much earnestness: he had received divine light, and he felt bound to spread it. One great motive-power of a true ministry is trusteeship. The Lord has put us in trust with the Gospel; He has filled us with a treasure with which we are to enrich the world. The text explains in full what it is with which the Lord has intrusted us: He has bestowed npon us "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ," and it is ours to reflect the light, to impart the knowledge, to manifest the glory, to point to the Saviour's face, and to proclaim the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Having such a work before us, we faint not, but press onward with our whole heart.

I. With no other preface than this we shall ask your attention this morning, first, to of that knowledge in which Paul delighted so much. What was this knowledge which to his mind was the chief of all, and the most worthy to be spread. It was the knowledge of God. Truly a most needful and proper knowledge for all God's creatures. For a man not to know his Maker and Ruler is deplorable ignorance indeed. The proper study of mankind is God. Paul not only knew that there is a God, for he had known that before his conversion: none can more surely believe in the Godhead than did Paul as a Jew. Nor does he merely intend that he had learned somewhat of the character of God, for that also he had known from the Old Testament Scriptures before he was met with on the way to Damascus; but now he had come to know God in a closer, clearer, and surer way, for he had seen Him incarnate in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The apostle had also received the knowledge of "the glory of God." Never had the God of Abraham appeared so glorious as now. God in Christ Jesus had won the adoring wonder of the apostle's instructed mind. He had known Jehovah's glory as the One and only God, he had seen that glory in creation declared by the heavens and displayed upon the earth, he had beheld that glory in the law which blazed from Sinai and shed its insufferable light upon the face of Moses; but now, beyond all else, he had come to perceive the glory of God in the face, or person, of Jesus Christ, and this had won his soul. This special knowledge had been communicated to him at his conversion when Jesus spake to him out of heaven. In this knowledge he had made great advances by experience and by new revelations; but he had not yet learned it to the full, for he was still seeking to know it perfectly by the teaching of the divine Spirit, and we find him saying, "That I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformable unto His death."

Paul knew not merely God, but God in Christ Jesus; not merely "the glory of God," but "the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." The knowledge dealt with God, but it was Christward knowledge. He pined not for a Christless Theism, but for God in Christ. This, beloved, is the one thing which you and I should aim to know. There are parts of the divine glory which will never be seen by us in this life, speculate as we may. Mysticism would fain pry into the unknowable; you and I may leave dreamers and their dreams, and follow the clear light which shines from the face of Jesus.

1. We will for a minute or two consider this glory of God in the face of Christ historically. In every incident of the life of Jesus of Nazareth, the Lord's anointed, there is much of God to be seen. What volumes upon volumes might be written to show God as revealed in every act of Christ from His birth to His death! I see Him as a babe at Bethlehem lying in a manger, and there I perceive a choice glory in the mind of God, for He evidently despises the pomp and glory of the world, which little minds esteem so highly. He might have been born in marble halls, and wrapped in imperial purple, but He scorns these things, and in the manger among the oxen we see a glory which is independent of the trifles of luxury and parade.

The glory of God in the person of Jesus asks no aid from the splendor of courts and palaces. Yet even as a babe He reigns and rules. Mark how the shepherds hasten to salute the new-born King, while the magi from the far-off East bring gold, frankincense, and myrrh, and bow at His feet. When the Lord condescends to show Himself in little things He is still right royal, and commands the homage of mankind. He is as majestic in the minute as in the magnificent, as royal in the babe at Bethlehem as in after days in the man who rode through Jerusalem with hosannas.

See the holy child Jesus in the temple when He is but twelve years old, sitting in the midst of the doctors, astonishing them with His questions! What wisdom there was in that child! Do you not see therein an exhibition of the truth that "the foolishness of God is wiser than men"? Even when God reserves His wisdom, and gives forth utterances fitted for a child, He baffles the wisdom of age and thought. Watch that youth in the carpenter's shop. See Him planing and sawing, cutting and squaring, working according to his parent's command, till he is thirty years of age. What learn we here when we see the incarnate God tarrying at the workman's bench? See we not how God can wait?

Had it been you and I, we should have hastened to begin our life-work long before; we could not have refrained from preaching and teaching for so long a period; but God can wait, and in Christ we see how prudence tempered zeal, and made him share in that eternal leisure which arises out of confidence that his end is sure. The Godhead was concealed at Bethlehem and Nazareth from the eyes of carnal men; but it is revealed to those who have spiritual sight wherewith to behold the Lord.

As for His public ministry, how clearly the Godhead is there! Behold Him, brethren, while He feeds five thousand with a few loaves and fishes, and you cannot fail to perceive therein the glory of God in the commissariat of the universe; for the Lord God openeth His hand and supplieth the lack of every living thing. See Him cast out devils, and learn the divine power over evil. Hear Him raise the dead, and reverence the divine prerogative to kill and to make alive. See Him cure the sick, and think you hear Jehovah say, "I wound, I heal."[*] Hear how He speaks, and infallibly reveals the truth, and you will perceive the God of knowledge to whom the wise-hearted owe their instruction. Set over against each other these two sentences, "Behold, God exalteth by His power; who teacheth like Him?"[†] and "Never man spake like this man."[‡]

It is ever the Lord's way to make His truth known to those of humble and truthful hearts, and so did Jesus teach the sincere and lowly among men. Observe how Jesus dwelt among men, wearing the common smock-frock of the peasant, entering their cottages, and sharing their poverty. Mark how He even washed His disciples' feet. Herein we see the condescension of God, who must stoop to view the skies, and bow to see what angels do, and yet does not disdain to visit the sons of men. In wondrous grace He thinks of us, and has pity upon our low estate. See, too, the Christ of God, my brethren, bearing every day with the taunts of the ungodly, enduring "such contradiction of sinners against Himself," and you have a fair picture of the infinite patience and the marvellous longsuffering of God; and this is no small part of His glory.

Note well how Jesus loved His own which were in the world, yea, loved them to the end, and with what tenderness and gentleness He bore with them, as a nurse with her child; for here you see the tenderness and gentleness of God, and the love of the great Father towards His erring children. You read of Jesus receiving sinners and eating with them, and what is this but the Lord God, merciful and gracious, passing by transgression, iniquity, and sin? You see Jesus living as a physician among those diseased by sin, with the one aim of healing their sicknesses; and here you see the pardoning mercy of our God, His delight in salvation, and the joy which He has in mercy.

What shall I say of His death? Oh never did the love of God reveal itself so clearly as when He laid down His life for His sheep, nor did the justice of God ever flame forth so conspicuously as when he would suffer in Himself the curse for sin rather than sin should go unpunished, and the law should be dishonored. Every attribute of God was focussed at the cross, and he that hath eyes to look through his tears, and see the wounds of Jesus, shall behold more of God there than a whole eternity of providence or an infinity of creation shall ever be able to reveal to him. Well might the trembling centurion, as he watched the cross, exclaim, "Truly this was the Son of God."

Shall I need to remind you, too, of the glory of God in the person of Christ Jesus in His resurrection, when He spoiled principalities and powers, led death captive, and rifled the tomb? That is indeed a godlike speech, "I am He that liveth, and was dead; and behold I am alive for evermore, and have the keys of hell and of death" (Rev. 1 : 18). His power, His immortality, His eternal majesty, all shone forth as He left the shades of death.

I will not linger over His ascension when He returned to His own again. Then His Godhead was conspicuous, for He again put on the glory which He had with the Father or ever the world was. Then amid the acclamations of angels and redeemed spirits the glory of the conquering Lord was seen. By His descent He had destroyed the powers of darkness, and then He ascended that He might fill all things as only God can do.

I would only hint at His session at the right hand of God, for there you know how—

"Adoring saints around Him stand,
And thrones and powers before Him fall;
The God shines gracious through the Man,
And sheds sweet glories on them all."

In heaven they never conceive of Jesus apart from the divine glory which perpetually surrounds Him. No one in heaven doubts His deity, for all fall prostrate before Him, or anon, all seize their harps and wake their strings to the praise of God and the Lamb.

The glory of God will most abundantly be seen in the second advent of our Lord. Whatever of splendor we may expect at the advent, whatever of glory shall surround that reign of a thousand years, or the end when He shall deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father, in every transaction which prophecy leads us to expect, God in Christ Jesus will be conspicuous, and angelic eyes shall look on with adoring admiration as they see the eternal Father glorious in the person of His Son. These are great themes; we do but indicate them, and leave them to your quiet thought. It is enough to point to a table if men have appetites for food.

2. But now I will ask you to think of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, in the same line of thought, only putting it in another fashion. Treat it by way of observation. When you look upon the material universe you can see, if your eyes are opened, somewhat of the glory of God. The reverent mind perceives enough to constrain the heart to worship, and yet after awhile it pines for more. If your mind has ever entered into communion with God, you will become conscious of the dwarfing of all visible things in His presence. Even when your thought sweeps round the stars, and circumnavigates space, you feel that heaven, even the heaven of heavens, cannot contain Him. Every thing conceivable falls short of the inconceivable glory of God.

When you come, however, to gaze upon the face of Christ Jesus, how different is the feeling! Now you have a mirror equal to the reflection of the eternal face, for "In Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." His name is "Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God." He is the image of God; "the brightness of His glory, and the express image of His person." If your conception of Christ be truthful, it will coincide with the true idea of God, and you will exclaim, "This is the true God and eternal life." Like Thomas, you will salute the wounded Saviour with the cry, "My Lord and my God." Truly, "God was manifest in the flesh"—not a part of Him, but God in perfection. In the visible creation we see God's works, but in Christ Jesus we have God Himself, Emmanuel, "God with us." The glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ is most sweetly conspicuous, because you are conscious that not only are God's attributes there, but God Himself is there.

In the person of Jesus we see the glory of God in the veiling of His splendor. The Lord is not eager to display Himself: "Verily Thou art a God that hidest Thyself," said the prophet of old. The world seems to be created rather to hide God than to manifest Him: at least it is certain that even in the grandest displays of His power we may say with Job, "There was the hiding of His power." Though His light is brightness itself, yet it is only the robe which conceals Him. "Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment." If thus God's glory is seen in the field of creation as a light veiled and shaded to suit the human eye, we certainly see the like in the face of Jesus Christ, where every thing is mild and gentle—full of grace as well as truth.

In our Lord Jesus we see the glory of God in the wondrous blending of the attributes. Behold His mercy, for He dies for sinners; but see His justice, for He sits as judge of quick and dead. Observe His immutability, for He is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever; and see His power, for His voice shakes not only earth, but also heaven. See how infinite is His love, fo He espouses His chosen; but how terrible Hi wrath, for He consumes His adversaries. Al the attributes of Deity are in Him: power tha can lull the tempest, and tenderness that ca embrace little children. The character of Chris is a wonderful combination of all perfection making up one perfection; and so we see th glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, for thi is God's glory, that in Him nothing is excessiv and nothing is deficient. He is all that is goo and great: in Him is light, and no darkness a all. Say, is it not so seen in Jesus our Lord?

When I think of God I am led to see His glor in the outgoing of is Hgreat heart; for He i altogether unselfish and unsparingly communicative. We may conceive a period when th Eternal dwelt alone and had not begun to create. He must have been inconceivably blessed but He was not content to be enwrapped withi Himself, and to enjoy perfect bliss alone. H began to create, and probably formed innume able beings long before this world came into e istence; and He did this that He might mult ply beings capable of happiness. He delighte to indulge His heart by deeds of beneficenc manifesting the inherent goodness of His natur

In whatever God is doing He is consulting th happiness of His creatures; being in Himse ndependent of all, He loves to bless others. He is living—we speak with awe in His presence -He is living, even He, not unto Himself, but ving in the lives of others, rejoicing in the joy f His creatures. This is His glory, and is it ot to be seen most evidently in Christ Jesus, who "saved others; Himself He could not save"? Do you not see the great unselfish glory of God n Christ Jesus? When did He ever live unto Himself? What single act of His had a selfish urpose? What word ever sought His own onor? In what deed did He consult His own ggrandizement? Neither in life nor in death id Christ live within Himself: He lived for His people, and died for them. See the glory f God in this!

II. Thus have we spoken of the supremely recious object of Christian knowledge. Secndly, let us spend a few words in noticing f this knowledge. How, and in what respects, o we know the glory of God in the face of Jesus hrist?

Briefly, first. We know it by faith. Upon he testimony of the infallible word we believe and are sure that God is in Christ Jesus. The ord hath spoken and said, "This is my beoved Son, hear ye Him." We accept as a ettled fact the Godhead of the Lord Jesus, and ur soul never permits a question upon it. We know that the Son of God is come, and ath given us an understanding, that we may now Him that is true, and we are in Him that true, even in His Son Jesus Christ. This is he true God, and eternal life."

Knowing our Lord's divinity by faith, we next ave used our perceptive faculty, and by consideration and meditation we perceive that His life urnishes abundant evidence that He was God, for od's glory shines in that life. The more careully we pay attention to the details given us by he four evangelists, the more is our understandng persuaded that no mere man stands before s. If, my brethren, your spiritual nature was et this task, to try and describe how God would ct if He were here, what God would be if He ecame incarnate and dwelt among men—I am ure you would not have been able to imagine he life of Christ; but if some one had brought o you the description given by the evangelists ou would have said, "My task is done: this is ndeed a noble conception of God manifest in he flesh." I do not say that the wise men of his world would suppose God to have thus ehaved, for their suppositions are sure to be he reverse of the simple, unaffected, openearted conduct of Jesus; but this I say, that he pure in heart will at once see that the acts f Christ are like the doings of God. He hath one exactly what a pure intelligence might supose God would have done. The more we have tudied the more we have seen the glory of God n Christ.

And now we have come rather further than this, or we feel an inward consciousness that the Deity s in Christ Jesus. It is not merely that we have elieved it, and that we somewhat perceive it by observation, but we have come into contact with Christ, and have known therefore that He is God. We love Him, and we also love God, and we perceive that these two are one; and the more we love truth and holiness, and love, which re great traits in the character of God, the more we see of these in Christ Jesus. It is by he heart that we know God and Christ, and as our affections are purified we become sensible of God's presence in Christ. Ofttimes when our oul is in rapt fellowship with Jesus we laugh to corn the very thought that our Beloved can be ess than divine.

Moreover, there is one other thing that hath happened to us while we have been looking at our Lord. Blessed be His name, we begin to grow like Him. Our beholding Him has purified the eye which has gazed on His purity: His brightness has helped our eyesight, so that we ee much already, and shall yet see more. The ight of the sun blinds us, but the light of Jesus Christ strengthens the eye. We expect that as we grow in grace we shall behold more and more of God's glory; but we shall see it best in the Well-beloved, even in Christ Jesus our Lord. What a sight of God we shall enjoy in heaven! We are tending that way, and, as we get nearer and nearer, our sight and vision of the glory of God in Christ is every day increased.

III. Thirdly, let us gratefully review of this knowledge. How have we come at it? That brings us to read the text again: "For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." Why did not everybody see the glory of God in Jesus Christ when He was here? It was conspicuous enough. Answer: it mattereth not how brightly the sun shineth among blind men. Now, the human heart is blind, it refuses to see God in creation except after a dim fashion, but it utterly refuses to discern God in Christ, and therefore He is the despised and rejected of men.

Moreover, there is a god of this world, the prince of darkness, and since He hates the light He deepens and confirms the natural darkness of the human mind, lest the light should reach the heart. He blinds men's minds with error and falsehood and foul imaginations, blocking up the windows of the soul either with unclean desires, or with dense ignorance, or with pride. The reason why we did not at one time perceive the glory of God in Christ was because we were blind by nature, and were darkened by the evil one. As only the pure in heart can see God, we, being impure in heart, could not see God in Christ.

What, then, hath happened to us? To eternal grace be endless praise, God Himself hath shined into our hearts: that same God who said "Light be," and light was, hath shined into our hearts. You know creation's story, how all things lay in black darkness. God might have gone on to make a world in darkness if He had pleased, but if He had done so it would have been to us as though it had never been, for we could not have perceived it; therefore He early said, "Let there be light." Now, God's glory in the face of Jesus Christ might have been all there, and we should never have discerned it, and as far as we are concerned it would have been as though it had never been, if the Lord had not entered into us amid the thick darkness and said, "Let there be light."

One thing I want to say to comfort all who believe. Beloved, do you see the glory of God in Christ Jesus? Then let that sight be an evidence to you of your salvation. When our Lord asked His disciples, "Whom do men say that I the Son of man am?" Simon Peter answered, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." Now, note the reply of the Lord Jesus to that confession: "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona; for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto you, but my Father which is in heaven." If thou canst delight in God in Christ Jesus, then remember, "no man can say that Jesus is the Christ but by the Holy Ghost," and thou hast said it, and this morning thou art saying it, and therefore the Holy Ghost has come upon thee. "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God."

IV. So I finish by mentioning, in the fourth place, of this knowledge. There have been considerable debates among the interpreters as to the precise bearing of this text, and some of them think it means that Paul is giving a reason why he preached the Gospel. This makes the verse run thus: "For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, that we might give out again the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." God gave light to the apostles that they might show forth the light of the knowledge of God in the face of Jesus Christ to the nations.

I do not know whether this is the exact run of the text, but I know it is true anyhow. Never is a gleam of light given to any man to hide away, and to spiritual men the great object of their lives, after they have received light, is to reflect that light in all its purity. You must not hoard up the light within yourself; it will not be light to you if you do. Only think of a person when his room is full of sunlight saying to his servant, "Quick, now! Close the shutters, and let us keep this precious light to ourselves." Your room will be in the dark, my friend. So, when a child of God gets the light from Christ's face he must not say, "I shall keep this to myself," for that very desire would shut it out.

No, let the light shine through you; let it shine everywhere. You have the light that you may reflect it. An object which absorbs light is dark, and we call it black; but hang up a reflector in its place when the sun is shining, and it will not appear black: it will be so bright that you will hardly bear to look at it. An object is itself bright in proportion as it sends back the light which it receives. So you shall find, as a Christian, that, if you absorb light into yourself, you will be black, but if you scatter it abroad you yourself shall be brilliant: you shall be changed into the very image of the light which you have received; you shall become a second sun.

I noticed last Sabbath evening, when I came into this pulpit, that, at the angle of the building before me, on the left hand the sun seemed to be setting, and I saw the brightness of his round face, and yet I knew it to be the wrong quarter of the heavens for the sun to be setting there. Perhaps you will observe that there is a peculiar window on the other side of the street, and it was reflecting the sun so well that I thought it was the sun himself, and I could hardly bear the light. It was not the sun, it was only a window, and yet the radiance was dazzling; and so a man of God, when he receives the light of Christ, can become so perfect a reflector that to common eyes, at any rate, he is brightness itself. He has become transformed from glory to glory as by the image of the Lord.

Brothers and sisters, if you have learned the truth, manifest it, and make it plain to others. Proclaim the Gospel, not your own thoughts; for it is Christ that you are to make manifest. Teach, not your own judgments, and conclusions, and opinions, but the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Let Jesus manifest Himself in His own light; do not cast a light on him, or attempt to show the sun with a candle. Do not aim at converting men to your views, but let the light shine for itself and work its own way. Do not color it by being like a painted window to it, but let the clear white light shine through you that others may behold your Lord Scatter your light in all unselfishness. Wish to shine, not that others may say, "How bright He is!" but that they getting the light may rejoice in the source from which it came to you and to them. Be willing to make every sacrifice to spread this light which you have received. Consecrate your entire being to the making known among the sons of men the glory of Christ. Oh! I would we had swift messengers to run the world over to tell the story that God has come down among us. I wish we had fluent tongues to tell in every language the story that, coming down among us, God was arrayed in flesh like to our own, and that He took our sins and carried our sorrows.

Tell it, brother, with broken accents, if thou canst not speak it more powerfully. Whisper it, sister, gently whisper, if to none other yet to thy little children, and make the name of "Emmanuel, God with us," to be sweet in thine infant's ears. Thou art growing in strength and talent, young man; come, consecrate thyself to this. And thou, graybeard, ere thou dost lie down on thy last bed to breathe out thy spirit, tell the love of Jesus to thy sons that they may tell it to their sons, and hand it down to coming generations, that mankind may never forget that the "Word was made flesh and dwelt among us, and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." God bless you. Amen.

AN ADDRESS TO CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

By Mr. D. L. Moody, at Cooper Union, Sept. 30.

A high Mission—The Work of the Ministry needs Supplementing—Critics in the Church—Three Classes—Critics—Sponges—Workers—Knowledge without Zeal—Weak Things Needed—Millionaires not the Want of the Church—The Lamb the Lion of the Tribe of Judah—Sensational Preachers not to be Despised—No God-given Work is Little—The best Day's Work of an Apostle—A Chicago Perjurer giving himself up—God's Work a Privilege, not a Duty.

THERE may be some in the audience who wonder why we have not proclaimed the Gospel in these meetings to-day. But the object of the meetings has been to stir up men of God to renewed energy and strength in the future, and I think that is even a greater work than the other. If I had my choice whether I would say something that should be the means of saving a soul from death, or might say something which would stir up a Christian worker to go out and rescue ten souls, I would not hesitate a moment.

To arouse the Christian Church to a sense of its duty and to induce Christian men to go out and work for their Master, is one of the highest missions open to man. An anxious church is sure to bring anxious inquirers, but a cold and dead church is dead for the work of the Lord.

Very few men are converted under sermons: I have hardly ever met one who was. Men are awakened under a sermon, and then is the time for the Christian to speak, to plead, and to pray until the anxious soul finds peace. Do not forget that the precious, the useful work, often begins when the sermon is just over. I believe the usefulness of many a sermon has been lost altogether by the congregation getting up directly it was over and beginning to talk about worldly matters. There has not been that support, that holding up of the hands of the ministry by the church that there ought to be and used to be. That is the reason why we were anxious to get the hall full of young men to-night.

There is much to be done in the Master's service besides preaching. That man who went down from Jerusalem to Jericho and fell among thieves was not in need of a sermon; he wanted kindness, and there is many a man in New York to-night who needs it just as much. He needs for some one to take him by the hand and pity and help him. He does not need to have some one draw out a long roll of manuscript and preach to him. The priest in the parable when he saw the poor wounded man would no doubt say, "I am very sorry for him; it was a great pity he came this way; he ought to have known there were thieves down here; he should have stayed up in Jerusalem." But that was no help to the robbed and wounded man. The Samaritan when he came took him up and bore him out of the reach of harm and saw to his future condition. That is the work of the church.

HOLDING ALOOF.

There are always plenty of people to hold aloof from work. Men who would have said at the grave of Lazarus, "What is the use of raising him? He will have to die again." I have known men say, "What is the use trying to rescue the drunkard? He will fall under the curse again. I have known men who kept their pledge for five years and who fell again after that." Well, what if they did? You may depend their wives had a good time those five years at any rate.

There are always people ready to do the criticism; it needs no brains for that business. I never did a thing in my life that I could not sit down and find fault with it myself. But I am not going to hide my talent in the earth because a man down there has five and I have only one or two. I want to use the talents I have got, and I am not responsible for those which have not been given me. If I make good use of those I have got, perhaps the Lord will lend me a few more.

Let us each do the work of the Lord, keeping our eyes on our work and not turning aside to find faults and failings of others. They may not be working our way; but what of that, if they are doing the Lord's work? We want the devils cast out, but we need not care who casts them out.

There are

in the church. First, the formalists, who criticise. They say we can have nothing to do with these evangelists; we must maintain dignity and order in our services. These are the same class of people who cried out, "Crucify Him; crucify Him." They resented the preaching of the Nazarene, and they objected to His unorthodox sermons, and the crowds who followed Him about, and his ignorant disciples who were not of the scribes and Pharisees.

Then there are the sponges. They take all the comfort they can get, but give out nothing. They are going to meetings all the time, listening to sermons, but you can never get them to work. They do not teach in our Sunday-schools, they will not visit the sick.

The third is the class we want—the Christian workers. All the while the minister is preaching they are praying for the Spirit of God to carry the truth to the hearts of sinners. After the service they are looking out for some one to speak to and to make a personal appeal. A minister who has a hundred such workers in his congregation will revolutionize the part of the city he works in. The trouble is not so much in getting men to hear the Gospel as in getting men to work.

We hear much of those who show zeal without knowledge, but I had a thousand times rather have zeal without knowledge than knowledge without zeal. We must learn never to despise the weakest workers in the Master's service. God chooses the weak things; God uses the foolish things. We want to have the wise and the strong, and we are not content to follow God's plan, for God often passes over the wise.

If you had asked the men of other days who were the great men of the time, they would not have pointed you to John Bunyan or to Luther, to Abraham, to Enoch, or to Noah. John Bunyan got shut up in Bedford gaol, but the devil found his match when he laid John Bunyan up there. We should never have had the "Pilgrim's Progress" if it had not been that John Bunyan had leisure in his cell to write his wonderful dream.

The millionaires are not the workers in the church; God passes by them. If they are converted they are not used; God passes them by, and takes up some poor tramp. Even Paul said his strength lay in his great weakness.

We read there is no weeping in heaven; but John wept as he heard of the book with seven seals, which no man was found worthy to open. Paul was there, who had done distinguished service in founding the early church; but he was not worthy to open that book. Enoch, who had walked with God; but he was not found worthy. Abraham; but still not worthy, though he was the father of the faithful. Elijah; but not worthy. And John wept much; but he was touched on the side, and was told that "the Lion of the Tribe of Judah had prevailed" to open the book. John turned to see who was this mighty conqueror who had prevailed, and lo! he saw a Lamb slain. A lamb, the weakest of the animals—a lamb as it had been slain had done this work of the lion.

The great man often does not want to be set to work. He is so afraid of enthusiasm. He is afraid he will be called a fanatic. We must not mind that. We want more life, more fire, more enthusiasm in the church.

Then there are people who cry out over sensational preaching. They should have heard John the Baptist. I venture to say he was the most sensational preacher of his time. If he were preaching in the present day there are many who would condemn him as a sensational preacher.

Our duty is to hold up Christ, whatever name men may call us by; and if some of our converts do go back to the world, are we to stop preaching on that account? I venture to say there was not half so much excitement at the Hippodrome during our meetings as there was lately at the Madison Garden to see which of half a dozen men could walk the fastest. There were many willing to work hard all the week and then get up early on Sunday morning to read the account of the match in the Sunday newspaper, and then go to church and sleep half through the sermon.

Nothing is going to keep

but work. Show me the working Christian, and I will show you the healthy Christian. The trouble is that we want to do some great work, but let us never forget that any thing God sets us to do must not be called little.

I remember staying at a house where there was a young lady who was a Sunday-school teacher. I was surprised to see her at our Sunday-afternoon meeting. I said to her, "How was it you were there?" She said, "I have only five little boys, and I thought they would not matter for once." "Did you send any one in your place?" I asked. "No," she said. "Did you let the superintendent know?" "No, there are only five little boys, and they would be managed somehow." Five little boys! Call that a small work! Why, there might have been a Martin Luther among them!

That was the very best day's work Andrew ever did when "he first found his own brother Simon and brought him to Christ." We do not read of much else that Andrew did, but at the day of Pentecost, when all those souls were gathered in—his grandchildren—he must have been glad over that day's work.

A PERJURER RECLAIMED.

We had a men's meeting at Chicago som time since, and one of the workers said to me "I wish you would come and speak to a ma here; I can do nothing with him." I went an found the man greatly agitated. I found he ha something on his mind that prevented the trut getting admission, and I pressed him to unburde it. He said, "Let me speak to you alone." H took him into a room and he told me all. H said, "I am a perjured man. I was tried f robbing an Express Company, but I bore a goo reputation, and I gave my evidence to the sati faction of the court, and I was discharged. But was guilty, guilty. THE COMING TRANSLATION.

By Rev. Henry Varley.

eavenly Citizenship—The Church Caught Up Seven Years before the Judgment—The Three Assizes of Judgment—Christ in the Synagogue —The Antichrist.

THE saints living at the time of Christ's comg will be translated suddenly. The salt of the rth, the light of the world, will be suddenly ken away. The law of gravitation keeps me ere on this platform, but the moment Christ mes I shall be caught up to meet Him in the r. Read Phil. 3 : 20, 21 : "For our (citizenip) conversation is in heaven, from whence so we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus hrist."

Our citizenship is not in London, not in Melurne, but in heaven. He shall change our le body that it may be fashioned like unto His orious body, according to the working where He is able even to subdue all things to Himlf. Dean Alford suggests the "body of our ımiliation" instead of vile body. He is able subdue all things to Himself. We have probly no conception of our first parents' beauty efore the fall, humiliated as we are by sin and ickedness, and liable to all the ills that flesh is eir to by reason of sin.

"He shall change our vile bodies." It will accomplished in a moment, in the twinkling an eye—it will compare in the quickness of s accomplishment to the flash of lightning. When this corruptible puts on incorruption, d this mortal puts on immortality," Christ is ur great centre of attraction. The law of gravation holds me where I am ; but when Christ omes, the spiritual law of membership in Christ ill gather us into the heavens. When we are one, what then ? The world still goes on ; hurches are left ; Bibles will be still here ; but, ark, the Church of God will be gone.

Then understand how the platform will be eared for the last few years of this world's history. Indelity will then have its sway on earth. As ertain as this book is true, man has asked God let him alone, and he will yet have a taste of hat human power can do unrestrained by the race and fear of God. The carnage which is ow decimating the population of the earth in arious parts may be the first sound of the fulling of the time when nations shall be onsumed of nations. How striking ! nations evouring one another, and disease sweeping hem down. I ask you to be on the alert. Of hat day and hour knoweth no man. But of the mes and seasons we are bound to know them.

Then will follow a scene which I venture to hink is about seven years after the Church has een taken up. Turn to 2 Thess. 1 : 7 : "When he Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven ith His mighty angels, in flaming fire taking engeance upon them that know not God," etc. ead 1 Thes. 4. Here we have otally dissimilar. Where do you get the coming f Christ for His Church ? In the first epistle, he fourth chapter, He comes for the Church. In the second epistle, and the first chapter, He comes with His Church.

They will have been carried to the bridal city, the bride which John saw coming out of heaven adorned for her husband. The Bride's incorruptible life and beauty is not for earth, but for the "prepared place," reserved in heaven for you. John 14 : 3. After that great union of the Church with Christ, we dwell not on earth but in His glorious home. The Church has gone ! The world goes on for a few brief years, but I would rather die ten times over, were it possible, than be on the earth when those judgments spoken of in Revelation, from chapters 6 to 19—all, as I believe, in their chief real fulfilment yet future—shall come.

I do not wonder at Christ saying, "So walk that ye may be accounted worthy to escape the things that are coming upon the earth." Notice that we come with Him. How do we prove that? Specially see Jude 14–15. Read 1 Cor. 6 : 1, 2 : "Having a matter one against another, dare ye go to law before the unjust, and not before the saints ? Do you not know that the saints shall judge the world ? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters ? Know ye not that ye shall judge angels, how much more things pertaining to this life ?"

But I believe some of you thought you were to be tried at the end of this life ? Then how comes it that we are

UPON THE JUDGMENT-SEAT ?

"Know ye not that the saints shall judge the world ?" It is perfectly clear. Where is there reference made to it ? The Scriptures declare three assizes of judgment. First, His own people in His presence at the judgment-seat of Christ (2 Cor. 5 : 10). The second is referred to in Matt. 25 : Christ's judgment of the living Gentile nation ; it has nothing to do with the dead, but the living Gentile nations (Christendom).

THE THIRD JUDGMENT

we have in Rev. 20 : the judgment of the great white throne. Remember the saints are distinctly told that they will judge angels and the world also. 1 Cor. 6 : 2, 3 : Christ said, "Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things." 2 Cor. 5 : 10 : "We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad."

There are some of God's children who will have their works burnt up. If you are faithful from the time of your conversion till the close of your life, be assured of this, that in eternity your reward will be not only of unutterable enjoyments, but as kings unto God. Our faithfulness here will advance us to high positions in the future glory.

In concluding this important thought let us refer again to 2 Thess. 1 : 7, 8 : "And to you who are troubled, rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." What a terrible thing persecution is, and how it arouses in us a spirit of vengeance if we allow our evil natures to avenge ourselves ! There is nothing the Lord Jesus Christ so entirely enforces as the absence of that in us : "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord." The Lord rebuked His disciples when they wanted to call down fire from heaven (Luke 9 : 54).

Let us now notice an exceedingly that possibly has escaped your observation. The Lord Jesus goes into the synagogue at Nazareth. Luke 4 : 16 : "And He came to Nazareth, where He had been brought up, and, as His custom was, He went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day, and stood up for to read. And there was delivered unto Him the book of the prophet Esaias.

"And when He had opened the book, He found the place where it was written. The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because He hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor ; He hath sent Me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord. And he closed the book, and He gave it again to the minister and sat down." Turn to the chapter Christ quotes from, Isaiah 61. Following the prophecy quoted by Christ, see the second verse : "And the day of vengeance of our God." Does Christ say a word about vengeance ? No, not a word. He closed the book abruptly, gave it to the minister, and sat down, saying, "This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears."

When the Lord came before He came as the Lamb of God, the Saviour, to declare the mercy of God, to make known the free proclamation of pardon to the sons of men ; there was neither wrath nor vengeance, but, in His days, "peace on earth, good-will to men."

A SINGLE COMMA

divides the day of salvation now closing from the day of vengeance speedily coming. What says 2 Thess. 1 : 7 ? "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of His power, when He shall come to be glorified in His saints, and to be admired in all them that believe."

These are solemn words, and I remind you they are not mine. I am thankful to be able to put before you these testimonies that cannot be confuted—testimonies of the Word of the living God. Now I will point you to the close of this age. Read 2 Thess. 2 : 1 : "Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto Him." Mark the words : "By the coming of our Lord, and by our gathering together unto Him." It is really astonishing to read the New Testament and see how full it is of the great truth of the Lord's coming for His people. Again : "That ye be not shaken in mind, or troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, that the day of the Lord is [already come] at hand." This is not the correct rendering. Dean Alford has it : "The day of Christ is come."

A great many persons said that the day of Christ's coming had passed, and they thought they had missed His glorious calling. Says Paul, "Let no man deceive you by any means : for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and be revealed, the son of perdition ; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped ; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." This is not Popery. Popery has never denied the Father and the Son. I believe the Papal system an Antichrist, but not the Antichrist.

That infidelity will be headed up in a man known in Scriptures as "the man of sin" before the dispensation closes, I have no doubt. 2 Thess. 2 : 5, 6, 7 : "Remember ye not, that, when I was yet with you, I told you these things ? And now ye know what withholdeth that He might be revealed in His time. For the mystery of iniquity doth already work : only he who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way." The taking away of the Church is the thought here expressed. Then that wicked one will be revealed, whom "the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming." Not by the preaching of the Gospel, but by "the brightness of His coming."

The American Bible Society has been printing its ten-cent Testament the past year at the rate of one thousand copies a day, but has been unable to keep up with its orders. Its twenty-five-cent Bible has also been struck off at the rate of five hundred and fifty per day.

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

A DISAPPOINTMENT.

NEVER had Edith felt more weary than she did as that night closed in, and never before had she passed a night more sleepless. Effie, indeed, fell repeatedly into that slumber which exhaustion produced, but the nearness of her room to the depot prevented her from having any thing deserving the name of repose.

The noise of arrivals or departures, the rumble of carts through the streets, nay the very striking of church-clocks, made her start up from her pillow in feverish excitement. Effie had removed only her bonnet before stretching herself on the bed, so fearful was she lest she should oversleep herself, and so miss the early train.

If Edith's heavy eyelids closed for a while, she was almost instantly roused by Effie's convulsive grasp, or her anxious whisper,

"Miss Temple, I'm sure that the day is breaking!"

So nervously impatient was Effie to depart that it still wanted many minutes to four when she and her patient, pitying companion entered the second-class waiting-room, ready to take their tickets as soon as the sleepy official should push back the sliding-panel. It was better to wait at the depot than in the hotel, for Effie regained her calmness when she felt secure, by being on the spot, that the morning train could not start without her.

At that early hour the two travellers found the waiting-room perfectly empty; not even the usual attendant was there. There was little movement or noise at the depot. Now and then a porter with luggage passed by the window, and a guard who had been on night duty exchanged a yawning greeting with another who had come to take his place on the platform.

The sun had not yet risen, but dull lines of red appeared on the smoke-tinted sky. The morning air felt fresh, almost cool; the hurry and rush, the heat and confusion of the London day had not yet begun. It was a more restful time both to Edith and Effie than they had known since leaving the farm on the previous day.

The lady seated herself near the table on which their small amount of luggage was placed, took out her little Testament, and commenced her morning reading by the gradually strengthening light. The eyes of Effie rested on one of those collections of texts in large type which Christian thoughtfulness has placed on the walls of so many railroad-depot apartments.

The poor girl had no inclination to open and read a book, but the single text on which she gazed found its way to her soul. Thus the weary traveller, too much exhausted to draw water from a well to relieve his own thirst, may thankfully drink the single cupful brought from the spring by the hand of a stranger.

"How can that be true?" said Effie to herself, hardly conscious that she spoke the sentence aloud.

Edith looked up from her reading, and following the direction of Effie's eyes, saw that they were fixed on the words, For we have not an High Priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are, and yet without sin (Heb. 4:15).

"In all points!" repeated Effie; "surely that is impossible! The Holy One can never have known temptations in the heart in the least like those which have come to me, a weak silly woman, or even such as have come to my Robert."

"Do you remember a little conversation which we had together shortly before your marriage?" asked Edith Temple.

"Do I not remember it!" sighed Effie; "have I not often thought of the question which you put to me when I wished that I—that all—had been born in Paradise, each to stand or fall by keeping or breaking God's law for himself, Do you think that you would have kept obedient, Effie?

"Oh! I thought that I should—I thought that I could; I know better now—I know better." Effie ended the sentence with a gasp like a sob.

"Perhaps you also remember," said the lady, soothingly, "my attempt to explain that it is far, far better for God's children that their Heaven depends not on their own imperfect obedience, but on faith in Him who cannot fall, who cannot sin, our ever blessed Redeemer."

"But if the Lord could not sin, how could He be tempted?" asked Effie quickly.

Edith was thankful that the mind of her poor young companion could be drawn from its own sorrows; and though she herself felt almost too weary for converse on subjects mysterious and deep, she encouraged Effie to go on.

"I can a little understand," continued the young wife, "why the Lord suffered pain and death. He suffered instead of sinners; He took their punishment on Himself; but as for His being tempted like as we are, I can neither understand why that was needful, nor how it could be possible."

"It is not for us to understand all the 'needs be' in God's dealings with us," replied Edith; "but it seems that there is a fitness in this which may be made plain even to our feeble minds. Satan's tempting our first parents in Paradise was a kind of struggle between the Devil and Man. Satan had the victory then, for Man fell under temptation. When our Lord took our nature upon Him, can we wonder that Satan should again try his strength against Man, that there should be a second struggle, in which the God-Man, standing firm as a rock under temptation, should overcome the enemy and triumph, as all Christ's followers shall triumph at last?"

"There does seem a fitness that Satan, who conquered the first Adam, should be conquered by Him who is called in the Bible the second Adam," said Effie; "but this does not explain to me how the Lord could be tempted in all points like as we are. I am sure that the Holy Saviour's temptations were never like mine."

"Perhaps you would think that Eve's temptations were not like yours," said Edith.

"No more were they," replied Effie simply. "Eve was never tempted—could not be tempted—to covet fine clothes, nor to open a letter meant for her husband."

"And yet you may remember, Effie, that Eve's temptation may be divided into exactly those three things of the world, against which St. John warns us—the lust of the flesh (sinful pleasure); the lust of the eyes (covetousness); and the pride of life, which assails us in so many forms."

"Ah! I remember that you explained all that," said Effie. "Yes, yes, my temptations were more like Eve's than I thought. I plucked my forbidden fruit over and over again. Pride, love of pleasure, covetousness, to all, to all I gave way!" Effie drooped her head and sighed deeply.

"Now we may well believe," observed Edith Temple, "that Satan often tempted our Lord whilst He dwelt upon earth; but of one great temptation we are given an account in the Gospel. That temptation, like Eve's, may be divided into those same three things which are of the world, namely, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life."

Effie looked up in surprise. "The account of Christ's temptation is to me one of the most difficult parts of the Bible," said she. "When Satan asked the Lord to turn stones into bread, surely the Tempter asked Him to do nothing that was wrong! What harm could there possibly be either in the Lord's making the food, or in eating it, when He was hungry?"

"The lust of the flesh came to the Holy One in its most simple and innocent form," said Edith, "the natural desire to satisfy hunger."

"And why should not the Lord satisfy it?" asked Effie.

"Our Lord came to earth to suffer, and to be our example," answered the lady. "Christ's example of patience under trials would have been no help to us if His sufferings had not been real. If Christ's needy servants remember now that He whose footsteps they follow, once, like themselves, was faint for lack of food, where would be their comfort in the thought of this if they could say to themselves, 'Christ, indeed, was hungry, but then He turned stones into bread, and I have no power so to turn them. Christ's sufferings from want were not real like mine, for He ended them as soon as He felt them.' Have you not noticed, Effie, that our Lord never once worked a miracle to relieve His own hunger or thirst? Christ waited, patiently waited, just as His people should wait, until His Heavenly Father saw it good to send Him relief."

"I see, yes, I see what you mean," said Effie; "Christ's hunger was real, was painful. He longed for food, but withstood the great temptation to make it, and so conquered the lust of the flesh. But the pride of life," she continued, "how could the Lord ever be tempted by that?"

"When He stood on the pinnacle of the splendid Temple, while the people worshipped below, and was tempted to descend amongst them, as if from the sky, borne up by invisible angels. Was there nothing to gratify human pride in such a glorious beginning to His ministry as this would have seemed?

"We must never forget that Christ was Man as well as God. It would have been but human to shrink from being despised and rejected, scorne as a carpenter's son. Would not natural prid (had Christ not conquered that pride) have le Him to appear before the Jews in such a way a must have shown them that He truly came dow from heaven?"

"It must have been a great temptation," sai Effie, thoughtfully; "I never understood it be fore. And the last temptation was to covet th kingdoms of the world and all their glory."

"And to obtain them by doing what wa sinful," added Miss Temple. "Never again wa such a temptation offered to the eye of man a when all that earth could give was shown in moment of time to our blessed Redeemer."

"But surely all the kingdoms of the wor were Christ's already," said Effie.

"After He should have endured the cross replied Edith. "Remember that every tempt tion to the Saviour was a temptation to esca some cross from which His human natu shrank, even as our human nature shrinks; t cross of want, the cross of shame, the cross unutterable anguish!

"Self-denial cost the Saviour more than o minds can conceive; but we can dimly see a pa of what it must have cost Him. Self-denial resisting temptation in any or all of its form self-denial is taking up the cross; self-denial conquering Satan."

"I have practised self-denial in nothing murmured poor Effie. "I have given free to my pride, covetousness, and love of pleasu I have followed the example of Eve, and not t example of Christ, and so I have brought on m self the misery which I now justly suffer."

"You have not yet won the victory, d Effie; but the battle is not over yet," said Ed kindly, laying her hand on that of her you companion. "You may yet say to Satan, l Christian in 'Pilgrim's Progress,' 'Rejoice against me, O mine enemy: when I fall, I s arise; when I sit in darkness, the Lord shall light unto me' (Micah 7:8)."

"Oh, do you think that God will give another trial, and make me happy again?" as Effie, raising her wistful eyes to the face of friend.

"I am certain that God is ready to grant giveness for the past, and grace for the fut in answer to prayer," replied Edith. "You only beginning to feel and know that life is rest in an earthly Paradise, but a struggle, a flict, and that in ourselves we are too wea overcome the strength of temptation.

"But the Christian is not left to hims God is ready to give us His Holy Spirit: and it shall be given. Christ, who Himself quered Satan, can make us more than conque also, and will at the last fulfil to His fait ones His own glorious promise—To him ercometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, hich is in the midst of the Paradise of God."

The entrance of strangers now put a stop to e conversation, but it had left a soothing and eering impression on Effie's mind. It was so mforting to be assured that the High and Holy ne who inhabiteth eternity knows from His vn experience the trial of strong temptation; at He had felt·longings which He had not sat- ied, had realized the difficulty of self-denial, d could sympathize with the struggle against even in the heart of a poor weak woman.

It was in a far more submissive and peaceful me of mind than she had known since her eat trouble, that Effie soon afterwards took r seat beside Miss Temple in the train that as to bear them to Southampton.

London itself is scarcely a more bustling, isy, distracting place than a large seaport town ch as Southampton. It was no easy task for e two tired travellers to make their way along e narrow streets.

Here they were jostled by a party of sailors shore "for a spree;" there a group of Lascars structed their passage, jabbering amongst emselves in foreign tongues, and with violent sticulations complaining of some wrong done them by those whose language they could not derstand.

Parties of dirty, bonnetless women with un- mbed hair, and Jack-tars with pipe in mouth, stered around gin palaces, or shops for the e of marine stores, or pawnbrokers' tempting ndows. The strong scent of tar, the distant und of the "yo-e-yo!" of sailors working at the ndlass, the nautical signs of the public-houses, placards advertising for able-bodied seamen, announcing when some "fast-sailing clipper" uld start, showed the near neighborhood of sea, even in those parts of the town from ich no glimpse could be gained of its gleam- waves, or the masts in the crowded harbor.

dith drew Effie's arm within her own, and eaded her way onwards towards the port, ciously looking on either side of the streets ough which they passed for any office where y would be likely to gain the information ich they required.

large shipping office at length offered itself her view. Miss Temple entered with Effie, l addressing a clerk who was seated behind a h desk, inquired whether he could give her information regarding a ship of the name of y Queen.

imply as Edith was dressed, the clerk at e recognized in her a lady, and addressed her such. Glancing at a large placard placed op- ite the place where he sat, on which the ne of the vessel appeared, "Do you mean May Queen emigrant steam-vessel, bound Australia, madam?" said he.

'I do not know whither the ship is bound, probably this is the ship of which we are quest," replied Edith. "This young person's band is likely to be sailing in that vessel; is very anxious to see him before he starts."

'I fear, madam, that she is too late," said clerk, looking at the large clock in the ce. "The May Queen was to leave her moor- s at seven o'clock this morning." Edith felt arm locked within her own tremble as if with e.

'There may be some other vessel of the same ne," suggested Edith.

'None other at this port," replied the clerk; ut it is possible that the steamer's starting y have been delayed. Delays often occur," added, looking with kindly interest and pity Effie. "If you wait a second, madam, I will w you the way to the place off which the sel was moored last evening."

he courteous clerk put on his hat, and led way quickly, but not half quickly enough the impatience of those who followed. They t on till a sudden turn brought them, not, eed, to the shore, but in sight of the wide ving expanse of the sea, glittering in the beams as if strewn over with brilliants.

FAITH AND WORK.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 26. James 2 : 14-26. Golden Text, ver. 26. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

SOME writers have designated Paul as the apostle of faith, and James as the apostle of works. Perhaps it would be more just to say that the former teaches by the Holy Ghost faith in doctrine, and the latter faith in practice. The apostle James, when in chap. 1 : 2 he calls us to "count it all joy when we fall into divers temptations" (or trials), is calling upon us most truly to "walk by faith, not by sight," for he does not imply that it is enough to recognize God's hand when the trial has ceased, but it is to be when we fall, etc., at the very time we are suffering from the trial, because we see in it God's means of working patience. Again, when he exhorts us, ver. 5-7, to ask of God wisdom, he enjoins us to "ask in faith, nothing wavering, for he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed. For let not that man think he shall receive any thing of the Lord." Here is faith in its strongest form, a looking away from self to God, to seek only Him as our resource. This is no counting upon works or efforts of our own.

It is this apostle who exhorts those who are sick among the children of God (instead of resorting to human help) to seek healing alone from God. "Is any sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins they shall be forgiven him." If the sickness has been brought about by sin in any form, there shall be forgiveness accompanying the healing. "Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed." And after this encouragement to walk in the way of faith for body as well as soul, this apostle cites the example of Elijah, "a man subject to like passions as we are, and yet so mighty in his expectation from God" (chap. 5 : 14-18).

All this is proof clear enough that the apostle James was no legalist, but what he insisted on was that faith must not remain a mere dead doctrine, an abstract thing; that when it is real it must bring forth fruit, just as Paul, the great apostle of faith, himself teaches us (Gal. 5 : 6), "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh by love." "Faith which worketh." A man may have a faith which assents unhesitatingly to all which is written in God's word, and may be able to propound all Christian doctrine with the utmost clearness; but, because the truth has never been a power upon his own soul, and has established no link between him and God, he has no yearning of heart over poor lost sinners, and no jealousy for God's glory.

The apostle James seems to doubt the reality of a faith without works: "What doth it profit, my brethren, though a man say he have faith and have not works? Can faith save him?" Oh! it is a poor faith which stands only in the assertion of him who professes it. Such was the faith of a Balaam, who was ready, nevertheless, to curse God's people for a little earthly advantage; such was the faith of a Judas, who could sell his Lord and Saviour for thirty pieces of silver; such the faith of a Simon, who could think that the gift of God could be purchased with money (Acts 8 : 20). No love to God or man was perceptible in these three; their very faith was made to subserve their own interests, and it did not save them.

Oh! when will men understand that we are created for God and not for ourselves; that our normal position as created beings, our blessed privilege as redeemed, is that we should serve His purpose, and not that He should serve ours? We are created to love, and redeemed to love, and sanctified to love—i.e., to lose ourselves in the object of our love; and a faith which does not work by love is a malformation, unhealthy, and tending to death. The apostle supposes any one saying to a person in extreme need, "Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled," and yet failing to render them any practical assistance. "What doth it profit?" he asks; and concludes, "Even so, faith if it hath not works is dead, being alone."

He then supposes a position which has been all too painfully realized among nominal Christians: "Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith and I have works: show me thy faith without thy works, and I (who do not profess to have any faith) will show thee my faith by my works." There are numbers of honest-minded rationalists in our days who are just in this position. Following the bent of hearts naturally generous, they do good in many ways, and are forward in works of benevolence without making any profession of and without understanding the faith which, if the Bible is true, ought to make men Christlike. They hear men talk of faith in Christ, and sometimes see such men descend to acts of meanness, unrighteousness, and selfishness, which they themselves would repudiate and scorn, and their challenge is an honest one, although made often in the pride of their hearts; "Show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works."

They are wrong as far as themselves are concerned, because "without faith it is impossible to please him," and they have not the witness of Abel, "that he was righteous," through the blood of the sacrifice, nor of Enoch, "that he pleased God" (Heb. 11 : 4, 5); they are truly justified before men, but not before God, for "by the deeds of the law, there shall no flesh be justified in His sight" (Rom. 3 : 20.) But they are right as far as unfruitful professors are concerned. "By their fruits ye shall know them," says our Lord (Matt. 7 : 20). And how fearful is the responsibility of those who have outwardly professed faith in the atoning blood of Christ, and have taken their stand among believers, while the unbelieving are led to the conclusion, by their very lack of zeal and holiness, that Christianity is but one of the opinions of the day, to take its rank with Buddhism and with Mohammedanism!

The apostle carries his point yet further: "Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well; the devils also believe and tremble;" as though he would add, And thou dost not even tremble. "But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?" Some boast of their faith as though it were a credit to themselves, forgetting that the very conviction of sin, and righteousness, and judgment is the work of the Holy Ghost, whose purpose certainly never was to leave us with only such a faith as the very devils participate.

He urges the case of Abraham as one who was justified by works, not indeed independently of faith: "Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect?" In Gen. 15 : 5, 6, God brought him forth abroad, and said, "Look now toward heaven and tell the stars if thou be able to number them. And He said unto him, So shall thy seed be. And he believed in the Lord, and He counted it to him for righteousness."

And when the Word of God tells us that we are not of the world, even as Christ was not of the world, and we see no possibility of living in daily contact with those whose whole thoughts and aim in life are of the earth earthy, and to maintain in their very midst the spirit of our Master, God calls us, like Abraham, to stagger not at the promise of God through unbelief, but to believe that what He has promised He is able also to perform. He has pledged Himself to be our Keeper, and to doubt or to fear is to wrong Him. But He calls for works as an evidence of our faith, for a fearless taking His side, without considering the reproach it may and will bring upon us, only being fully persuaded of God's will and then doing it, cost what it may. Rahab is also adduced as an example of faith in practice when she was bold enough to hide the spies at the risk of her own life, believing in the God of Israel, who was pledged to preserve her and her father's house.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Troubles in Ireland.—The "Pall Mall Gazette," in its leading article of September 30th, says the complaints of the Irish tenant-farmers are mostly genuine; that they are for the moment unable to pay their rent; and that they think they have a right to remain on the land in every event. They are under the influence of a shallow noisy politician, a member of Parliament named Parnell, who incites them to stick to their homesteads at whatever consequence. If the general refusal to pay rent is followed by a wholesale eviction, this will almost certainly be followed by a series of agrarian murders; and unless the Irish executive is prepared to support the landlords by measures amounting to little less than a military occupation of a large part of the country, the landlords will have to choose between virtually conceding the tenant's claim to fixity of tenure, and giving the signal for an outbreak of something hardly distinguishable from civil war. The English Government have given orders to several cavalry regiments to hold themselves in readiness for service in Ireland.

Dr. Barclay, the Recently Consecrated Bishop of Jerusalem, when a mere child, showed an extraordinary interest in the conversion of the Jews. He often said to his parents, "When I am a man I will be a clergyman and preach to the Jews, and try and convince them that Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah." He kept his promise. After graduating from one of the English universities, he was ordained to the ministry and began his labors among the Israelites. So successful was he in his work that he was soon appointed Superintendent of the Church of England Missions to the Jews on the Continent. Afterwards he succeeded to the incumbency of Christ Church, Jerusalem. In that city he had the opportunity of becoming an Oriental scholar. At the end of a ten years' laborious pastorate in Jerusalem he resigned his charge and returned to England. In London he became acquainted with Mr. Gladstone, Lords Shaftesbury and Beaconsfield, and the late Lord Chancellor. On the death of Bishop Gobat, Dr. Barclay was recommended to the Queen for the vacant Bishopric of Jerusalem.

Ready at the Summons.—Not Long Ago a youth of eighteen, son of a clergyman in the west of England, went out on the beach in search of sea-weeds. Pursuing his walk, unconscious of all but his immediate object, he discovered that the tide had flowed in, and that he was inclosed between the cliffs and the advancing waters. Taking out his pocket Bible he wrote on a fly-leaf as follows: "In danger—surrounded by water; if help does not speedily arrive I must be drowned. But Jesus, to whom I gave myself five years ago, is with me. I am perfectly happy. May He bless and comfort my beloved parents, and bring my dear little brothers and sisters to Himself, so that we may all meet in heaven!" The body of the dear lad was discovered next day, and the Bible was taken from the pocket of his coat.

"Forgive us our Trespasses."—The story is told of a certain nobleman of Alexandria, who complained bitterly to the bishop of that city of his enemies. While in the midst of his tale the bell sounded for prayers, and bishop and nobleman dropped to their knees, the former leading in the Lord's Prayer, and the latter leaving for the time his story untold. When the bishop came to the petition, "Forgive us our trespasses," he stopped suddenly, leaving the other to go on alone. The nobleman attempted to continue, but, startled by the sound of his own unaccompanied voice and recalled by his companion's silence to the significance of the petition, stammered, ceased praying, and rose from his knees, a hopeless man — until he afterwards found hope in a better disposition toward his neighbor. It is an easy thing to say, "Forgive us our trespasses" by rote; it is difficult, sometimes, to say it understandingly. If we stop at this petition until we have taken in the idea of it, how many of us will go on?

Persecution in Spain.—An Agent of the Evangelical Continental Society is on trial for holding meetings in a village to which he had been invited. He has been twice condemned to imprisonment and fine on this charge, and is now awaiting the result of an appeal to the Supreme Court. Figueras, an evangelist, was thrust into a dungeon for two days for holding a village service near Vigo. Two of Mr. Spurgeon's former students were assailed with stones, at the open instigation of the priest, as they were returning from a village where they had been preaching. At Camunas the authorities of the village seem to have decided on driving out all religious teachers. They have put the priest to flight, and the Protestant pastor is ordered to leave, on pain of death. Still in many places the Gospel is being actively preached.

The Trap-Door Spider, found in Jamaica, digs a burrow in the earth and lines it with a silken web. The burrow is closed by a trap-door, having a hinge that permits it to be opened and closed with admirable accuracy. The door is circular, and is made of alternate layers of earth and web, and is hinged to the lining of the tube that leads to the burrow by a band of the same silken secretion. The door exactly fits the entrance to the burrow, and when closed so precisely corresponds with the surrounding earth that it can hardly be distinguished, even when its position is known. It is a strange sight to see the earth open, a little lid be raised, some hairy legs protrude, and gradually the whole form of the spider show itself. What a wonderful type this is in the material creation of what the apostle calls "the working of Satan" and "the snare of the devil"! (2 Thess. 2:9; 2 Tim. 2:26.)

Prayer for a New Stomach Answered.—A missionary lady in Burmah had an unconquerable antipathy to rice, such as the most reasonable people sometimes have to cats, cheese, or other things. This antipathy caused her to suffer much from hunger; for in her missionary tours in the jungle it would often happen that there was nothing but rice to eat. The native Christians, who grieved at her antipathy, and the privations it brought, would frequently pray, "O Lord, give mamma (their pet name for their beloved missionary) a new stomach." Several years ago, the "mamma," finding that she had no sensation of repugnance when rice was on the table, was tempted to eat a few grains. To her surprise it created no nausea. She now eats rice without difficulty, and can make her dinner on it if necessary. She has a "new stomach."

A Rich Citizen of Pompeii Possessed a Valuable dog, a noble and faithful animal, called Delta. He had saved his master's life on three occasions; first, when nearly drowned in the sea; secondly, when attacked by robbers; thirdly, by destroying a she-wolf whose cubs his master had taken in a grove near Herculaneum. These particulars were inscribed on a collar round the dog's neck. When the sudden eruption of Mount Vesuvius in the year 79 overwhelmed these two cities and buried them for nearly seventeen hundred years, Delta, who had attached himself to his master's only son, attempted to shield him from the fiery tempest by stretching his body over him. In this position the two skeletons, the dog's and the boy's, were found when the ruins of Pompeii were explored. Such a story would awaken tender feelings in many a breast, and perhaps bring tears to the eyes. But the story of Christ's love for sinners, that led Him to a shameful and painful death on the cross, is received with cold indifference.

The Victoria Cross Presented.—Queen Victoria and the Princess Beatrice recently visited the Netley Hospital, and spent half an hour among the soldiers wounded at the Cape. Afterward the convalescent patients were formed in a hollow square in front of the hospital to see Her Majesty pin the Victoria Cross on the serge coat of Private Hitch, a young fellow belonging to the Twenty-fourth Regiment, who was badly wounded at Rorke's Drift while defending the sick in the hospital, several of whom were saved.

The Evangelical Mission Work in Paris makes rapid progress. There are now twenty-three branches in different parts of the city, and meetings are held every night of the week except Saturday. The movement had its orgin in the ready obedience of one man of God to the Divine Call. Mr. McAll, a young Congregational minister, ill from overwork, went to Paris in 1871 for relaxation and change of scene. There, anxious to be at work in his Master's service, he conversed with those whom he met, and sought to direct their attention to the Gospel. More especially he sought out the Communists, whose excesses the year before had struck all Europe aghast. One of these men said to him: "Throughout this whole district we have, to a man, done with the priests. If any one will come and teach us a religion of another kind, a religion of freedom and reality, many of us are ready for it."

Such an invitation sounded in Mr. McAll's ears like a call from God, and he immediately resigned his charge, left his home and friends, and gave himself up to the work of teaching these Communists "a real religion." The result has been blessed by God to a truly wonderfu extent.

The Wretched Condition of Turkish Soldier is described in the Levant Herald. From tha journal it appears that, with the exception of th troops garrisoned in the capital, the bulk of th army is in a pitiable state—ill-fed, shoeless, an otherwise scarcely clad. Indeed at Gallipoli th gallant nizams have been constrained to use ol flour sacks, with a hole in the bottom to adm the head, and one on each side for either arm the hero whom the claims of decency compelle to have recourse to that unmilitary costume i the absence of the uniform which the state too impecunious to provide. At Janina t quality of the rations supplied has been so ba and the nature of the food so unwholesome, th the hospitals are crowded with sick, sufferi from diseases engendered by debility resulti from improper and insufficient food.

Mr. Spurgeon's Two Colored Missionaries w went out to Africa from his Tabernacle so months ago, have sent back cheering news themselves. In the middle of May they had settled at their new stations, Bakundu, Victor Cameroons, and had begun work under the spices of the village chief, who had much assist the mission. In his will, recently made at time of serious illness, the chief commended youngest son to the care of the missionari and commanded his subjects to obey and p tect the preachers and their wives.

The Effect of Crime upon the Conscie has just been awfully illustrated in England the experiences of Jonathan Geydon. Twe years ago, when a young man of twenty-two, murdered an old lady named Mary White, robbed the house in which she lived. Fr that time until last month he was never he of, but now he has given himself up and c fessed the crime. For twenty years he has w dered about England a fugitive—the curse Cain upon him, never able to settle to any ste work, ever haunted with the terrible rem brance of his fearful sin. On being locke he inquired whether his parents were still ing, and on learning that both were dead— had died of grief—he burst into tears.

The Reformed Roman Catholic Party France is encountering much opposition the priests of the Romish Church. One of reformers, M. John Lemoine, having charged with seeking to introduce a new r ion, says he is well content with the old fait France, but that Rome has introduced a religion—"A mere tissue of mythology polytheism. It is impossible to recognize Christian religion in this old curiosity-sh idols and miracles, and disguises in which old faith is dressed up; and were any Epi ides to rise up from a sleep of half a centur would fail to recognize the Roman Cathol ligion in that heap of idolatries, supersti and polytheism under which it lies buried.

Miss Havergal's name has become a household word, in religious circles at least. Her prose writings have been, under God, vehicles for conveying sacred truth in such a manner that many heavily-tried ones have found in them the unravelling of what they deemed a hopeless tangle of trials. The seekers after God, also, have not been few who have discovered "the Way, the Truth, and the Life" through the same channel. Her life was so truly spiritual, that all her poetry is redolent of resignation and nearness to Christ.

This lady was born at Astley, near Bewdley, Worcestershire, England, on the 14th of December, 1836, and was the youngest daughter of a man of genuine piety and great gifts. The advantages which Frances, or Fanny as she was always called, enjoyed in her parental home bore good fruit. Poetic tastes were there created, and her great natural ability was urged in a direction in which she made her mark; for the products of which — her religious poems—she will ever be chiefly remembered.

This was what might have been expected, for her father was acknowledged to be the first modern authority on ecclesiastical music and psalmody. His devotion to the ministry of the Gospel alone led him to refuse the Professorial Chair of Music in the University of Oxford. He was rector of Astley for thirteen years (1829–42); and rector of St. Nicholas and honorary canon, Worcester, for fifteen years (1845–60). He became vicar of Shareshill, in Worcestershire, in 1860, and held the living until his death at Leamington in 1870.

Deeply had Miss Havergal imbibed from early years the Gospel teaching of her venerated father. In days when comparatively few ministers bore a simple testimony, Canon Havergal ever fed his flock with soul-nurturing food. In an ordination sermon at Worcester, in 1845, he thus answered the question, And what shall we preach? "Let us habitually preach Christ, as 'the end of the law for righteousness' to every earnest believer: Christ, as the source of sanctification through the Spirit: Christ, as the All-in-all of the sinner—the helpless, the miserable, the broken-hearted sinner."

Fearing bad effects from her delicately strung and highly excitable temperament, her loving father endeavored to curb and retard the exercise of her exuberant mental powers, so that they might more gradually mature, and thus cause less strain and danger to her finely organized frame. Of course this was sometimes felt to be a trial, but it was obediently submitted to by her.

Her mother died in 1848; and Miss Fanny was sent to school, before her father's second marriage to Miss Caroline A. Cooke in 1851. She went abroad with her parents in 1852, spent the winter in Dusseldorf, where she attended school, and was afterwards, in 1853, boarded for some time in a worthy German pastor's family at Oberwesel, on the Rhine. Seeds were sown during this sojourn which bore blessed fruit in her after life. She more than once referred to her return therefrom as a coming down from higher spiritual latitudes.

She remained at home at Shareshill till 1858, when she went to reside with her eldest married sister, at Oakhampton, near Stourport. There she remained for eight years, superintending the education of her nieces, till the last of them left for school in October, 1866, when she returned to her father's vicarage at Shareshill.

In January, 1867, she paid a second visit to the Continent with her relatives, and she has left us a characteristic poem, entitled "Travelling Thoughts," which records her deep love for her happy home. But in seeking among her many published writings for some index of no better can be found than a stanza in one of her earliest effusions, "Little Fan"—

HER AIM IN LIFE,

> Now in the crowded halls of life,
> May it be mine to bring
> Some gentle stir of the heated air,
> Some coolness falling fresh and fair,
> Like a passing angel's wing."

Her musical studies and occasional verse-writing were plentifully relieved by physical exercises and games. She was a good swimmer and a graceful skater. Although not professing to draw, she could sketch fairly well. As a good linguist, she could converse for hours with Germans without its being known that she was English. French she spoke fluently, and she could read the New Testament in Greek.

But it was not until late in her brief life that she began to use her beautiful voice in singing other than in domestic or public worship. She referred to this in 1862 or 1863, in writing to a friend, and in that letter she, as if by prophetic foresight of the now veritable telephone, said, "I dreamt (really) that some one had invented a phonoduct (N.B. I dreamt the word—I should not have so mixed languages if awake!) by which music could be 'laid on,' like gas or water, and at any distance. Fancy having it laid on from Exeter Hall, with a little 'oratorio tap' in one's drawing-room, so as to hear the 'Elijah' all alone in the twilight! Can you imagine any thing nicer? When the phonoduct becomes general, I shall be very glad to be your Beethoven and Handel reservoir. You could 'turn it on' any evening in the twilight, for I generally then practise or extemporize for about half an hour—at least, I have done since I have been at home."

Neither her accomplishments nor her love for physical exercises in any way detracted from her home duties. When about to return home from Oakhampton, in 1866, she thus gave an insight into her active habits of life in a letter which she wrote: "I am not afraid of not finding plenty to do; there always seems more than one has physical strength for. I can't understand how any one living on this globe can talk about 'nothing to do.'"

She greatly endeared herself to all the good with whom she came into contact, and especially to the children (who always called her "Aunt Fanny") by her songs, stories, games, and romps. Her letters to them (always signed "Aunt Fanny") were models of what letters to children ought to be, and in stirring interest they bore a strong resemblance to Luther's letters to his little Hans.

The reader of her poems will find in them the best key of her life. Emphatically she was one of GOD'S OWN POETS.

And as she wrote and sang others read and heard more and more perfectly the melody of the growing life of consecrated service. Her poems clearly indicate this progressive advance.

How fitting the progression! Her first volume one of ministry—"The Ministry of Song;" her second one of consecration—"Under the Surface;" the third, in purpose at least—"Praise"—praise begun on earth and perfected in heaven.

Miss Havergal's was unconscious genius. She says, when writing to a friend, "I have not the least bit of imagination, and can only copy bits out of my own inner life pictures. I hardly ever wrote a line which I had not somehow lived. . . . You speak of 'art,' but I don't remember ever aiming at it or taking it into consideration in any piece; it is all a sort of chance how it comes out, for I write merely just as the ideas come to me, with only a sort of shake of the kaleidoscope to bring them into something approaching shape."

Canon Havergal's death resulted from ap plexy, and took place in 1870, at Pyrmont Vill Leamington. For eight years, from the time her father's death till her going to Swanse Miss Havergal's winter home was with h mother at Pyrmont Villa. Her life there w varied by visits to friends, continental tours, a sojourns at the coast or in the country. Som times she would take lodgings in out-of-the-w nooks in England, far removed from the hau of the common traveller, and rejoice in stayi for a time where no mail was regularly availab In 1874 she greatly enjoyed a pedestrian exc sion in Switzerland, with a party of relatives friends; and for a while remained there beh the others, living in a pleasant mountain chá In 1876 she again visited the Continent, w Mr. and Mrs. Rogers of Leamington, when made the acquaintance of the female art Helga von Cramm, who illustrated her po and memorial cards.

Many of Miss Havergal's hymns and sl poems, printed as leaflets, have had an ex sive circulation. Packets of cards, with sel ed Scripture texts, or original verses by M Fanny, and beautifully illustrated with Al flowers by Helga von Cramm, have also b issued, specially adapted for memorial c Her last volume of poems, the "Life Mos comprising her former two volumes in one, tains twelve exquisite illustrations of Al scenery and flowers from the same pencil, b tifully printed in colors.

From that fever, ever, she recovered; but she was never wards strong, being subject to severe heac followed by much nervous depression.

After Mrs. Havergal's death in 1878 the at Leamington was broken up; Miss along with her unmarried sister, went t Mumbles, Caswell Bay, near Swansea, t for lodgings, as a resting-place for the and spring. She was afterwards in Cornw a time; but in October, 1878, the two settled in Park Villa, at The Mumbles. amidst her literary work, intent to win she began a Bible reading, organized a j "Temperance Regiment," and made quaintance of the villagers in their homes. Then the men also wanted to be to by her at the idle corner of the village spirit was willing, and her enthusiasm to undertake more than her fragile fra equal to.

visited her last summer at The Mumb joined in some part-singing with her a Batteson, and heard her sing several of sweet effective songs. Her last words just before his leaving, were, "What a day it will be when we all get home! time of joy we shall have, after seeing t to see our loved ones, and our heavenly children—so many of those whom never see on earth! We shall enjoy seeing them there."

It had been arranged that she should Irish Church Mission stations, and sh start on the journey with her nephews 1879. She thus wrote to a friend on "My Irish tour begins (D.V.) June 4th I told Mr. Fitzpatrick, the Secretary, ar cottage or farm accommodation woul me, I didn't mind roughing; but my tation is a most kind letter from the Cashel. So I begin by staying in a 'p stead of a cottage, which wasn't at all

I tell Mr. F. I must see the hedge and ditch , for the sake of the Society."

r plain and limited wardrobe required some ions for this tour; but, with characteristic licity, she said to her friend, the Baroness a von Cramm, "I can't spare time to go Swansea about that dress. Come with me e village shop; it would be first-rate to get there." But that tour was not to be.

A GREATER JOURNEY

vened. Miss Havergal held a temperance ing with sailors and village lads on the ng of the 17th of May. The damp air gave chill, followed by feverishness, congestion, nflammation.

the 2d of June the Rev. S. C. Morgan, of Swansea, saw she was evidently dying, aid to her, "He is with you now?" Her ighted up as she answered, "Of course He To the doctor she said, "I shall go just Jesus likes;" to one of her sisters, "Not hing hath failed" (Joshua 23 : 14). Speaking of her Temperance Regiment she said, them all around to trust Jesus; it's simrusting Jesus." Her testimony all along ne was full and triumphant, and her exclan, "Splendid to be so near the gates of n!" will not soon be forgotten.

er in the day she asked her brother to sing usalem, my happy home," to her father's "St. Chrysostom," and another to his "Evan." Her sister, after quoting several orting texts between the restless tossings d fro, repeated the first line of Fanny's , "Jesus, I will trust Thee," when she reled by singing the whole verse to her own "Hermas."

is was only ten minutes before the end. another attack of suffering followed, when y said, "Now it is all over—blessed rest!" hen folded her hands upon her breast and d up steadfastly for a few minutes with t eyes, radiant expression, adoring wonder, xpectant gaze, and uttered a glad "Oh!" ried to sing something, but only reached irst word "He." This was her last word e passed away at two o'clock on the Morn f June 3d, 1879.

ow sweetly in her last moments did she e the truth of her own hymn,—

"I so sweet to trust Thy Word alone:
I do not ask to see
he unveiling of Thy purpose, or the shining
f future light on mysteries entwining:
promise-roll is all my own,—
Thy Word is enough for me.

e human heart asks love. But now I know That my heart hath from Thee ll real and full and marvellous affection, o near, so human! Yet Divine perfection ills gloriously the mighty glow!
Thy love is enough for me.

ere were strange soul-depths, restless, vast and broad,
Unfathomed as the sea,— n infinite craving for some infinite stilling;
ut now Thy perfect peace is perfect filling!
d Jesus Christ, my Lord, my God,
Thou, Thou art enough for me!"

e funeral took place at Astley, Miss Haver birthplace, on Monday, June 9th. By the of the family, it was strictly private; but warm and devoted friends travelled long neys to reach the spot, now so hallowed and ared.

e family vault is on the high ground, near ntrance to the village churchyard, under preading branches of a lofty fir-tree. Here, ath the shadow of the house of God in which onored and venerated father, Canon Haverfor so many years preached "the faithful d," and near the old rectory where she was , all that was mortal of one of the sweetest ers of the sanctuary was laid to rest in her er's grave. Instead of having the usual n-plate with its inscription, her attached d, the Baroness Helga von Cramm, had tifully illuminated her name with her own hless skill; and a profusion of lovely wreaths almost hid from view the "casket" which contained the precious relics of the beloved sister and friend. There had been heavy storms all day, but as the service ended, the sunshine came, and a chorus of birds burst forth—emblematic of her bright and glorious entrance into that mansion prepared for her, where sorrow and sighing, which she labored here to mitigate, can never come.

THE HORRORS OF VIVISECTION.

MR. BERGH, the courageous and indefatigable President of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, in a letter to the New York Herald gives the following examples of the nameless barbarities which he wants to be prohibited by law. The facts are taken from the accounts of the experimenters themselves:

"Magendie once nailed a sensitive little spaniel by its four paws and its long silky ears to the table that he might show to his delighted pupils how to separate the nerves of the eyes, the sawing of the skull, the cutting of the spine, and the laying open of the different sets of nerves, retaining the groaning animal until the next day!

"Claude Bernard, who died a couple of years since, and went to answer at the bar of Heaven for his revolting cruelties, invented a stove to observe the slow death by heat of warm-blooded animals. In his book he describes the agonies of seventeen dogs and twenty-two rabbits which he had thus slowly baked alive!

"Professor Fyfe, of Edinburgh, once fastened a beautiful spaniel by its feet, making a hole through its nose with a red-hot iron, through which he passed a thong to hold it more securely. He cut open its chest and belly to show his pupils the intestinal organs. The expression of agony when the animal showed its white teeth in its efforts to resist, according to an eye-witness, was most horrible!

"Professor, or, more properly speaking, the Bavarian Bracket, of Paris, once dug his own dog's eyes out, then destroyed its hearing, and tortured it in every conceivable way, but, in spite of all this, the friendly creature licked the murderous hands of its fiendish master to the very last. This same scientific devil, who sacrificed no less than 200 dogs in similar experiments, once cut open the womb of a pregnant bitch in order to establish the important fact that the dying mother would lick the young ones while thus being brought into the world.

"Professor Schiff, of Florence, so infuriated public opinion against him that he was obliged to flee to Geneva. He dissected alive 700 dogs annually, and in his book he thus coolly remarks: 'With many dogs, on their arrival at my laboratory, I am obliged to cut the nerves of the voice, lest their nightly concert may bring my studies into bad repute.' Dr. Werthein, of Vienna, killed thirty dogs in 1867 by pouring boiling water on five of them, and the other twenty-five he saturated with turpentine; so that the first were boiled and the others roasted alive.

"At the veterinary school of Alfort, near Lyons, 'deeds without a name' are daily performed. Injured or old horses which have served man faithfully and untiringly for a lifetime are subjected to thirty or sixty experiments, such as boring the frontal cavity, amputating limbs, piercing the eyes, tearing off the hoofs—and all this is done under the pretext of giving manual skill to the students!

"Dr. Murdock relates one of his experiences: 'A little chestnut mare, worn out in the service of man, had survived the numerous tortures of one day, and no longer resembled any creature on earth. Her thighs had been cut open; the skin torn away, ploughed through with hot irons, harrowed with dozens of setons; the sinews cut through, the hoofs torn off and the eyes pierced. In this blind and powerless condition the miserable creature was placed, amid shouts of laughter by the students, upon its bleeding feet to show those present what human skill could perform before death could release their victim.'

"The celebrated Baron Von Weber in an autograph letter to me assures me 'that the greater part of the experiments on animals are now devoted toward the brain and its reference to the nervous system; and hence the poor animals, while being tortured to death, are not even allowed the benefit of anæsthetics, as these would interfere with the inferences drawn from experiments.' This latter fact has been repeatedly admitted to me by leading surgeons of this city, advocates of vivisection."

Mr. Bergh quotes the authority of the distinguished surgeons Nélaton, Sir William Ferguson, and Sir Charles Bell—"that of every thousand of these experiments scarcely a tenth part is of the smallest value to science or medicine, and that the remaining nine hundred must be considered as entirely useless and worthless."

"Useless and worthless" suffering inflicted on the animal world stamps the perpetrators as men devoid of godliness, for "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast; but the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel."—Prov. 12 : 10.

"TILL HE COME."

AMONG the sights of Venice may be seen a very beautiful monument in the form of a pyramid. A full-length figure of a sleeping maiden reclines at the foot, leaning against the partially opened gates of the tomb. Beside her stands an angel, with eyes intently gazing into the distance, and holding in his hand a trumpet. Lo! he watches the first approach of our coming Lord, in order to raise the trumpet to his lips, and peal forth such a loud triumphal sound as shall awaken those who are sleeping "till He come."

What reflections crowd the mind when gazing on this work of art! Are we waiting for the return of our Lord? Are we living as if we expected His coming? Are our lamps burning, and oil in our vessels with our lamps?

In the churchyard of Hurstmonceaux, not far from the venerable ruin of that name, we were much struck by a short quotation from Scripture on the tombstone of one well known and loved, whose life is so graphically pictured in "The Annals of a Quiet Life."

"Till He come" was the simple yet pregnant inscription on the tombstone. Well did it express the faith, hope, and love of the departed!

When we awake in the morning how blessed to have our first thoughts of the Lord Jesus, to be able to look in God's face without a cloud or shadow to mar our communion with Him; to live during the day, moment by moment, with a conscience void of offence toward God and man. Should any thing disturb our joy in God, to flee at once to Him with full confession, to receive full restoration, and to lay ourselves down at night with a heart that does not condemn us.

A dying saint, whose departure was near at hand, being asked, "What is your hope for the future?" replied with a beaming smile of faith and love. "Christ there," she said, laying her hand on her Bible; "Christ here," she repeated, laying her hand on her heart; "Christ there," she added, pointing to heaven, and gazing steadfastly upward. In the word of God we find Christ. He is ours in all the promises of the Gospel. In our hearts we joyfully receive Christ. And Him we hope to enjoy forever in heaven. We are to wait His return from heaven as an event actually near, and that may occur at any time (Luke 21 : 34).

Queen Victoria's Reign of Forty-two Years has witnessed remarkable changes. She has outlived by several years every bishop and every judge whom she found seated on those benches in England, Scotland, and Ireland. She has witnessed the funeral of every Premier who has served under her except Mr. Gladstone and Lord Beaconsfield, and she has commissioned as many as eight successive Premiers to form no less than thirteen different administrations.

THE CIRCLE.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, October 19th, 1879.

"It is He that sitteth upon the circle of the earth."
—Isaiah 40 : 22.

The Circle God's Favorite Figure—The Giant's Causeway—The Course of the World a Circle—Its History a Circle—As in the Material so in the Spiritual—The Circuit of Jezebel's Career—The Circle of Government—The Clock of the Ages—Fruit after Many Days—The Expense of Burning Latimer—Retribution in a Circle—The Circle Turns Quickly—The Judgment Day the Joining Point—The Circle of Influence—Paul's Circle—Voltaire's—The Theory Glad and Sad—God can Break the Circle—Things that Slip God's Memory——The Circle in Heaven—Every Circle has its Centre—Christ the Heavenly Centre.

While yet people thought that the world was flat, and thousands of years before they found out that it was round, Isaiah, in my text, intimated the shape of it, God sitting upon the circle of the earth. The most beautiful figure in all geometry is the circle. God made the universe on the plan of a circle.

There are in the natural world straight lines, angles, parallelograms, diagonals, quadrangles; but these evidently are not God's favorites. Almost everywhere where you find Him geometrizing, you find the circle dominant, and if not the circle, then the curve, which is a circle that died young! If it had lived long enough, it would have been a full orb, a periphery. An ellipse is a circle pressed only a little too hard at the sides.

Giant's Causeway in Ireland shows what God thinks of mathematics. There are over thirty-five thousand columns of rocks—octagonal, hexagonal, pentagonal. These rocks seem to have been made by rule and by compass. Every artist has his moulding room, where he may make fifty shapes; but he chooses one shape as preferable to all the others. I will not say that the Giant's Causeway was the world's moulding room, but I do say, out of a great many figures, God seems to have selected the circle as the best.

"It is He that sitteth on the circle of the earth." The stars in a circle, the moon in a circle, the sun in a circle, the universe in a circle, and the throne of God the centre of that circle.

When men build churches, they ought to imitate the idea of the Great Architect, and put the audience in a circle, knowing that the tides of emotion roll more easily that way than in straight lines. Six thousand years ago God flung this world out of His right hand; but He did not throw it out in a straight line, but curvilinear, with a leash of love holding it so as to bring it back again. The world started from His hand pure and Edenic. It has been rolling on through regions of moral ice and distemper. How long it will roll God only knows, but it will in due time make complete circuit and come back to the place where it started—the hand of God, pure and Edenic.

The history of the world goes in a circle. Why is it that the shipping in our day is improving so rapidly? It is because men are imitating the old model of Noah's ark. A ship carpenter gives that as his opinion. Although so much derided by small wits, that ship of Noah's time beat the Gallia and the Arizona, of which we boast so much. Where is the ship on the sea to-day that could outride a deluge in which the heaven and the earth were wrecked, landing all the passengers in safety?—two of each kind of living creatures, hundreds of thousands of species.

Pomology will go on with its achievements, until after many centuries the world will have plums and pears equal to the Paradisical. The art of gardening will grow for centuries, and after the Downings and Mitchells of the world have done their best, in the far future the art of gardening will come up to the arborescence of the year one. If the makers of colored glass go on improving, they may in some centuries be able to make something equal to the east window of York Minster, which was built in 1290. We are six centuries behind those artists; but the world must keep on toiling until it shall make the complete circuit and come up to the skill of those very men.

If the world continues to improve in masonry, we shall have after a while, perhaps after the advance of centuries, mortar equal to that which I saw this summer in the wall of an exhumed English city, built in the time of the Romans, sixteen hundred years ago—that mortar to-day as good as the day in which it was made, having outlasted the brick and the stone. I say, after hundreds of years, masonry may advance to that point.

If the world stands long enough, we may have a city as large as they had in old times. Babylon, five times the size of London. You go into the potteries in England, and you find them making cups and vases after the style of the cups and vases exhumed from Pompeii. The world is not going back. Oh no! but it is swinging in a circle, and will come back to the styles of pottery known so long ago as the days of Pompeii.

The world must keep on progressing until it makes the complete circuit. The curve is in the right direction, the curve will keep on until it becomes the circle.

Well now, my friends, what is true in the material universe is true in God's moral government and spiritual arrangement. That is the meaning of Ezekiel's wheel. All commentators agree in saying that the wheel means God's providence. But a wheel is of no use unless it turns, and if it turns, it turns around, and if it turns around it moves in a circle.

What then! Are we parts of a great iron machine whirled around whether we will or not, the victims of inexorable fate? No! So far from that, I shall show you that we ourselves start the circle of good or bad actions, and that it will surely come around again to us unless by divine intervention it be hindered. Those bad or good actions may make the circuit of many years; but come back to us they will as certainly as that God sits on the circle of the earth.

Jezebel, the worst woman of the Bible—Shakespeare copying his "Lady Macbeth" from her picture—slew Naboth because she wanted his vineyard. While the dogs were eating the body of Naboth, Ezekiel the prophet put down his compass, and marked a circle from those dogs clear around to the dogs that should eat the body of Jezebel the murderess. "Impossible!" the people said; "that will never happen." Who is that being flung out of the palace window? Jezebel. A few hours after they came around, hoping to bury her. They find only the palms of the hands and the skull. The dogs that devoured Jezebel and the dogs that devoured Naboth. Oh! what a swift, what an awful circuit!

THE CIRCLE OF GOVERNMENT.

But it is sometimes the case that this circle sweeps through a century, or through many centuries. The world started with a theocracy for government; that is, God was the president and emperor of the world. People got tired of a theocracy. They said, "We don't want God directly interfering with the affairs of the world; give us a monarchy." The world had a monarchy. From a monarchy it is going to have a limited monarchy. After a while, the limited monarchy will be given up, and the republican form of government will be everywhere dominant and recognized.

Then the world will get tired of the republican form of government, and it will have an anarchy, which is no government at all. And then, all nations finding out that man is not capable of righteously governing man, will cry out again for a theocracy, and say, "Let God come back and conduct the affairs of the world." Every step—monarchy, limited monarchy, republicanism, anarchy, only different steps between the first theocracy and the last theocracy, or segments of the great circle of the earth on which God sits.
